Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, said on the CBS News program "Face the Nation" that if China wavered in its support for the American stance, there should be "consequences in our relationship."

But Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, a senior Democratic member of the Foreign Relations Committee, disagreed. "China's not our enemy on this," he said, also on "Face the Nation." "They don't want an arms race in that part of the world any more than we do." He said bilateral talks with North Korea might be necessary.

Senator Richard G. Lugar, Republican of Indiana, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, warned Sunday that if North Korea sold nuclear materials to terrorist groups, an American military attack on North Korea would probably be "heavily considered." He said on the ABC News program "This Week" that if Japan felt sufficiently threatened, it might pursue its own nuclear arsenal, which he said would be "very dangerous."

In South Korea, Mr. Hill, after meeting with Song Min Soon, the security adviser to President Roh Moo Hyun, told reporters that he had doubts about the effectiveness of sanctions in solving the problem.

Choo Kyu Ho, the spokesman for the South Korean Foreign Ministry, said the South Korean government "won't go fully in hand with Japan, which is leading this movement," and added, "In the end, we expect China to veto it."

He said South Korea would make the missile tests the focus of ministerial talks next week between the Koreas in South Korea.

Despite drawing worldwide condemnation for firing seven missiles, including the new long-range Taepodong 2, North Korea vowed Sunday to respond "to an all-out war with an all-out war."

North Korea's leader, Kim Jong Il, said that "even a small concession wouldn't be made to the sworn enemy U.S. imperialistic aggressors," the Korean Central Broadcasting Station, said in a report monitored here by Yonhap, a South Korean news agency.

U.S. Rejects North Korean Bid To End Bank Freeze (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0038905

By Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea -- The U.S. is holding the line on a freeze of North Korean funds in a Macau bank, rebuffing Pyongyang's latest effort to link diplomatic talks on its nuclear-weapons program with a probe of its financial activities by U.S. and Chinese authorities.

North Korea's deputy ambassador to the United Nations was quoted in a Seoul newspaper as saying Pyongyang wouldn't rejoin six-party talks on its weapons program until the U.S. takes steps to lift a freeze of about $24 million in North Korean funds in a bank in Macau, a special administrative region of China.

The Macau government froze the accounts after the U.S. blacklisted the bank, Banco Delta Asia, for allegedly assisting the North Koreans in currency counterfeiting and money laundering. North Korea has boycotted the talks since November, two months after the six countries reached an agreement for North Korea to give up nuclear-weapons development in return for a nonaggression promise from the U.S. and more financial aid.

Han Song Ryol, North Korea's deputy ambassador to the U.N., said Pyongyang wants access to its money in the Macau bank as a "minimum condition" for returning to the nuclear talks. He made the remarks in an interview published Saturday by the newspaper Hankyoreh.

The chief U.S. diplomat to Asia said North Korea should return to negotiations without conditions and again sharply criticized a series of missile tests Pyongyang conducted last Wednesday, which included the launch of a malfunctioning intercontinental ballistic missile that could reach U.S. territory.

"To change the subject from this rather reckless [missile] activity on their part back to an issue of illicit activities, which I would argue are also reckless, is simply not appropriate," Christopher Hill, U.S. assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, said Saturday after meeting with South Korean diplomats following the missile launches.

North Korea appears to associate the weapons discussion with the bank investigation because the U.S. blacklisted the Macau bank days after the six-way talks -- among North Korea and South Korea, Japan, China, Russia and the U.S. -- produced the tentative accord in September.

Since North Korea fired seven test missiles last week, the U.S. and Japan have called for more economic sanctions. South Korea and China, which have a bigger economic and political stake in the North, condemned the military testing but are resistant to economic pressure. China suggested holding talks on an informal basis, a step the U.S. and South Korea said they are willing to take.

S. Korea Plays It Cool After Tests (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, July 10, 2006

SEOUL — When Kang Hyuk Jin saw the front-page newspaper headlines about North Korean missile tests last week, the 25-year-old college student reacted swiftly: He turned the page and started reading about something else.

“It's the problem of the government and some old guys,” he says.

Kang's reaction is typical in the South Korean capital, especially among young people. The news has been greeted with a shrug, never mind that Seoul sits within range of North Korean artillery and rockets. The attitude in South Korea is in sharp contrast to the alarm with which the missile tests were viewed in Tokyo and Washington.

On Sunday, the administration of South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun even issued a statement criticizing Japan for what it said was an overreaction to the missile tests.

“There is no reason to fuss over this … like Japan, but every reason to do the opposite,” said the statement from the office of Roh's spokesman. Japan has joined the United States in pushing for sanctions against North Korea in the United Nations Security Council.

South Korea's attitude has made it even harder for U.S. policymakers to forge a coalition committed to punishing North Korea. China and Russia, traditional North Korean allies, have opposed harsh sanctions.

As a diplomatic crisis raged Sunday, the most-read story on the website of the Chosun Ilbo daily was headlined "From Golf to Laptops, Asian Designs Stay Hot."

Some South Korean TV viewers were dismayed Wednesday when an early-morning broadcast of a World Cup soccer match was interrupted by news of the North Korean missile launches. "They were annoyed," says Kim Eui Young, a political scientist at Kyung Hee University in Seoul. "It was a serious matter: Missiles were flying over us, and we were just watching TV."

Behind the nonchalance toward North Korean brinkmanship is a change in South Korean political attitudes over the past several years.

Fading away is the older generation defined by the 1950-53 Korean War, grateful to the United States for repelling a North Korean invasion and hostile toward the Stalinist regime in Pyongyang.

Taking their elders' place in positions of authority are members of what is known here as the "386 Generation": people in their late 30s who attended college and fought to bring democracy to South Korea in the '80s and who were born in the '60s. They are suspicious of U.S. motives and eager to ease North-South tensions, which until the mid-'80s had been exploited by South Korean military governments to repress dissent. Their aspirations are reflected in the "Sunshine Policy" of reconciliation with the North, put in place by former South Korean president (and Nobel Peace Prize winner) Kim Dae Jung and continued by his successor, Roh.

Roh rode to the presidency in 2002 on a wave of anti-Americanism provoked by a wide array of grievances, from public outrage over a South Korean speedskater's controversial gold-medal loss to an American in the Winter Olympics, to an accident in which two South Korean schoolgirls were crushed by a U.S. military vehicle.

Many South Koreans are offended by President Bush's opposition to the Sunshine Policy and his words of contempt for North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il. "Bush criticisms of Kim Jong Il are taken personally, the way a family member might react if an outsider criticizes his deadbeat uncle," says Korea specialist Scott Snyder at the Asia Foundation. "Everyone knows it's true, but it is an insult for an outsider to say it."

Only 20% of South Koreans surveyed last year by the newspaper JoongAng Ilbo and the East Asia Institute said they trusted the United States, compared with 44% who expressed distrust.

In office, Roh's government has provided nearly unconditional aid to the impoverished North and has discouraged criticism of North Korea's appalling human rights record and the policies that led to the death by starvation of 2 million to 3 million North Koreans in the 1990s. "The government is not very interested in human rights issues," opposition legislator Song Young Sun says. "The Roh Moo Hyun government is not paying any attention."

"The South Korean government is hypnotized, paralyzed, numbed," says activist Moon Gook Han, who has organized North Korean defections at foreign consulates in China. "Imagine if even 100 South Koreans died of starvation. The government would collapse, and there would be reforms."

Attitudes could be shifting again. Political scientist Kim of Kyung Hee University says the missile tests will end up being a "catalyst" for rethinking conciliatory policies — policies that haven't moderated North Korea's behavior or been reciprocated at all. "After several years of Sunshine Policy, we aren't getting any return," says college student Jung Hwan Wook, 24. "We should change."

Roh's approval rating last month had already hit a rock-bottom 18%, according to a poll by the Korea Society Opinion Institute. Meanwhile, the percentage of South Koreans who support U.S. policy toward North Korea has risen to 37% from 30% in 2004 and 20% in 2002, and support for increased aid to the North has narrowed to 54% from 59% in 2004, according to a poll released in May by the Korean Social Science Data Center and the Hankyoreh newspaper.

South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon took the unusual step last month of gently criticizing North Korea before the U.N. Human Rights Council.

"In the end," says Norbert Vollertsen, a German doctor who became a human rights activist and a critic of the Kim Jong Il regime after working as a medical volunteer in North Korea, "the South Koreans will wake up."

Washington, Seoul Face A Thorny Issue (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Despite North Korea's missile tests, talks between South Korea and the U.S. on a free-trade agreement resumed in Seoul Monday. One sensitive issue: South Korea wants the pact to cover goods originating at its joint-venture Kaesong industrial complex in North Korea.

The joint venture, launched in 2003 and located just north of the demilitarized zone that divides the Korean peninsula, combines South Korean capital with North Korean labor. It employs about 7,000 North Koreans who produce goods such as appliances and plastic containers for cosmetics. While the value of goods made at the venture is small, representing about one-third of the $1 billion in annual trade between North and South Korea, its potential is big. By the time the complex is in full operation in 2012, it could employ more than 750,000 North Koreans.

Kaesong illustrates a fundamental difference between the U.S. and South Korea. The U.S. sees North Korea as a threat to global stability and is seeking ways to force the country to abandon its nuclear ambitions. But South Korea sees a potentially peaceful neighbor and is looking for ways to promote dialogue and spread capitalism, with reunification the ultimate aim.

"It's a long-term goal that we'd like to achieve during...negotiations," says Ahn Chong Ghee, economic counselor at South Korea's embassy in Washington. Mr. Ahn says North Korea's missile testing hadn't damped the South's eagerness to include Kaesong in any pact.

Mr. Ahn says South Korea is aware of political difficulties the initiative faces in the U.S. but stressed Kaesong's importance. "This could be a symbol of reconciliation between North Korea and South Korea," he says. "That's why we are doing this." South Korean diplomats say the project is exposing North Korean workers to market economics and suggest that including it in a free-trade pact could encourage changes in the North.

The free-trade accord would be the U.S.'s largest pact since the North American Free Trade Agreement passed Congress more than a decade ago. Annual trade between the U.S. and Korea stands at $70 billion, and a business coalition including U.S. auto makers, financial-services firms and drug manufacturers sees important market-access gains to be had. In South Korea, there is concern about protecting domestic rice farmers from U.S. competition, but Seoul also hopes a trade pact would solidify the country's role as an Asian economic hub, giving Korean producers an edge over Asian rivals in access to the U.S. market.

Amid global tensions over North Korea, the Kaesong proposal will be difficult for the White House to swallow and would almost certainly be a deal killer if the trade pact reaches Congress.

The Kaesong proposal would puncture economic sanctions imposed by the U.S. on North Korea and runs counter to the White House's strategy of isolating North Korea. It would almost certainly force a larger debate on Capitol Hill, shifting attention from improved trade ties with Seoul to North Korea's nuclear ambitions and its record of labor and human-rights abuses.

The U.S. and South Korea hope to agree on the trade deal by year's end, so it could go to Congress before President Bush's authority to negotiate trade pacts expires at midyear 2007. Under that authority, Congress can vote "yes" or "no" on trade pacts but can't alter them. Even before the missile test, U.S. officials were leery of making an overture toward North Korea, insisting that any trade pact simply be "an agreement between our two countries," as a spokesman for the office of U.S. Trade Representative put it.

The Kaesong proposal illustrates the strains on Mr. Bush's trade policy. With global talks going nowhere, the U.S. is rushing to enact bilateral deals aimed at opening targeted markets for U.S. goods and services. It is negotiating with 11 nations, and three deals -- with Oman, Peru and Colombia -- are pending on Capitol Hill. But even the smaller deals face hurdles. Pacts with Peru and Colombia, for instance, are clouded by concerns about labor-rights protections.

The Korea negotiations are part of a U.S. strategy to build closer ties in Asia outside China. Free-trade talks are under way with Thailand and Malaysia, and the U.S., as part of Vietnam's planned entry into the World Trade Organization, is pushing Congress to overturn Cold War-era economic sanctions.

Even without Kaesong, a fight over the South Korea pact likely looms on Capitol Hill. American textile producers are worried about increased competition, and the AFL-CIO has expressed "grave concerns" about labor rights. Adding Kaesong "has the potential to sink" any deal, inviting the pact to be debated on geopolitical grounds, warns Montana Sen. Max Baucus, the top-ranking Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee.

The End Of Cowboy Diplomacy (TIME)

By Mike Allen And Romesh Ratnesar

Time, July 17, 2006

The dress code at George W. Bush's White House is cuff-linked and starch collared, reflecting the temper of a President with a reputation for no-nonsense, alpha-male decisiveness. That's why the 200 guests gathered at the White House on Independence Day were surprised to learn that Bush had decided to rip up protocol. It was an early 60th-birthday party for the President, attended by former classmates from first grade to Yale, and Bush was in high spirits. He waved to supporters on the South Lawn who had assembled to watch fireworks. They serenaded him with a hurried rendition of Happy Birthday. But instead of the usual starch, he wore a red-and-white Hawaiian shirt for the occasion.

Six years into his presidency, Bush can't be blamed for wanting a change. All the good feeling at the White House on July 4 couldn't hide the fact that he finds himself in a world of hurt. A grinding and unpopular war in Iraq, a growing insurgency in Afghanistan, an impasse over Iran's nuclear ambitions, a brewing war between Israel and the Palestinians--the litany of global crises would test the fortitude of any President, let alone a second-termer with an approval rating mired in Warren Harding territory. And there's no relief in sight. On the very day that Bush celebrated 60, North Korea's regime, already believed to possess material for a clutch of nuclear weapons, test-launched seven missiles, including one designed to reach the U.S. Even more surprising than the test (it failed less than two minutes after launch) was Bush's response to it. Long gone were the zero-tolerance warnings that peppered his speeches four years ago, when he made North Korea a charter member of the "axis of evil" club and declared at West Point that "the only path of safety is the path of action." Instead, Bush pledged to "make sure we work with our friends and allies ... to continue to send a unified message" to Pyongyang. In a press conference following the missile test, he referred to diplomacy half a dozen times.

The shift under way in Bush's foreign policy is bigger and more seismic than a change of wardrobe or a modulation of tone. Bush came to office pledging to focus on domestic issues and pursue a "humble" foreign policy that would avoid the entanglements of the Bill Clinton years. After Sept. 11, however, the Bush team embarked on a different path, outlining a muscular, idealistic and unilateralist vision of American power and how to use it. He aimed to lay the foundation for a grand strategy to fight Islamic terrorists and rogue states by spreading democracy around the world and pre-empting gathering threats before they materialize. And the U.S. wasn't willing to wait for others to help. The approach fit with Bush's personal style, his self-professed proclivity to dispense with the nuances of geopolitics and go with his gut. "The Bush Doctrine is actually being defined by action, as opposed to by words," Bush told Tom Brokaw aboard Air Force One in 2003.

But in the span of four years, the Administration has been forced to rethink the doctrine with which it hoped to remake the world as the strategy's ineffectiveness is exposed by the very policies it prescribed. The swaggering Commander in Chief who embodied the doctrine's aspirations has modulated himself too. At a press conference with British Prime Minister Tony Blair in May, Bush swore off the Wild West rhetoric of getting enemies "dead or alive," conceding that "in certain parts of the world, it was misinterpreted." Bush's response to the North Korean missile test was equally revealing. Under the old Bush Doctrine, defiance by a dictator like Kim Jong Il would have merited threats of punitive U.S. action--or at least a tongue lashing. Instead, the Administration has mainly been talking up multilateralism and downplaying Pyongyang's provocation. As much as anything, it's confirmation of what Princeton political scientist Gary J. Bass calls "doctrinal flameout." Put another way: cowboy diplomacy, RIP.

So what happened? The most obvious answer is that the Bush Doctrine foundered in the principal place the U.S. tried to apply it. Though no one in the White House openly questions Bush's decision to go to war in Iraq, some aides now acknowledge that it has come at a steep cost in military resources, public support and credibility abroad. The Administration is paying the bill every day as it tries to cope with other crises. Pursuing the forward-leaning foreign policy envisioned in the Bush Doctrine is nearly impossible at a time when the U.S. is trying to figure out how to extricate itself from Iraq. Around the world, both the U.S.'s friends and its adversaries are taking note--and in many cases, taking advantage--of the strains on the superpower. If the toppling of Saddam Hussein marked the high-water mark of U.S. hegemony, the past three years have witnessed a steady erosion in Washington's ability to bend the world to its will.

Despite appearances, the White House insists that Bush's goals have not changed. "The President has always stressed that different circumstances warrant different responses," says White House counselor Dan Bartlett. "The impression that the doctrine of pre-emption was the only guiding foreign policy light is not true. Iraq was a unique circumstance in history, and the sense of urgency on certain decisions in the early part of the first term was reflective of a nation that had to take decisive action after being attacked."

Nonetheless, a strategic makeover is evident in the ascendancy of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who has tried to repair the Administration's relations with allies and has persuaded Bush to join multilateral negotiations aimed at defusing the standoffs with North Korea and Iran. By training and temperament, Rice is a foreign policy realist, less inclined to the moralizing approach of the neoconservatives who dominated Bush's War Cabinet in the first term. Her push for pragmatism has rubbed off on hawks like Vice President Dick Cheney, the primary intellectual force behind Bush's post-9/11 policies. "There's a move, even by Cheney, toward the Kissingerian approach of focusing entirely on vital interests," says a presidential adviser. "It's a more focused foreign policy that is driven by realism and less by ideology."

To much of the world, that's a relief. But having expended so much energy and so many resources on al-Qaeda and the war in Iraq, the Administration is finding that other global challenges--from the turmoil in the Middle East to the genocide in Sudan to the regional ambitions of China--have grown beyond its ability to do anything about them. "It's difficult to think of many other times and many other presidencies when so many dangerous events were happening at once," says Wendy Sherman, a State Department official under President Clinton. "But there's so much going on in every global hot spot because the Bush Administration really opened up Pandora's box with little-to-no plans to support their actions." At the same time, there is a danger that Bush's belated embrace of conventional diplomacy will turn out to be a cover for disengagement, at a time when U.S. leadership is still required to fend off civil war in Iraq and deter the ambitions of Iran and North Korea--to say nothing of al-Qaeda. We are witnessing an overhaul of the old Bush Doctrine, but the question is, Can the U.S. find a new one to take its place?

â€¢THE IRAQ EFFECT

It may be too soon to say whether history will look kindly on the U.S.'s decision to invade Iraq, as Bush and his aides insist will happen. But the very fact that parts of Iraq remain on the edge of chaos after three years of fighting and the deaths of more than 2,500 Americans are incontrovertible evidence of how the Administration's miscalculations have come back to haunt it. Toppling Saddam was to be the singular demonstration of the Bush Doctrine, a quick and decisive strike against tyranny in the heart of the Middle East. It would also send a message to the rest of the world's malefactors, including Iran and North Korea, to think twice about testing the U.S.'s patience with regimes bent on acquiring weapons of mass destruction.

As it turns out, Iraq may prove to be not only the first but also the last laboratory for preventive war. Instead of deterring the rulers in Tehran and Pyongyang, the travails of the U.S. occupation may have emboldened those regimes in their quest to obtain nuclear weapons while constraining the U.S. military's ability to deter them. "We put three countries on notice--Iraq, Iran and North Korea--and we attacked one of them pre-emptively," says retired Marine Corps General Joseph Hoar, who commanded the U.S. Central Command from 1991 to '94. "Now we find that was a put-up job. Meanwhile, North Korea and Iran have chosen different routes than what we wanted them to take."

Fighting the insurgency in Iraq has eroded the appeal of the Bush Doctrine in a more mundane but no less significant way: it's exhausting. Public backing for the war rose slightly after the killing of terrorist leader Abu Mousab al-Zarqawi in Iraq last month, but the unremitting body count has pushed those numbers back down again. More than half the public believes going to war was not worth the cost. The drain on U.S. resources is becoming embarrassing. According to the Associated Press, the diversion of money for Iraq is partly responsible for a shortfall in an Army fund that has left one base, Fort Bragg, unable to buy office supplies. Another base, Fort Sam Houston, has received utility disconnection notices.

There is another cost, and that is the drain of brainpower and psychic energy in the Administration, from the President on down. Governments habitually overestimate what they can achieve and underestimate how much of their working day they have to spend on the really tricky issue at hand. Bush's aides say he and they can multitask--"We can walk and chew gum at the same time," says one--but the ceaseless need to make a bad situation passable is a drag on the entire enterprise. "If Iraq gets better, everything gets better," a White House official says. "If Iraq doesn't get better, there's no hope."

â€¢TWILIGHT OF IDEALISM

If the grind of the war in Iraq has undermined one plank of the Bush Doctrine--pre-emption--the complexity of global politics has caused the U.S. to struggle in its goal to spread democracy as a defense against terrorism. Some democracy activists give

Bush credit for giving a jump start to limited reforms in closed Arab regimes such as Saudi Arabia. But the White House was premature, at best, in its hopes for dramatic change. In Egypt, which the Administration has praised in the past for opening its political process, the government of Hosni Mubarak has launched a renewed crackdown against its political opponents. Lebanon, another onetime success story championed by Bush, has witnessed an unraveling of the coalition of parties that led to Syria's withdrawal from the country last spring.

Among ordinary Muslims, outrage at the bloodshed in Iraq and the excesses of the Administration's campaign against al-Qaeda--in particular, reported abuses at Abu Ghraib and GuantÃ¡namo Bay prisons--has strengthened the appeal of Islamists opposed to the West. As a result, elections are producing governments more hospitable to extremism, not less. Exhibit A was the election of Hamas, a group the U.S. and Europe classify as a terrorist organization, to run the Palestinian Authority. In response to Hamas' victory, the U.S. has led an international ban on aid to the democratically elected Palestinian government.

That reflects a broader dimming of the Administration's commitment to the ideals of its once proactive freedom agenda. Despite occasional jawboning, the U.S. has put only token pressure on Russia and China to improve their records on civil liberties and human rights, which have grown worse on Bush's watch. A senior Administration official tells TIME that the White House wants to set up new systems that will use efforts at democracy building as a condition for foreign aid and as a criterion for judging the work of U.S. ambassadors. But some officials inside the White House admit that the Administration's attention appears sporadic, limited to calling for elections but then failing to follow through on the tougher, more costly and less glamorous work of building institutions that can sustain democracies. Michael O'Hanlon, a senior foreign policy fellow at the Brookings Institution, says, "The Administration's top-down approach of assuming that elections will solve problems has been too simplistic. You also need educational institutions and economic development."

â€¢THE LIMITS OF POWER

To accomplish those goals of democracy building, you need help. The biggest illusion of the Bush Doctrine was the idea that the U.S. could carry out a strategy as ambitious as reshaping the Middle East and changing unfriendly regimes without a degree of international legitimacy and cooperation to back it up. Though the Administration sought broad international assistance in Afghanistan, it largely shunned it in Iraq. As a result, while NATO forces are now relieving U.S. troops of some of the combat burden for fighting the Taliban in southern Afghanistan, Americans continue to fight and die alone (with some backup from Iraqi troops) against the Sunni insurgents in western Iraq.

The practical costs of the last plank of the Bush Doctrine--unilateralism--may have finally persuaded the Administration to jettison that too. This move is being led by Rice, who is emerging as Bush's most visible and intimate adviser. "The President is more willing to listen to arguments in favor of utilizing diplomacy as a tool to fight radical Islam when it comes from her, because he trusts her totally," says a presidential adviser. Rice appears to have won some internal arguments--such as getting Bush to offer conditional direct talks to Iran and calling for the closure of Gitmo--but she has yet to pull off any major diplomatic breakthrough that could burnish the Bush legacy. And neoconservative allies of Bush blast Rice for pursuing diplomacy for its own sake. "When you are bereft of options, you pursue process and call it progress," says Danielle Pletka, a vice president of the American Enterprise Institute.

Since joining multilateral talks over Iran and North Korea, the U.S. has failed to persuade Russia and China, who wield veto power in the U.N. Security Council, to agree to specific sanctions against either Tehran or Pyongyang. The gap between the U.S.'s priorities and the rest of the world's stretches beyond those two challenges. The war on terrorism has provided a neat ideological framework for U.S foreign policy in the Bush years, but it has distracted the attention of the U.S. from developments in other areas--Asia, Russia and its former satellites, and Latin America--where new international systems are being built without the U.S. as their builder. For most outside the U.S., the threat of suicide bombings is a less pressing concern than issues like health care, education, job security and the environment. The longer the U.S. bases its foreign policy around the single-minded pursuit of Islamic terrorists, the less influence it is likely to have.

Can the Bush Administration recover all it has lost? Much depends on the temper and commitment of the President himself. "He can juggle all the balls and still let his hair down," says Charlie Younger, an orthopedic surgeon from Midland, Texas, and longtime friend, who spent three nights at the White House this month. "He's an eternal optimist."

But global leadership can't be based on optimism alone. And true diplomacy means more than repeating the word itself. Despite the crises facing him, Bush still has options, though they are ones he hasn't yet shown a willingness to use. Until recently, Bush failed to acknowledge how much Iraq has eroded U.S. credibility or show that he takes seriously the criticisms lodged against his policies by the U.S.'s allies. Iraq may turn out to be a peaceful and thriving democracy, but Bush himself concedes he doesn't foresee that happening before he leaves the stage 30 months from now. If Bush hopes to salvage a more popular, less contested legacy, he needs to commit himself to something big and attainable beyond Iraq--a strategic rapprochement with Iran, perhaps, or a Marshall Plan for African development--and bring allies on board for the ride. Of course, the longing for a foreign policy legacy is common to all lame-duck Presidents; more often than not, such quests have ended in disappointment. Bush may still be able to avoid that fate, but he's running out of time.

The U.N. Sideshow On Korea (NYT)

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

The United Nations Security Council certainly should register international condemnation of last week's North Korean missile launches. But if any serious progress is going to be made on this and the related North Korean nuclear issue, it will not be through Security Council resolutions or sanctions.

There are only three countries with any real leverage — the United States, China and South Korea — and none are doing all they could to nudge North Korea onto a less provocative course. Until they do, Security Council resolutions will remain a largely symbolic sideshow.

Last week's missile launches instantly complicated the security picture in Northeast Asia, but they violated no international law or treaty that would clearly justify mandatory penalties from the Security Council. (India tested a long-range nuclear-capable missile just yesterday.) Individual nations, particularly the three most influential ones, would do better to devise short-term penalties and longer-term incentives to persuade North Korea to forswear nuclear weapons and longer-range missiles.

The Bush administration should drop its reflexive opposition to direct talks. But before scheduling a meeting, Washington should call on North Korea to reinstate its moratorium on long-range missile tests and keep it in place for at least one year while talks on a permanent ban proceed.

Those direct talks should also include discussions on North Korea's nuclear weapons programs. Nearly a year ago, North Korea agreed in principle to give these up as part of an agreement with the United States, China, Russia, Japan and South Korea. Crucial details were never worked out because North Korea left the talks over unrelated banking sanctions the Bush administration announced last fall. Washington has refused to conduct direct negotiations on the banking sanctions.

Even if this gratuitous obstacle were removed, completing the nuclear talks would be difficult because North Korea wants civilian power reactors before it completes nuclear disarmament. Given North Korea's record of diverting nuclear material from civilian to military programs, it should have to demonstrate compliance with nonproliferation rules before building power reactors.

Pressure from China and South Korea may be required to get North Korea to agree to acceptable terms, and both countries should be signaling their willingness to apply such pressure by imposing short-term penalties for the missile tests. For China, the most effective signal would be a short-term suspension of oil shipments. South Korea could cancel this week's scheduled cabinet-level talks.

The most urgent objective for all three nations should be to convince North Korea to not test its long-range missile again. Preparations for a test are reported under way. The next goal should be to jump-start talks aimed at permanently ending North Korea's long-range missile and nuclear weapons programs.

West Woos Russia In Bid To Curb Iran N Programme (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, July 10, 2006

Western governments are stepping up their efforts to win Russian and Chinese backing for a tougher stance over Iran's nuclear programme in the run-up to the G8 summit next weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0038912

The latest indication came from the US, which at the weekend said it was willing to offer Moscow a deal on civil nuclear co-operation – as long as Russia provided more help in convincing Tehran to scale down its programme. The deal could allow Russia to make billions of dollars from storing nuclear waste from US-supplied reactors around the world.

"For agreement on peaceful co-operation to go forward, we will need Russia's active co-operation in blocking Iran's attempts to obtain nuclear weapons," a White House spokesman said.

Western officials acknowledge that North Korea's missile tests last week distracted international attention from Iran, while the international reaction underlined Moscow and China's reluctance to use United Nations sanctions to deter proliferation. Indications that Iran's nuclear programme may be faltering technically have also reduced the sense of urgency surrounding the case. At the heart of the controversy is uranium enrichment, a process that can produce both fuel and weapons grade material.

The US and the European Union, which fear that Tehran is coming closer to developing nuclear weapons, are focused on using the July 15-17 G8 summit in St Petersburg as the main source of pressure on Iran. Russia wants the summit to focus on energy security instead, while Iran, which insists its programme is purely peaceful, has said it will not reply until August.

"They want to get past an action-forcing deadline and the idea that the Americans have more leverage," says Mark Fitzpatrick, nuclear expert at London's International Institute for Strategic Studies. "So long as the Iranians haven't rejected [the international proposal for Iran to halt enrichment work], Russia and China will say there is no reason to go to the [UN] Security Council."

He adds that Iran's technical progress has also recently slowed, with a 164-centrifuge cascade – used to enrich uranium – not working well and plans for a second and third cascades delayed.

Western diplomats say they expect Ali Larijani, Tehran's top nuclear negotiator, to ask for clarifications on the international offer when he meets European officials tomorrow – but not to provide a definite response.

The EU will be looking for signs that Tehran is seriously considering the proposal – which includes economic and civil nuclear aid rather than just trying to spin the process out.

If the encounter with Mr Larijani proves frustrating for the Europeans, the EU and the US will seek to rally support from Russia and China at a foreign ministers' meeting in Paris for a tougher international line. This will set the tone for the G8 summit later in the week.

"The Iranians sometimes miscalculate the international mood," says a western diplomat. "The Russians don't want a big row at St Petersburg."

Analysts say Iran could eventually agree to take a temporary break with enrichment and allow talks with the permanent five UN Security Council members and Germany to begin.

It could then use the talks to argue that it should be allowed to maintain a small-scale UN-monitored enrichment programme.

Russia-U.S. Shift In Power Balance May Mold Summit (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

WASHINGTON -- The decision by the Bush administration to allow Russia to house spent nuclear fuel highlights a dynamic likely to shape this week's Group of Eight summit: the shifting power balance between a U.S. facing challenges on several fronts and a Russia moving to reassert itself on the world stage.

Less than a week before the summit of the G-8 leading industrial nations in St. Petersburg, the Bush administration's need for Russian support in political showdowns with Iran and North Korea is forcing the U.S. to accede to Russian demands on a range of issues. The White House already has quietly agreed to downgrade its standard pro-democracy push in the face of Russian President Vladimir Putin's refusal to make it a major focus of the gathering, and administration officials concede they are likely to bow to a range of other Russian demands over the course of the summit.

The moves represent an acknowledgment by the administration that on a variety of hot-button issues, the U.S. needs Russia more than Russia needs the U.S. The White House says it wants to use diplomacy to persuade Iran and North Korea to abandon their nuclear-weapons programs, but that approach depends heavily on Russian support at the United Nations and in continuing multination negotiations with the two countries. The U.S. also wants to ensure that Russia doesn't use its vast oil and natural-gas holdings as weapons in disputes with the fragile democracies in neighboring Georgia and Ukraine.

Russia has hinted it would be willing to offer at least conditional support to the American-led diplomatic initiatives over Iran and North Korea, but at a cost.

In a briefing late last week with American reporters, a top Putin aide, Igor Shuvalov, said Moscow hoped to win final U.S. approval for Russia's bid to enter the World Trade Organization during a bilateral summit between Messrs. Bush and Putin on the eve of the summit. Mr. Shuvalov also said Moscow wanted White House assurances that Russian firms would be able to freely invest in the U.S. without facing the kind of political scrutiny that derailed recent proposed acquisitions of U.S. assets by companies from China and the United Arab Emirates.

Administration officials said the decision to allow Russia to store spent nuclear fuel was meant as a further inducement to Mr. Putin, who has demanded for some time that Russia be given a larger piece of the lucrative business. The decision, reported Saturday by the Washington Post, is set to be announced after the bilateral meeting between the two leaders at the start of the summit, the officials said.

The deal is a reversal for the U.S., which has refused to allow Russia to store nuclear waste, because of Moscow's role in helping Iran build and run its first large-scale nuclear reactor. Another concern has been Russia's failure to provided good security for its nuclear facilities against accidents or possible theft.

The U.S. supplies much of the civilian nuclear fuel for global markets and continues to control that material when it is spent, even in foreign countries. Without an agreement with the U.S., no country receiving U.S. nuclear materials could send its spent fuel to Russia for storage.

Bush administration officials say they are hopeful that the agreement with Russia's demand will spur Mr. Putin to lend at least tacit support to any American efforts to impose sanctions on Iran or pass a U.N. Security Council resolution that could clear the way for possible military action against the country in the event of a crisis.

Still, the deal is certain to be a matter of debate on Capitol Hill, where anti-Russia sentiment is high because of Mr. Putin's crackdown on his country's media and political opposition. A U.S.-Russian accord on nuclear waste doesn't need congressional approval, but it could be blocked if both chambers vote to do so within 90 days of its signing.

"This is another example where the Russians have got to understand again that their continued autocracy ... should not be rewarded with an agreement that is probably more beneficial to them than to us," Sen. John McCain, (R., Ariz.), said on CBS's "Face the Nation." "It's time for some very tough talk with the Russians."

The Odd Couple (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, July 17, 2006

It was a grim week--with North Korea firing a batch of missiles as a warning to its adversaries, a standoff continuing with Iran over its nuclear program, and more bloody attacks in Iraq. But Russian leader Vladimir Putin couldn't resist needling President Bush last Thursday. Noting that it was Bush's 60th birthday, the Russian president passed along best wishes from the global labor leaders he had been hosting in the Kremlin that afternoon. Everyone wished the embattled American president well, Putin said, except the labor leaders from America. Both men laughed, but Bush aides saw a larger point. "They like and respect each other," said a senior adviser. "They have many strong disagreements, but they have a very good relationship."

Despite such towel-snapping moments, however, Bush has gotten more realistic about Putin since they first met in June 2001. That's when Bush famously declared that he had "looked the man in the eye ... and was able to get a sense of his soul"--concluding that Putin was "very straightforward and trustworthy" and committed to reform. Things haven't turned out quite that way, of course, and today Bush's assessment looks naive and certainly premature. U.S. policymakers admit as much. "Our views on Russia are very realistic now," says a senior administration official, who concedes that the administration's early hopes for a "strategic partnership" were unfounded. "We've stepped back," says the official.

Careful criticism. As Bush prepares to meet Putin this week at the annual conference of the Group of Eight industrialized democracies in St. Petersburg, the Russian leader's hometown, he is under pressure to condemn Putin's lurches toward autocracy. Among them: clamping down on dissent, asserting control of his country's television networks (story, Page 40), and intimidating his independent-minded neighbors by threatening to cut off energy supplies. Some critics, such as former Soviet dissident Natan Sharansky, urge Bush to criticize Putin's backsliding in a very dramatic way this week. Arizona Sen. John McCain has even suggested that Bush boycott the entire conference in St. Petersburg.

Bush never considered such a draconian step. But he is trying to find a way to thread the needle by expressing disapproval for Putin's excesses while at the same time winning Kremlin support for his key international objectives. "First of all," a senior U.S. official told U.S. News, "this isn't the Cold War. The world is changing. Russia is no longer a strategic adversary, nor is it a strategic threat to the United States. I think it's clear that cooperating with Russia can help us solve a number of issues that are important for American security and American economic prosperity." They include halting the spread of nuclear weapons, fighting terrorism, and promoting the peaceful use of nuclear energy. More urgently, Bush wants to secure long-term cooperation from Putin in pressuring Iran to abandon any nuclear weapons program. Russia, however, has been reluctant to back the stringent international sanctions that Bush wants. Another disappointment for White House officials is Russia's refusal to back strong sanctions against North Korea even after Pyongyang fired several test missiles last week.

Putin, for his part, wants to use this week's summit--the first time Russia has hosted the annual G-8 gathering--to gain legitimacy for his country as a major power. More pragmatically, he wants to promote Russian as a world-class energy exporter and gain support for his concept of a global nuclear energy partnership that would help Russia rebuild its nuclear industry.

President Bush has always placed a high premium on his personal relationships with other leaders. In Putin's case, not only has Bush exhibited trust in the Kremlin leader from the day they met, but he has tried to cultivate Putin with regular meetings around the world--18 so far--and frequent phone conversations. Bush even arranged a Putin visit to his ranch in Crawford, Texas, which Bush considers the top perquisite he can grant, since Prairie Chapel Ranch is his home. Bush believes his personal relationship with Putin will eventually pay off. "I don't necessarily agree with every decision he's made about what's happening inside of Russia," Bush told CNN's Larry King last week, "but it's very important for me to keep a good personal relationship with him so I can have good, candid discussions. But no leader wants to be lectured by somebody, no leader likes to be scolded publicly."

The question is whether Bush can parlay his relationship into something tangible in St. Petersburg. This remains unclear partly because of Russia's growing hubris. The administration has been concerned, for example, by Russia's threat to disrupt natural gas shipments to Ukraine and Georgia, putting pressure on the two young democracies led by politicians out of favor in Moscow. U.S. officials also complain about Moscow backing Aleksander Lukashenko, the dictator of Belarus, despite international pressure to stop his crackdown on opposition movements. Similarly, Russia is faulted for fostering separatist movements in the Georgian regions of South Ossetia and Abkhazia, and in Moldova.

Petro-power. Part of the reason for Russia's assertiveness is the nation's vast earnings from the high price of oil. Energy-rich Russia now has foreign reserves of about $230 billion, translating into a more confident Kremlin--what Russia scholar Dimitri Simes calls "petro-arrogance." The attitude among many Russian policymakers, says Simes, is, "All this democracy business is a charade--or, more precisely, a stick to attack Russia and Russian allies like Belarus."

Putin and his aides were particularly angry over Vice President Dick Cheney's tough speech in Vilnius, Lithuania, on May 4 in which he blasted Putin's regime for backsliding on democracy and seeking to "reverse the gains of the last decade." This has increased "anti-American spirit" in Russia, senior Kremlin official Igor Shuvalov said last week.

A senior U.S. official told U.S. News: "One of the things that we want to do ... is not to isolate Russia, and to bring it into organizations and institutions that are rules-based, that have certain standards, and try to do what we can to get the Russians to live up to those standards." That includes the G-8.

More broadly, Bush is trying to build new partnerships--with Russia and other nations--after a first term in which he was derided as a unilateralist, a cowboy, and a warmonger. U.S. officials admit that it's particularly important to form coalitions now because so many hot spots are boiling over and the United States can't deal with them alone.

Complicating matters is that Bush's allies in the Iraq war are dwindling. Italy's Silvio Berlusconi left office in early May after his party lost a national election. Spain's Jose Maria Aznar was thrown out amid rising opposition to his support for the war. British Prime Minister Tony Blair is leaving office before the next national election. Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi exits in September. One bright spot is in Germany, where Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, a fierce Bush critic, was pushed from office by voters earlier this year in favor of Angela Merkel, who favored better relations with the White House. Partly to cultivate Merkel, Bush will visit her in Merkel's home territory of Stralsund and Trinwillershagen before traveling to St. Petersburg.

The last thing Bush wants this week is a blowup that will revive his image as an arrogant Lone Ranger. So administration officials say the president will mostly make nice as he talks with his friend Vladimir and their counterparts amid the czarist palaces, churches, fountains, and other glories of Russia's imperial past.

Unreality Television (USNEWS)

By Sebastian Smith

U.S. News and World Report, July 10, 2006

When Russian journalists describe Vladimir Putin as the country's chief newsmaker, they're not exaggerating. It's not just that he's the president and attracts the expected attention--he also rules a Kremlin bureaucracy able to decide what is news.

Under Putin, Russia has experienced a dramatic rollback of media freedom, a sensitive issue as his fellow leaders of the Group of Eight major industrialized nations meet late this week in St. Petersburg. Freedom House, the U.S.-based human-rights group, ranks Russia 158th out of the 194 countries and territories for press freedom. It is urging the other G-8 leaders, the world's most powerful democratic figures, to press Putin for more open news media.

Before Putin took over in 2000, opposition voices were often heard on the three dominant television networks, particularly on the then privately owned NTV channel. There were hostile interviews with officials, merciless political satire shows, and investigations of what human-rights groups call Russia's dirty war in Chechnya. Today, NTV is owned by the state-run natural gas behemoth Gazprom, and its output differs little from that of the two big state-owned channels Rossiya and Channel One.

No criticism. A typical news broadcast on all three channels consists of showing Putin and government ministers hard at work, feel-good reports on life in the armed forces, and historical features related to the Soviet defeat of Nazi Germany. Opposition figures are rarely seen. The Center for Journalism in Extreme Situations, a leading Russian press freedom group, released a study in April that found that 91 percent of political news on Channel One was devoted to Putin and the "ruling powers." Nearly three quarters of that coverage was positive, a quarter neutral--none of it critical.

Newspapers are relatively freer, and a few, such as the daily Kommersant, are boldly critical. The Internet, where accessible, is a growing source for news. But in the world's biggest country, television is everything in shaping opinion. State-run channels, accessible to anyone with a TV, reach more than 90 percent of the 143 million population, while nontabloid newspapers rarely manage circulations of more than 100,000. (Recently, authorities have pressured radio stations to stop carrying news from Voice of America and Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty.)

The result is a country where debate is so stifled that formal censorship becomes unnecessary, says the Carnegie Moscow Center's Masha Lipman. "The Kremlin has been pretty sophisticated in dealing with the media," she says. "It's about ensuring that big media managers are loyal, then leaving some of the small outlets free to let off steam, while ensuring they remain irrelevant." What appears on television "is a product of close cooperation between Kremlin aides and the TV network managers," she adds. "Access to information, or the ability to hold a government official to account--this doesn't exist."

Defenders of Kremlin policy flatly deny there is a problem. And mirroring arguments used by Moscow to defend against criticism of issues such as human rights, they throw the accusation back at what they view as a hypocritical West. Vladislav Surkov, a Kremlin official often seen as Putin's eminence grise, told reporters last month that alleged bias in the media's coverage of opposition figures was "a matter of taste."

Margarita Simonyan, editor-in-chief of the state's new 24-hour English-language channel Russia Today, agrees. "The state channels show the president of Russia. That is because state television should tell the people what the state is doing," she says. "I look at CNN and they constantly show [President George W.] Bush. And not only CNN. Why should Russia's president be less interesting?"

Simonyan and other Kremlin loyalists argue that Putin's breaking of private media empires since 2000 merely stopped businessmen from using television and newspapers to impose their own views. The perception that there was freedom of the press in the 1990s before Putin "is a cliche that does not correspond to reality," says Kremlin-connected political analyst Gleb Pavlovsky.

"Managed democracy." History shows that Pavlovsky is partly right. The media barons of the 1990s were key in President Boris Yeltsin's uphill re-election of 1996. Their outlets covered up stories about Yeltsin's ill health and fueled scaremongering about his Communist challenger. But where Yeltsin struck bargains with the media, Putin has simply taken control, extending his hallmark strategy of "managed democracy" from the ballot box to the TV set and printing press.

There has not been outright nationalization. Rather, media ownership has passed into the hands of Kremlin-friendly businesses like Gazprom, which also owns the formerly heavyweight, now increasingly bland newspaper Izvestia. Other well-known newspapers owned by or linked to Kremlin-connected businessmen include Nezavisimaya Gazeta, Argumenty i Fakti, and Vremya Novostei.

There are notable exceptions, including Kommersant and Vedomosti, a business newspaper partly owned by the Financial Times and the Wall Street Journal. With its hard-hitting interviews and balanced news coverage, Gazprom-owned Echo Moskvy radio is considered the standard-bearer for freedom in the electronic media. But Sergei Parkhomenko, a star of the post-Soviet media scene who was forced from his job as editor of the independent Itogi magazine in 2001, warns that outlets like Echo Moskvy or Kommersant are just window dressing. "If anything in Russia is not under government control, that's because the government has decided that it doesn't need to control that yet," he says. "The moment they want to close Vedomosti or Kommersant, they will."

And at the heart of this taming of the Fourth Estate, argues Parkhomenko, is a phenomenon running much deeper than Putin's urge to control. "The most important thing is that society doesn't support the journalists," he says. "Society doesn't demand information. We got freedom of speech as a gift in the 1990s. It just fell from the sky. But people quietly let it go, and now they struggle to remember they ever needed it."

It's a view ratified by Nikolai Svanidze, a leading anchor on Rossiya, who said in June that viewers were "tired of pluralism." "Our guests from the United States and European countries may not understand what I'm talking about," Svanidze said, "but the classic Soviet viewer is not used to alternatives. It's tiring to have a choice because you have to think."

What's Bad For Putin Is Best For Russians (NYT)

By Garry Kasparov

Moscow - When observing the West's conciliatory dealings with Russia, I'm reminded of a quotation often attributed to Winston Churchill: "However beautiful the strategy, you should occasionally look at the results."

For five years, President Bush has been talking about maintaining an open dialogue with Russia's president, Vladimir Putin, and about how hard he has worked to convince the Russian leader that "it's in his interest to adopt Western-style values and universal values." This sounds reasonable, but we don't have to go on theory. There's a track record — one that clearly shows that persuasion and appeasement toward Russia have failed.

It is long past time for Western leaders to take a tougher stand if they want their rhetoric about democracy to be credible. A perfect opportunity awaits at this week's meeting of the Group of 7 leaders in St. Petersburg. I say "Group of 7" rather than "Group of 8" because I continue to hope that the West will find its collective backbone and make Russia's participation contingent on its actually being a democracy.

The St. Petersburg meeting offers the visiting heads of state a chance to see for themselves how bad things here have become. The right of Russians to elect their governors and parliamentary representatives is steadily eroding, with more and more influence accruing to the executive. Even Aleksandr Veshnyakov, the chairman of the Central Electoral Commission who has rubber-stamped the results of every election under President Putin, recently said that if all the new legislation proposed by Mr. Putin's United Russia Party were passed, elections here "would be a farce." Opposition activists and journalists are routinely arrested and interrogated. The Kremlin, in complete control of the judiciary, loots private businesses and then uses state-controlled companies to launder the money abroad.

Mr. Bush and Europe's leaders apparently believe it is best to disregard such unpleasantness for the sake of receiving Russia's cooperation on security and energy. This cynical and morally repugnant stance has also proven ineffective. Just as in the old days, Moscow has become an ally for troublemakers and anti-democratic rulers around the world. Nuclear aid to Iran, missile technology to North Korea, military aircraft to Sudan, Myanmar and Venezuela, and a budding friendship with Hamas: these are the West's rewards for keeping its mouth shut about human rights in Russia.

It's time to stop pretending that the Kremlin shares the free world's interests. The high energy prices the Putin administration requires to keep its hold on power are driven by the tensions that come with every North Korean missile launching and Iranian nuclear threat. It's no surprise that Russia continues to block United Nations sanctions against these rogue states. The mystery is why the West continues to treat Russia like an ally.

Tomorrow and Wednesday, State Department representatives are scheduled to attend the Other Russia conference in Moscow. Organized by the opposition umbrella group of which I am a founder, the conference will bring together politicians and nongovernmental organizations from all over Russia and from every part of its political spectrum.

The primary aim of the conference is to document our national crisis for the Russian government, the Russian people and the widest possible international audience. It is equally important to discuss what is to be done and to make it clear that it is not too late. Our citizens must refuse to be bought off with a fleeting oil windfall and the false impression of a return to superpower status. Western leaders must live up to their rhetoric about human rights by stating in no uncertain terms that Russia's status as a trading partner, security ally and G-8 member are all at risk if the country continues its slide into dictatorship.

Just days ago, dozens of activists en route to Moscow to attend the conference were arrested, some beaten. Possession of opposition literature is being defined as an attempt to "overthrow constitutional order." Will the Western delegations sit silently? Will the American president say nothing?

Perhaps silence is the best option if the most Mr. Bush has to offer are weak expressions of concern and remarks about his personal relationship with Mr. Putin. President Ronald Reagan's hard public line on the Soviet Union let us know that someone out there was aware of our predicament and was fighting for us. Now this American president seems to be saying that Iraqis and Afghans are deserving of democracy, but Russians are not.

The darkest days of Communist rule are now a generation behind us. Between the end of the Communist dictatorship and the crackdown under President Putin, there was a period of freedom. It was brief and it was flawed, but it could have served as a foundation for a democratic Russia. Since 2000, however, Mr. Putin has done everything possible to dismantle that fragile edifice. In dealing with Russia, please don't confuse what's good for the Putin regime with what's best for the Russian people.

Garry Kasparov is the co-chairman of the All-Russia Civil Congress and the chairman of the United Civil Front of Russia.

The Democracy Backlash (WP)

By Fred Hiatt

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

When communism collapsed in 1991, no one expected democracy to triumph everywhere and instantly. But no one expected the other side to fight back, either. After all, what was "the other side"?

Yet when President Vladimir Putin hosts the first summit of Group of Eight leaders in Russia this week, the most notable thing won't be that his country has failed to become the consolidated democracy that the G-7 countries expected when they invited Russia to join a decade ago. What will be remarkable -- but has been little remarked on -- is that Putin has become a leader and an emblem of an active movement to combat the spread of democracy.

"What seems to be the case," Sen. Richard Lugar (R-Ind.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, told me, "is that governments that are authoritarian have decided to fight back."

Lugar chaired a hearing last month on "The Backlash Against Democracy Assistance," which is the title of a report he commissioned from the National Endowment for Democracy, a private, federally funded organization created in 1983 to promote democratic institutions around the world. The organization found the backlash to be most pronounced in what Carl Gershman,

NED's president, calls "hybrid regimes": autocracies that maintain some nominally democratic processes, usually including elections, and that generally claim to be democracies.

Many of these regimes tolerated civic groups promoting freedom and human rights during the 1990s and allowed them to receive help from democracy promoters in the United States and other nations. But after the Rose Revolution swept away the corrupt regime of Eduard Shevardnadze in Georgia, followed by the Orange Revolution in Ukraine, Putin and other leaders decided they could no longer take any chances.

They concluded, Gershman said in a recent talk, that, as Abraham Lincoln noted in a different context, "a government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free." And so they accelerated their harassment of civic groups, radio stations, political parties and any other independent voices -- with arbitrary detentions, visa bans, impossible funding rules, intrusive registration requirements and more.

For the most part, the regimes claim that these measures are aimed only at protecting state sovereignty, defeating terrorism or countering espionage. That's good news, in a funny way; most of them still feel compelled to describe themselves as democrats. Even now there is no "other side," ideologically speaking.

But it also makes the measures difficult to combat. Post reporter Peter Finn's account last week of how the Kremlin has eliminated Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty broadcasts from most Russian radio stations without formally banning the programming -- instead harassing, insinuating and threatening to revoke licenses -- provides a good example.

And the rebounding dictators are learning from each other. In January Putin signed legislation regulating nongovernmental organizations that will give 30,000 bureaucrats the option of revoking the registration of any troublesome group. Now Hugo Chavez in Venezuela and Robert Mugabe in Zimbabwe are pushing similar legislation. China reportedly sent researchers to Uzbekistan and other former Soviet states to compare notes on democracy countermeasures; meanwhile, Belarus's dictator, Alexander Lukashenko, "reportedly acquired China's latest internet monitoring and control technology while in Beijing in December 2005," NED reported.

The man who helped provoke all this -- Georgia's democratic president, Mikheil Saakashvili -- was in Washington last week warning that Putin and his ilk may be interested in more than defense; they may want to roll back democracy in Georgia, Ukraine and beyond. Bush, who spent two hours with the Georgian, appears to understand this.

Putin is, in fact, working hard to undermine democratic Georgia, a nation of fewer than 5 million people bordering Russia on the south. He has banned imports of Georgian produce, wine and mineral water; he is manipulating secessionists inside the country. Saakashvili's success in promoting economic growth and diminishing corruption may be too dangerous an example for Putin to abide.

A key question for this week will be whether the G-7 leaders make clear that undermining neighboring democracies is not an acceptable policy. France and Germany will be reluctant to allow principle to interfere with commercial interests, which lie with Russia, not some tiny nation to the south. So it will be up to Bush.

Saakashvili seemed to be delivering just such a message when he handed Bush a photocopy of a 1936 letter his government had discovered in the KGB archives. The letter, handwritten by leaders of fiercely independent people of the mountainous Khevsureti region, was addressed to the "Great American Government." It bewailed the encroaching Bolsheviks, who were forcing the locals onto collective farms and preventing them from practicing their religion.

"We won't surrender as long as a single Georgian in Khevsureti is alive," they wrote. "We'll defend ourselves with swords and daggers. . . . We hope you will help us. You are the only ones who can . . . ."

The letter never reached Franklin Roosevelt, of course, and all its signatories were promptly murdered by the KGB (then known as the NKVD).

Times have changed, thank goodness. But history hasn't ended, and the spread of democracy still can't be put on autopilot.

Iran Asks IAEA To Remove Chief Inspector (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, July 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038919

Iran has asked the International Atomic Energy Agency to remove the head of the inspection team probing Tehran's nuclear program, U.N. officials said Sunday.

The inspector, Chris Charlier, has not been back to Iran since April because of Iranian displeasure with his work, the officials said.

However, Charlier remains the head of the team, they said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the issue was confidential.

The German newspaper Welt am Sonntag reported Sunday that Charlier had been removed from his post and assigned to other duties. It quoted him as saying he believes Iran is operating a clandestine nuclear program and suggested it was linked to weapons.

IAEA spokespeople in Vienna, Austria, declined comment Sunday.

Charlier, 61, has previously complained publicly that Iranian constraints made inspection work there difficult.

Tehran denies it is interested in nuclear weapons but revelations of past clandestine activities and finds of documents linked to warheads, along with its insistence on carrying out uranium enrichment, have heightened international suspicions.

Meanwhile, Tehran warned the Group of Eight Sunday against making any decisions on Iran's nuclear program without consulting it first.

"Any (G-8) summit decision on Iran — if premature and incomplete — could harm the current positive trend of negotiations," Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said, referring to talks with the European Union about an incentives package offered to Iran to end the impasse over its nuclear program.

"The G-8 summit won't be comprehensive without Iran's participation and opinion," Mottaki said of the gathering by the leaders of the world's largest economies that is scheduled to open Saturday in St. Petersburg, Russia.

EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana and top Iran nuclear envoy Ali Larijani met in Brussels, Belgium, last week. A formal meeting is scheduled for Tuesday.

On Sunday, Mottaki reiterated that Iran would give a formal response to the offer by the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council and Germany next month. He hinted that Tehran planned to negotiate some aspects of the package first.

The West wants Iran to respond to the incentives before the G-8 summit.

Bush's Shift: Being Patient With Foes (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

WASHINGTON, July 9 — President Bush has never made apologies for enshrining pre-emption as the defining doctrine of his first term. He has declared many times that in a post-9/11 world, presidents no longer have the luxury of waiting for the slow grinding of diplomatic give-and-take when unpredictable dictators are assembling arsenals that could threaten the United States.

But as he leaves for Europe and Russia this week, where the simultaneous nuclear standoffs in Iran and North Korea will top the agenda, Mr. Bush finds himself struggling to square his muscular declarations with the realpolitik of his second term after the invasion of Iraq. At every turn, and every provocation, he finds himself in an unaccustomed position: urging patience.

"These problems didn't rise overnight, and they don't get solved overnight," he told reporters during an hourlong news conference in Chicago on Friday. At another point, he said: "You know, the problem with diplomacy, it takes a while to get something done. If you're acting alone, you can move quickly." Underscoring the idea again, he said, "It's painful in a way for some to watch because it takes a while to get people on the same page."

The Chicago news conference was notable because it seemed to mark the completion of a rhetorical journey for Mr. Bush. It is a journey that has steadily moved away, in public pronouncements — if not the president's own thinking — from the lines he drew in the 2002 State of the Union address. In that famous "axis of evil" speech, he identified the threats from Iraq, Iran and North Korea as the three most pressing post-9/11 challenges facing the United States.

"We'll be deliberate, yet time is not on our side," he said in one of the most-quoted passages of what became the signature speech of his administration. "I will not wait on events, while dangers gather. I will not stand by, as peril draws closer and closer.

The United States of America will not permit the world's most dangerous regimes to threaten us with the world's most destructive weapons."

Yet to some conservatives who backed Mr. Bush's decision in Iraq, "standing by and waiting" is the essence of Mr. Bush's current strategy.

Nicholas Eberstadt of the American Enterprise Institute wrote in The Wall Street Journal after North Korea's missile tests last week that North Korea had achieved more "strategic successes" under the Bush administration than it had under President Clinton.

"Apparently unwilling to move against North Korea's nuclear challenges by itself, and evidently incapable of fashioning a practical response involving allies and others, the Bush administration's response to Pyongyang's atomic provocations is today principally characterized by renewed calls for additional rounds of toothless conference diplomacy," he wrote.

This weekend in The Weekly Standard, William Kristol, another prominent conservative voice, wrote: "The red lines, pink lines, and mauve lines of U.S. foreign policy seem increasingly to be written in erasable ink. What was 'unacceptable' to President Bush a week ago (a North Korean missile launch) has been accepted." He called the current policy "Clintonian."

Mr. Bush's aides, who decline to speak about their internal deliberations on North Korea and Iran for attribution, say their critics have done everything but describe a workable alternative. Iran, they note, is five or more years from a nuclear weapon — and, in their more candid moments, they acknowledge that it has numerous options for retaliating for any military action.

A military attack on North Korea's missile pads, they say, has always been regarded as an unacceptable risk — even before American forces were tied up on the other side of the world. That is why they were so quick to dismiss a call two weeks ago by President Clinton's defense secretary, William Perry, and his top aide on nuclear issues, Ashton B. Carter of Harvard, to conduct a lightning, precision strike on North Korea's Taepodong 2 long-range missile before it could be tested.

"It sounds good," one of Mr. Bush's national security aides said at the time, "until you ask yourself the question, what good is a strike if it leaves their nuclear capability untouched?"

To Mr. Bush's critics, the question goes to the heart of the new argument over pre-emption: whether Mr. Bush, in focusing on Iraq in 2003, missed his chance. It was in January of that year, as American forces were flowing toward the Middle East, that North Korea threw out the international inspectors who had been watching over its stockpile of nuclear fuel, and withdrew from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

The action did not have the drama of a multiple-missile launchings. But unlike the test-firings, it was a clearer violation of international law. (Any country has a right to exit the treaty with 90 days' notice, but the North evicted the inspectors before that period expired.)

But Mr. Bush made no effort then to seek sanctions at the United Nations Security Council, or to rally China and Russia to impose economic sanctions. One senior former official who was involved in the discussions said Mr. Bush was briefed on his military options to strike at the nuclear facilities before the spent fuel rods were moved — but the options looked bad, and he turned back to the Iraq invasion plan.

Administration officials still defend that decision, saying that Saddam Hussein lived in a more volatile neighborhood and needed to be dealt with first. But as one senior American diplomat who was involved in the Iraq decision conceded late last week, "The decisions we made then narrowed our options now."

In short, Mr. Bush is discovering the limits of his own pre-emption doctrine — and the frustrations of its alternative. He knows, aides say, that even to hint at military action or deadlines if Iran refuses to suspend enriching uranium, or if North Korea continues to test missiles and make bomb fuel, would probably destroy any chance of getting China and Russia aboard on a common strategy.

But failing to lay out the consequences clearly — the kind of straight talk Mr. Bush used to say distinguished his administration's foreign policy — may embolden Iran and North Korea to try to run out the clock, produce more nuclear material and hope for a better deal with the next president.

India Reports A Long-Range Missile Test (NYT)

By Hari Kumar And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

NEW DELHI, July 9 — India test-fired its longest-range nuclear-capable missile on Sunday for the first time, government officials said. But although the missile was launched, it was unclear whether the entire test was successful, with at least one report saying that the missile had failed at some point in its flight.

The launching has occurred at a time of rising international tension over North Korea's recent missile tests, and as the United States Congress is considering a civilian nuclear pact that the Bush administration negotiated with India.

While the pact does not concern missile tests or other military activity, its critics say the Bush administration failed to obtain any commitment from India to stop producing new nuclear weapons fuel, or to restrict its production of new weapons. The test of the Agni 3 missile (agni means fire in Hindi) appeared intended to show that India's strategic arsenal could reach far beyond Pakistan and cover territory including China.

The missile is reported to have a range of more than 1,800 miles. The Defense Ministry said it had been launched from Wheeler Island, off the coast of Orissa State in the Bay of Bengal, and had taken off successfully.

But later, the Press Trust of India news agency quoted an unidentified military official as saying that the missile had developed troubles, perhaps in the firing of its second stage, and had not completed the test successfully.

A Defense Ministry spokesman, Sitanshu Kar, would not comment on the report other than to say, "The missile took off successfully, and the rest of the data need to be analyzed, in a day or two, to come to a conclusion."

India and neighboring Pakistan have often traded rounds of missile and nuclear tests in times of tension between them. But relations between the nations have improved lately, and the governments have a standing agreement to inform each other before such tests. On Sunday, the Pakistani Foreign Ministry confirmed that India had told it about the test in advance.

While short-range missiles are enough to keep India and Pakistan in mutual range, analysts have seen India's development of long-range ballistic missiles, and the continuing development of its nuclear weapons program, as a strategic step to keep China in check. The listed range of the Agni 3, hundreds of miles longer than that of other missiles India has tested, would put more of China's major cities within striking distance.

In the past two years, tensions between India and China have lessened somewhat, and direct border trade between them reopened last week along the storied Silk Road through the Himalayas for the first time since they fought a war 44 years ago.

The BBC reported that before the launching on Sunday, India had twice postponed tests on the Agni 3, once for technical reasons and once because of concern about the international response while it was trying to seal its civilian nuclear deal with the Bush administration. In May, the Indian defense minister, Pranab Mukherjee, was quoted as saying that the missile was ready but that India was observing "self-imposed restraint" before testing.

The nuclear deal between India and the United States is under review by Congress and would, in effect, remove all United States restrictions on nuclear trade with India that are in place because India has refused to sign the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. The only other countries to refuse are Israel and Pakistan. North Korea withdrew from the treaty three years ago.

Under the deal, the United States would give vital help to the Indian civilian nuclear program, including uranium for fuel for civilian reactors. The United States would not provide any fuel for Indian weapons, but critics have pointed out that it would essentially free the limited Indian uranium supplies for weapons production. The agreement contains no restriction on how much or how fast India could increase the size of its nuclear arsenal.

Upping The Ante In Gaza (USNEWS)

By Larry Derfner

U.S. News and World Report, July 10, 2006

Hitkansut is a buzzword that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert introduced into the Israeli political lexicon. It means, in the government's translation, "realignment," shorthand for Olmert's ambitious goal of withdrawal from most of the West Bank in order to secure Israelis behind a protective barrier.

But that word hasn't been heard much lately. And the future of Olmert's plan--the centerpiece of his election win--now rests on his handling of the growing political crisis sparked by Palestinian militants' kidnapping of Israeli Army Cpl. Gilad Shalit and the escalating military conflict that has drawn Israeli forces back into Gaza.

Last summer's Israeli withdrawal from Gaza--which its architect, then Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, dubbed hitnatkut, or disengagement--was meant to be the successful precedent for a far-reaching unilateral pullout from the West Bank to finally remove Israeli soldiers and settlers from the Palestinians' midst. But success in Gaza, from Israel's viewpoint, means peace and quiet for Israelis living close to Gaza's borders. And that hasn't happened. Since the last Israeli soldier left Gaza 10 months ago, following the 8,500 settlers whom the Army forcibly removed from their homes, Palestinian militants have used the territory to fire wildly inaccurate Kassam rockets at residents in Israeli border towns.

As Israel stepped up its jet bombings and cross-border tank shelling against the militants, killing dozens of Palestinian fighters and civilians, the militants fired off more Kassams and issued still more threats. In late June, several guerrillas, including members of the Palestinian Authority's ruling Hamas movement, tunneled about half a mile from Gaza to the Israeli side of the border. On June 25, the guerrillas climbed out, killed two tank-crew members at an Army post, and kidnapped a third, Corporal Shalit.

Gaza redux. This meant Israeli soldiers were headed back onto the sands of Gaza. Suddenly, Sharon's disengagement didn't seem as safe and sure as it did last summer. And Olmert's realignment plan--which would put Israel's Ben-Gurion International Airport and several Tel Aviv suburbs within Kassam range of West Bank militants unhindered by the presence of the Israeli Army--was recast as a risky proposition. "We said this was going to happen; they're firing rockets from Elei Sinai," said an off-duty Army major who evacuated from the former Elei Sinai settlement in northern Gaza, which is now a landscape of worthless rubble. A 7-foot-long Kassam rocket had just landed harmlessly in an open field about 200 yards from a protest tent camp that is now home to the major and some of his former neighbors, some 3 miles from Elei Sinai. A few days after the major uttered those words, Israeli troops swept back into the destroyed settlement and two others nearby to root out the Kassam threat.

A survey by Israel's leading pollster, Mina Tsemach, showed that Olmert's popularity and that of his centrist Kadima (Forward) party has been hurt, as has that of Kadima's liberal Labor Party coalition partner. The public is now more divided over realignment. In both the cabinet and the Knesset, some of Olmert's allies are starting to break ranks over the plan. "There is no point in giving West Bank land and receiving nothing in return," Kadima cabinet minister Meir Sheetrit told the Jerusalem Post, warning that cities in central Israel could come under attack.

This is the right-wing opposition's strongest argument against Olmert's long-term plan. With Kassams now beginning to fall in Ashkelon, a coastal city of 120,000 about 8 miles northeast of Gaza, Hanan Kristal, a leading Israeli political analyst, says, "This argument is now much easier to sell to the public." If Olmert and his inexperienced defense minister, Labor Party leader Amir Peretz, do not establish their leadership credentials by getting the upper hand on the Palestinian attacks, Kristal says, "they will not have the political stature to carry out the realignment. This is their first test, and if they don't pass it, they could effectively become lame ducks."

The test includes two daunting challenges: to silence the rockets, and to win the release of Shalit, without giving in to the militants' demands for a large-scale release of Israel's Palestinian prisoners, who number over 9,000. Israel holds the overwhelming military edge, but Palestinian guerrillas have smuggled vast stores of arms from Egypt into Gaza since the Israeli Army left the territory. For now, this is the realignment that really matters.

Sharon's Shadow (NSWK)

By Dan Ephron And Christopher Dickey

Newsweek, July 10, 2006

Ehud Olmert's voice quavered as he spoke at the U.S. Embassy's Fourth of July party last week. Behind the Israeli prime minister was an American flag made of colored balloons. The cocktail-sipping crowd on the lawn grew quiet. Olmert had shown no overt sign of stress, but people were watching. Days before, Palestinians from Gaza had captured an Israeli soldier. Now a Qassam rocket fired by the guerrilla wing of Hamas had hit the Israeli city of Ashkelon. Still, even in the wet heat of a Tel Aviv summer, Olmert looked cool in his dark suit and striped tie, until he mentioned his predecessor, Ariel Sharon.

As he began his remarks in Hebrew, Olmert recalled that Sharon had stood on the same dais just one year earlier, and that it had been only six months since a massive stroke plunged the legendary general turned politician into a coma. Olmert's voice seemed to crack as he wished aloud that Sharon might come back to be his old self again.

It was a sentimental and suggestive moment. As the crisis continues to grow, the question comes up often: "What would Sharon have done?" The answers are different and contradictory. "I don't know," says Mark Heller, a political scientist at the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies, "but I'm pretty sure people would have felt a lot more comfortable with whatever it was. It's not that anyone is saying there's an obvious alternative to what Olmert is doing. It's more a matter of inspiring confidence."

Although Olmert always wanted this job, not many Israelis ever expected he would get it. "He's fully aware of the accidental nature of the way he came to this position," says a political peer who prefers not to be seen as betraying a friend's confidence. Olmert had been mayor of Jerusalem, but he was not a popular figure in the Likud Party. When Sharon decided on the bold move of evacuating Jewish settlers from Gaza, however, he picked Olmert as his deputy. When Sharon started a new party to support his disengagement policy, Olmert was the first to join. When Sharon suffered his stroke, Olmert became acting prime minister, then took the position outright in elections. "Winning the lottery would have been easier," says Yossi Sarid, former head of the left-wing Meretz Party. "He was in the right place at the right time."

But now Olmert needs more than luck and his well-honed political skills: he needs the kind of credibility that Sharon had developed with the Israeli people and, perhaps most important, with the increasingly impatient Israeli military. Neither Olmert nor his Defense minister, Labor Party leader Amir Peretz, had serious command experience during their mandatory military service. Sharon took big risks in war, and ultimately in peace. Sharon was "a strong man whose toughest decision was to take Israel out of Gaza," says historian Tom Segev. "What is finally coming out of it is more suffering, more refugees and more hatred." And with Sharon out of the picture, Olmert is left to take responsibility, or blame, for the consequences.

Frictions between Olmert and his generals were growing well before Palestinian guerrillas managed to capture Cpl. Gilad Shalit on June 25. The problem was the cobbled-together rockets being lobbed from Gaza into Israel. They were crude but dangerous, and their range was extending. "It was clear we would be going into Gaza," says a senior Israeli military source, who insisted on anonymity because he is officially prohibited from talking to the press. "We knew this months ago, with or without Olmert. This isn't a quesion of making decisions on a political level. The writing was on the wall."

But if Olmert saw that writing, he saw other messages as well. "This is a highly complicated struggle—the terror struggle on the ground, the struggle to maintain the moral high ground in world opinion and the struggle to keep internal unity," says one of Olmert's close associates, who consults with him regularly and didn't want to compromise the relationship by being named. "There's a clear contradiction between the immediate tactical needs and the long-term objectives." Gaza's population is densely packed and very young. When school lets out, its streets are rivers of children. The closer Israeli troops move into the towns, the greater the risks of horrific civilian casualties and global outrage.

So when Shalit was captured, Olmert approved military tactics meant to put enormous pressure on the Hamas leadership, even if it meant suffering for thousands of people. Power stations were knocked out, bridges blasted apart. Sonic booms rattled windows and nerves night after night. "I want nobody to sleep at night in Gaza," Olmert said. "I want them to know what it's like." Hamas cabinet members and legislators in the West Bank were arrested. European governments protested. But no civilian casualties were reported. "People are saying it's uncomfortable," Olmert told the cabinet. "It will be uncomfortable. Nobody dies from being uncomfortable."

Then the rocket hit Ashkelon, seven miles north of the Gaza border. No one there was hurt. It blasted a large hole in the yard of a high school. But when Olmert addressed the Fourth of July party two hours later, he spoke as if a corner had been turned, not only in the fight with the Palestinians but in the struggle with the military. He predicted "unprecedented and far-reaching consequences," and the Israeli tanks that had been poised on the northern edge of Gaza began to roll. Within three days, at least 40 Palestinians, including a mother and her two children, were killed in the fighting. One Israeli soldier also lost his life in what may have been a friendly-fire incident. Hamas talked of a truce. But the captured corporal remained a prisoner. And at least 12 more Qassam rockets were launched.

Hamas, too, is watching the dynamic between Olmert and his military. "Olmert can engage in negotiations only if the generals recommend that to him," Hamas legislator Mahmoud Ar-Ramahi told NEWSWEEK, "and so far these generals prefer not to enter into negotiations over the Israeli soldier ... In their mind, striking a deal with the captors of the soldier will strengthen Hamas."

"I think we have no choice but to conduct a massive operation in Gaza, to recapture the area for a week or two, arrest a lot of people and get out," says Yuval Steinitz, a Likud member of the Knesset and chairman of the subcommittee on defense and counterterrorism. "I can tell you Sharon did exactly those things. He also hesitated a bit, but eventually ... isolated Arafat even though he was an elected leader and a Nobel Prize winner." Steinitz would like to see the whole Hamas government brought down. "We should make it so difficult and horrible for the Palestinians until it's clear they cannot continue with this terrorist government."

And then? Olmert has staked his political future, as Sharon had, on the success of unilateral disengagement—with pullouts planned from parts of the West Bank as well as Gaza. Now that's on hold. A policy of unilateral action that requires repeated incursions by Israeli troops is not a viable long-term option. "There is no way to defeat Hamas without a Palestinian partner," says Ephraim Sneh, a Labor Party lawmaker and retired general. "Defeating Hamas doesn't take an overnight operation. It's a process that is military, political, economic and cultural."

But Olmert faces a strategic problem. Not only does he have no partner in peace, as he often says, he has no partner in war. The would-be peacemaker, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, has been relegated to a role as spectator. And the breakdown of law and order in Gaza is such that the elimination of the Hamas government could mean the elimination of all government—with a likely increase in the influence of both Iran and Al Qaeda.

What's needed is a break with the past, says historian Segev. "It has never worked to punish a population, because Palestinians are as patriotic as Israelis and they say to themselves, 'We won't go down on our knees.' The Palestinians have nothing to lose, and we have never been able to understand that." If Olmert can bring calm out of this crisis, he will emerge as a leader in his own right. If not, chaos and violence will only serve, as they have so often in the past, to create nostalgia for leaders long gone.

Israel Vows To Fight Until Soldier's Release, And Palestinians Mourn Their Dead (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

GAZA, July 9 — Israel will continue its military offensive in the Gaza Strip at its own pace until Palestinian militants release a captured Israeli soldier and halt their rocket attacks, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told his cabinet on Sunday.

The operation in Gaza is a "war for which it is impossible to set a timetable," Mr. Olmert said, according to briefings provided by an Israeli official. "We will continue this battle with level-headedness and patience, while making use of the proper means," he is reported to have said. "We cannot sit and not respond to the Qassam rocket fire."

Mr. Olmert ruled out negotiations with Hamas, which leads the Palestinian government and whose military branch is holding Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who was abducted during a raid into Israel on June 25.

He said he had been prepared to release prisoners to Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority, before the two men met for a formal meeting, and Mr. Abbas confirmed that on Friday. But Mr. Olmert said Sunday, "We intended to release them to moderate elements, not terrorist elements." Releasing prisoners to Hamas in response to a kidnapping would further damage Palestinian moderates and reward extremism, Mr. Olmert said.

He repeated to the cabinet that Israel would not reoccupy Gaza but would act militarily there as it saw fit. "We will operate, enter and pull out as needed," the official quoted Mr. Olmert as saying.

Maj. Gen. Yoav Galant, commander of Israel's southern region, said late Saturday that Israel was ready for a long campaign, planning to shift the focus of operations from place to place. "We are prepared to continue the operation a month, two months and, if need be, even more," he told Channel 2 television. "The Palestinians will do their reckoning. They will count hundreds of dead terrorists, they will count the damaged infrastructure, the destroyed offices, the damaged factories."

On Sunday, the Palestinians counted more dead, even as they mourned and buried four people, including three from the same family, killed Saturday night in the Shijaia neighborhood, near the Karni commercial crossing, in an explosion at a house. The Palestinians blamed Israel.

But Israel said that its investigation showed that the explosion did not come from an airstrike, and that intelligence reports later showed that the deaths had been caused by a Palestinian anti-tank rocket.

Capt. Jacob Dallal, a spokesman for the military, said the Israeli Air Force, which tracks its missiles carefully, reported that its missile "hit the intended target," which was a nearby street where armed militants were walking with weapons. He said the army did not know what happened to those men, but "we hit the area we targeted, not the house."

An Israeli military official said intelligence information developed later, presumably from a source within Gaza, "clearly says that it was a Palestinian anti-tank missile." The military official insisted on not being identified and said he could not be more specific.

On Sunday, a Palestinian civilian was killed by an Israeli missile fired at a car carrying Hamas militants in the southern town of Rafah. The militants apparently escaped from the car, and a second missile hit nearby, wounding bystanders. The dead man was identified as Bilal Sliman Rabah, an 18-year-old supermarket clerk. Seven other Palestinians were wounded, with one in very serious condition, hospital authorities said.

Earlier Sunday, just after midnight, the air force struck a group of armed militants near the Karni commercial crossing, wounding three, members of the Palestinian security forces said.

Airstrikes also destroyed a major bridge in Beit Hanun, in northern Gaza, and an electricity transformer there, making it difficult to travel easily to the city and cutting electricity and some water supplies.

Palestinians continued to fire Qassam rockets into Israel despite the military operation. One resident of the nearby Israeli town of Sderot was moderately wounded Sunday morning from shrapnel wounds to the chest when a Qassam hit. A second rocket hit a house, and three people were treated for shock.

Three of the four Palestinians killed Saturday in the house explosion were members of the Hajaj family — Um Ayman Hajaj, 48; her son Muhammad, 21; and her daughter Rawan, 6. Four other family members were wounded.

The house is on the very edge of the Palestinian area closest to the Karni crossing into Israel.

Iman Hajaj, 23, one of Mrs. Hajaj's 14 children, said she was in the house's living room during the explosion, where some were watching an Egyptian soap opera. Those people were wounded, she said; those who died were in the garden drinking tea or cooking corn over a fire. "We had been nervous for two days with the movement of tanks and the shells," Ms. Hajaj said, sitting in a room of mourning women, all covered in black head scarves and long black robes, in a relative's house nearby.

"My brother Muhammad, who died, had just arrived a minute before to visit my married sister," Ms. Hajaj said, beginning to cry, then held out her hand, holding a curved piece of shrapnel. "More than 20 pieces like this we took from the body of my mother," she said.

As she spoke, young women who lined the banister of the stairway all began to chant in unison, "With our souls, with our blood, we sacrifice ourselves for our martyr!"

Um Hassan Hajaj, the aunt of the dead mother, spoke angrily about what she said was the responsibility of Israel and the United States for the deaths in her family. "Look at what your weapons are doing to us!" she yelled. As the television cameras came closer, she turned to them and shouted: "One day the Muslim countries will change everything, and there will be hard days for America! Injustice never lasts."

As the bodies of the dead were brought, wrapped in the flags of Islamic Jihad and Fatah, there was screaming and ululating and the cascading sounds of gunfire from the militants surging around the courtyard. The militants wore various forms of mufti, waving weapons and flags, including the green of Hamas. As the small body of Rawan was carried, tiny in the stretcher, her face exposed, the wailing swelled, and Um Fathi Hajaj, the girl's grandmother, collapsed in tears.

As he walked along the route of the funeral march, Abu Ahmed, the spokesman for the Islamic Jihad's military wing, quietly promised retribution. "We have 70 suicide bombers in a new brigade awaiting orders to strike Israel," he said.

Asked whether Islamic Jihad would respect a negotiated political document calling for Palestinian military activity to concentrate on Israel proper, he smiled wearily. "All of historic Palestine is ours, and we don't distinguish between 1948 or 1967," he said.

Mr. Abbas, back in Ramallah, ordered two representatives to discuss the crisis with Syria and with the exiled leader of Hamas's political bureau, Khaled Meshal.

DOJ_NMG_0038926

On Friday, in a news conference, Mr. Abbas said he did not know of any splits in Hamas and dealt only with the elected Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniya, who called in vain for a mutual cease-fire on Saturday, quickly rejected by Israel without Corporal Shalit's release.

The Israeli Army also announced after an investigation that the only Israeli soldier who has died in this nearly two-week Gaza operation was accidentally killed by Israeli fire.

Israel Vows To Press Gaza Offensive (AP)

By Ravi Nessman, Associated Press Writer

AP, July 10, 2006

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Sunday he would push ahead with the army's widescale offensive in the Gaza Strip, saying the fight to free an abducted soldier and stop militant rocket fire would last for a "long time."

The 12-day-old operation has caused widespread destruction in Gaza, left 51 Palestinians dead and led to international complaints that Israel was using excessive force.

Despite the offensive, militants launched three rockets into Israel on Sunday, wounding one person in the town of Sderot and damaging a house. Also, militants linked to the Palestinians' ruling Hamas party maintained their refusal to free Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who was captured in a June 25 raid, or even reveal his condition.

An Israeli airstrike Sunday night targeted a car carrying Hamas militants near Gaza City, wounding five people, including an 8-year-old girl, Palestinian health officials said. The vehicle was filled with explosives, which led to a series of large secondary explosions, the army said.

Israeli aircraft attacked a building early Monday on the outskirts of Gaza City, setting it on fire, Palestinians said. No injuries were reported. The military said the building was used by Islamic Jihad to make weapons.

Before daybreak, aircraft fired a missile at a group of militants near Gaza City, killing one and seriously wounding another, Palestinian hospital officials said. The military said a missile had been fired at militants on their way to launch a rocket.

Speaking to the Israeli Cabinet, Olmert counseled patience.

"We're talking about a war that will continue for a long time and it is complicated," Olmert said, according to a participant in the meeting. "This is a war for which we cannot set down a timetable and we can't say how long it will continue."

The Cabinet expressed unanimous support for the military action in Gaza and Olmert's refusal to negotiate with the militants, who demanded the release of 1,500 Palestinian prisoners in exchange for information about Shalit, 19.

Israeli security officials told the Cabinet that the offensive, the army's largest operation in Gaza since Israel withdrew from the territory last summer, was likely to force the militants to scale back their demands, according to the participant in the meeting, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the meeting was closed to the press.

But Palestinians were widely supportive of the militants' actions. A poll released Sunday showed that 77 percent of those questioned backed Shalit's kidnapping and 67 percent said they supported further abductions. Sixty-nine percent said the soldier should only be released in exchange for prisoners.

The survey of 1,197 Palestinians by the Jerusalem Media and Communication Center had a margin of error of 3 percentage points.

Olmert told the Cabinet that before Shalit was captured, he had been planning a prisoner release as a goodwill gesture to moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, but now a release appears out of the question.

"It's not a secret before the kidnapping that we would free prisoners. But we intended to release them to moderate elements and not to terrorist elements," Olmert said.

"The release of prisoners means destroying the moderates in the Palestinian Authority, and would signal to the world that Israel can only talk to extremists."

Since the offensive began June 28, Israeli forces have battered Gaza with artillery barrages and airstrikes. One airstrike Sunday missed a car carrying members of a Hamas rocket squad and killed a bystander instead, Palestinian health officials said. The army confirmed it carried out an airstrike.

The United Nations blamed Israel for widespread human rights violations and hardship to civilians in Gaza.

Palestinian hospital officials say at least 51 Palestinians have been killed and more than 180 wounded in the offensive.

One Israeli soldier was killed last week, and military officials said Sunday an initial inquiry showed he was shot accidentally by Israeli forces.

Olmert and other ministers said they were not overly concerned about the international reaction.

"Anybody who calls this operation disproportionate has no clue about the facts on the ground. We have been attacked and bombarded for months and weeks," Cabinet minister Yitzhak Herzog said.

"With all due respect to all those who criticize us, if anything of this nature would have happened in their homeland, they would have acted much worse."

Radical Politics Mideast Democracy: One Violent Group Finds It Works Fine (WSJ)

By Karby Leggett

BEIRUT, Lebanon -- When Syrian troops left Lebanon last year, the Bush administration saw a prime opportunity to de-fang a group one U.S. diplomat once called the "A-Team" of terror groups: Hezbollah, which receives major backing from Syria.

The end of Syria's nearly three-decade occupation was a watershed moment for President Bush's campaign to spread democracy in the Middle East as an antidote to violent Islamic movements. Millions of Lebanese celebrated the country's liberation. With an election approaching, Hezbollah was worried. "We felt danger," says Nawar Saheli, a political leader in the group.

Today, it's stronger than ever. The group, once disdainful of domestic politics, filled the power vacuum of Syria's departure by joining Lebanon's governing coalition. That has given Hezbollah new clout, including control over two ministries.

It also has helped the group elude a big threat: international pressure, led by the U.S. and France, to disarm. Over the past year "Hezbollah built a big shield over its military wing," says Amal Saad-Ghorayeb, a professor at the Lebanese American University.

How the militant group turned adversity to opportunity reveals a conundrum for the Bush administration: Rather than resisting Washington's democracy drive, some radical Islamic groups, including organizations the U.S. deems terrorist, are using it to promote their agendas.

In the Palestinian territories, the Sunni Muslim group Hamas won elections that were encouraged by the U.S. in January, taking control of the government. Like the Shiite Muslim Hezbollah, Hamas has resisted international pressure to renounce violence and disarm. In Iraq, the firebrand cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, whom U.S. officials once called a terrorist and vowed to capture or kill, has become an important behind-the-scenes player in the new Iraqi government. His "Mahdi Army" flourishes with little challenge from the U.S. or Iraqi officials.

Though Washington has generally supported these democratization moves, letting militant groups enter politics without giving up their weapons carries big risks. An example is Gaza, thrown into crisis by the kidnapping of an Israeli soldier by Hamas's armed wing. Israel responded by blowing up a major electricity grid, arresting dozens of Hamas lawmakers and cabinet ministers and launching a ground offensive that has killed more than 30 Palestinians.

Israel also threatened Syrian President Bashar Assad, who permits senior Hamas leaders to reside in Damascus, by flying warplanes over one of his palaces, raising the prospect of a wider confrontation. And, worried that Hezbollah's armed wing might attack too, the Israeli military has issued a high-level alert along its northern border with Lebanon.

Hezbollah, whose name means Party of God, has an especially thorny history with the U.S. and Israel, and it presents unique problems. The group emerged in the early 1980s to oppose Israel's occupation of part of Lebanon, during a phase of the long Lebanese civil war. Hezbollah has slowly developed a vast network that provides social services far more efficiently than the Lebanese government in many areas. But the U.S. lists Hezbollah as a terrorist organization because of a series of bombings, kidnappings and airplane hijackings it carried out in the 1980s and early 1990s.

Amid tension over Iran's nuclear facilities, Hezbollah also draws scrutiny because it has close ties to Iran. Hezbollah has an estimated 15,000 missiles pointed at Israel from land it controls in southern Lebanon. Some U.S. and Israeli officials worry that if there ever were a military confrontation between the West and Iran, Hezbollah could become a proxy for Iran and step up attacks on Israel. In such an event, Israel would almost surely reply with overwhelming force, potentially inflaming passions in the Middle East and raising the danger of region-wide war.

The risk was underscored in late May as Israel and Hezbollah had their most ferocious skirmish in years. Hezbollah fired rockets into northern Israel and hit a military base. Israel destroyed several dozen Hezbollah forts, killing at least one adherent. "Hezbollah is a big nightmare for us," says an Israeli military commander, Lt. Col. Ishai Efroni.

Despite Hezbollah's maneuvering, U.S. officials describe events in Lebanon as progress toward the goal of spreading democracy. They say bringing Hezbollah into mainstream politics will gradually cause the group to distance itself from Iran and focus its energies on domestic issues, a process they argue will eventually lead to Hezbollah's disarmament.

In the meantime, they say the U.S. will continue to support international efforts to disarm the group, underscored by a series of tough United Nations Security Council resolutions. "The fact that there is even discussion about Hezbollah's disarmament is progress," says Jeffrey Feltman, U.S. ambassador to Beirut.

With its location along the Mediterranean between Syria and Israel, Lebanon has long been a focus of regional conflict. A land of more than a dozen Christian and Muslim sects, it erupted in a brutal civil war in 1975. A 1989 accord that formally ended the war specified a government reserving key positions for each main group. Lebanon's prime minister must be a Sunni Muslim, the president a Maronite Christian and the speaker of Parliament a Shiite Muslim.

What drew Hezbollah into its higher profile in politics was the February 2005 bomb slaying of Rafik Hariri, a former prime minister who'd become publicly critical of Syria's military occupation. Many Lebanese suspected Syria's government of involvement in the killing, and a popular uprising ensued. When Syria capitulated and withdrew its troops, many hoped the move would free the Lebanese to decide their own affairs.

In some ways, that's just what happened. More than ever before, Hezbollah turned the goodwill engendered by its social-services work into political might.

After Syria withdrew, Hezbollah leaders asked Mr. Saheli and 11 others to run for seats in Lebanon's 128-member Parliament. Under the banner of Hezbollah's political party, Loyalty to the Resistance, they won easily. Hezbollah's top leader, Hassan Nasrallah, also became more active on the national stage.

Together they reshaped Lebanon's political agenda with a mixture of bare-knuckle politics and occasional compromise. The top priority, says Mr. Saheli, was derailing the international effort to force Hezbollah to disarm. That effort was embodied two years ago in U.N. Security Council Resolution 1559, which among other things demanded that all Lebanese militias turn in their weapons.

Mr. Saheli, 39, grew up in Hermel, a drab city of 100,000 on the northern edge of the Bekaa Valley, near the border with Syria. A Hezbollah supporter since his teens, he'd become a lawyer and member of his town's city council.

The number of seats Hezbollah could win in Parliament was limited by Lebanon's complex power-sharing formula. Even so, Mr. Saheli sensed the value of producing a big voter turnout for Hezbollah. The group's campaign efforts in effect turned the voting into a referendum on whether it should be able to keep its armed military wing.

During the three-week campaign, Mr. Saheli says, he visited up to 15 villages a day. Skipping other issues such as education, he hammered a single theme: Protect "the resistance," Hezbollah's term for its military wing. Often, he says, he ended speeches with a harangue against the U.S. "The Americans have a big project against the Arab world -- Iraq, now Syria and next Hezbollah. And we must resist."

Voters, especially in Shiite-dominated areas, loved it. When the results came in June 2005, Hezbollah and a few parties it had aligned with were huge winners, taking the maximum 35 parliamentary seats available to Shiite Muslims.

Though Hezbollah had fielded candidates in previous elections, it had always remained an opposition party. This time, Mr. Saheli and his bloc accepted an invitation to join a coalition government. They asked for two important ministries, energy and labor.

And they made another demand: that all major government decisions, including the question of Hezbollah's weapons, be decided through consensual agreement rather than by a straight vote of the cabinet ministers. Coalition partners -- the biggest was Future Movement, led by a son of the slain Mr. Hariri -- needed Shiite representation in their government, and agreed to the conditions. That gave Hezbollah the power to veto just about anything it opposed.

Hezbollah legislators pushed through approval for a $35 million drinking-water facility, a waste-disposal project of similar cost and a $68 million road project, all in the Shiite-heavy Bekaa Valley. On a recent afternoon, workers were laying asphalt on the new highway under a blazing sun. It will improve access to some elaborate Roman temple ruins, boosting tourism and jobs, Mr. Saheli says.

At a cabinet meeting in December, Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, a staunch critic of Syria, asked ministers to vote, without a debate, on a proposal to set up an international court to try people arrested for Mr. Hariri's murder. Hezbollah's two ministers, accusing Mr. Siniora of breaking his promise to make all decisions consensually, walked out.

When three ministers from another Shiite party followed this lead, the new government faced paralysis. The Hezbollah ministers set a tough condition for their return: a public statement from the Sunni prime minister calling Hezbollah's military wing a "resistance" movement rather than a "militia."

It's a key distinction. U.N. Resolution 1559 calls on all Lebanese militias to disarm. Mr. Siniora stood before Parliament a few weeks later and said his government would henceforth refer to Hezbollah only as a resistance movement.

Though Hezbollah's politicians had been victorious, the showdown left the organization wary. It now activated a fallback plan: an unlikely alliance with a former Lebanese general and Christian leader, Michel Aoun.

Tensions between Hezbollah and Lebanon's Christians have run deep ever since some Christian factions worked with the Israelis during the civil war. Mr. Aoun lived in exile for 15 years before returning to Lebanon last year. He was an outspoken foe of Syria's occupation and also advocated disarming Hezbollah. In exile, the 71-year-old ex-general also met with officials in the U.S. and France in an effort to create an international front against Hezbollah.

Those efforts stopped on Feb. 6, when Mr. Aoun and Hezbollah suddenly made a deal. It amounted to a simple trade-off: Mr. Aoun suspended his call to disarm Hezbollah, and the group agreed to support him as a future Lebanese president.

Mr. Aoun says he still believes Hezbollah will disarm someday. But he now calls this an "internal matter" for Lebanon and offers no timetable. "The U.S. isn't too happy with me anymore," he notes.

Mr. Saheli, asked about Mr. Aoun, says: "We have common interests."

Hezbollah still has vocal critics. Walid Jumblatt, leader of Lebanon's Druze religious sect, says, "We need to squeeze Hezbollah, put them in a corner." He blames the group for "paralyzing" the government. But he doesn't favor trying to disarm through force. "We don't want a civil war," he says.

Amid growing political and economic strain, there are new signs of sectarian tension in this land of so many different religious factions. Last month, a fight broke out between knife-wielding Druze and Shiite students at a university campus. A few days later, thousands of Shiite residents in Beirut rioted after a TV show mocked Mr. Nasrallah, Hezbollah's leader. Lebanese security forces moved to Christian neighborhoods to avert further trouble.

In his parliamentary office on a recent day, Mr. Saheli said sectarian strife is a big concern. But he maintained that this longstanding problem, as well as the issue of Hezbollah's arms, must be resolved through democracy and national dialogue.

At Least 20 Killed In Mogadishu Battles (WP)

By Guled Mohamed

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia, July 9 -- Islamic militiamen attacked fighters loyal to defeated secular warlords in Mogadishu on Sunday, and at least 20 people were killed and scores wounded in heavy street battles, witnesses said.

The death toll was expected to rise in the most serious flare-up since the militiamen seized control of the Somali capital from U.S.-backed warlords a month ago.

Mogadishu's war-weary residents ran for cover as rival groups fired machine guns and pounded each other with mortar rounds near an area that had been a pocket of warlord resistance to the Islamic militiamen.

"I am fighting for Islam, and I don't fear dying," said Ahmed Hashi, a militiaman who suffered head injuries.

The Islamic militias, wanting complete control of the coastal capital, set a daybreak ambush for fighters loyal to Hussein Aideed, an interior minister in the interim government, and another warlord, Abdi Awale Qaybdiid.

As they put up checkpoints around the area to prevent the militiamen from escaping or receiving help, both warlords vowed that their men would fight to the end.

Aideed, speaking from the provincial town of Baidoa, where the interim government is based, said: "They took over one of our bases in the Hosh area of western Mogadishu, which was in our hands for the last 15 years. . . . We won't give up."

Staff members at one of Mogadishu's main hospitals said victims were pouring in on the back of pickup trucks in scenes reminiscent of battles earlier this year when Islamic fighters took over the city.

"Every five minutes, vehicles carrying wounded are coming in," said hospital administrator Ali Moallim, adding that 20 people had died and nearly 100 were wounded, many with serious gunshot wounds, some requiring amputation.

After the June 5 capture of Mogadishu, the Islamic militiamen took other towns across a large swath of southern Somalia. Their advance has challenged the aspirations of the Western-backed interim government, which was formed in Kenya in 2004 and is based in Baidoa because it is too weak to enter Mogadishu.

Talks between the government and Islamic militias are scheduled to begin Saturday in Sudan.

Most of the warlords who had run Mogadishu since the 1991 ouster of military dictator Mohamed Siad Barre surrendered or fled after their defeat in last month's battles, in which 350 people were killed, but pockets of fighters loyal to them hung on.

Sunday's battle ended a relative lull in violence for Somalis.

Mexican Runner-Up Files Legal Challenge (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

MEXICO CITY, July 9 -- Legal advisers to the presidential election runner-up, Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, gathered Sunday evening at a polling place guarded by soldiers toting machine guns and filed a formal challenge to Mexico's vote results.

The filing demands a vote-by-vote recount of the closest presidential election in Mexican history, which was decided Thursday when an official tally left Lopez Obrador, the populist former mayor of Mexico City, a half-percentage-point behind Felipe Calderon, a champion of free trade. Outside the polling place, Manuel Camacho Solis, a top Lopez Obrador strategist, accused election officials, as well as the administration of outgoing President Vicente Fox, of election violations that were "systematic and on a grand scale."

Lopez Obrador chose a polling place in the Colonia del Valle neighborhood, a Calderon stronghold, because his strategists consider it emblematic of what they call a stolen election.

"We wanted to file in a place where they were operating," said Gerardo Fernandez, spokesman for Lopez Obrador's Democratic Revolutionary Party.Calderon and his campaign team kept a low profile over the weekend, saying they prefer to argue in court. Calderon has said there is "no doubt" about his 240,000-vote margin of victory and has received congratulatory calls from President Bush and other world leaders.

Lopez Obrador's challenge will be heard by the Federal Electoral Tribunal, a seven-member special elections court, which has until Sept. 6 to decide whether to certify the results. The complaint consists of thousands of pages of documents, including e-mails that allegedly show that enrollment in social programs was used to coerce votes for Calderon.

The tribunal will also receive what Lopez Obrador says is evidence of an Internet smear campaign against him and examples of alleged illegal campaigning by Fox, who, as president, was prohibited by law from involvement in political campaigns. Lopez Obrador is also expected to use the complaint to resurrect one of his most effective campaign issues: allegations that Calderon's brother-in-law received sweetheart government contracts.

The challenge will assert, Camacho said, that the brother-in-law, Diego Zavala, was hired to develop software to review voter registration. Lopez Obrador's supporters say the contract created a conflict of interest that could have been used to give Calderon an improper advantage.

In an interview before the election, the head of the electoral commission, Luis Carlos Ugalde, denied contracting with Zavala's company, known as Hildebrando.

During the campaign, Calderon and his brother-in-law vigorously denied wrongdoing.

DOJ_NMG_0038931

Lopez Obrador also alleges that the electoral commission preprogrammed its computers before the election to show a Calderon victory. Electoral commission officials on Sunday denied the accusation.

Mexico Candidate Claiming Election Fraud (AP)

By Istra Pacheco, Associated Press Writer

AP, July 10, 2006

Leftist presidential candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador was sending hundreds of pages of purported evidence of fraud Sunday to a court he hoped would overturn his conservative rival's razor-thin preliminary victory.

Lopez Obrador said his lawyers would give the Federal Electoral Court evidence of fraud, including computerized manipulation of the results, a day after he called for continued hope from supporters at a mammoth rally in Mexico City's historic center.

The legal appeal would seek not to annul the July 2 election, but to force authorities to conduct a manual recount of all 41 million ballots.

"This was a very irregular election and we are asking that they count vote by vote to legitimize the president elect," Gerardo Fernandez, a spokesman for Lopez Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party, said outside the tribunal Sunday night as he waited for lawyers to arrive.

"We won't recognize Calderon's triumph unless they legitimize the election," he said.

Dozens of reporters waited outside the nation's top electoral court as the lawyers' expected arrival was repeatedly delayed. Three soldiers kept watch over a scene that was calm in contrast to Saturday's massive gathering.

Fernandez said the lawyers were held up by making copies of the 800 pages of allegations.

Election officials said Thursday that Felipe Calderon beat Lopez Obrador by less than 244,000 votes in the July 2 election — or a margin of just 0.6 percent.

But Lopez Obrador contends some of his votes weren't counted or were voided without reason. He has millions of devoted followers who believe only he can help Mexico's poor and downtrodden, and he has long used street protests to pressure the government and courts.

Lopez Obrador's claims also include allegations that President Vicente Fox used government funds to support Calderon, the candidate of Fox's conservative National Action Party.

Fox has denied interfering in the elections, and election monitors from the European Union said they found no irregularities in the vote count.

But fraud allegations strike a sensitive nerve with many Mexicans. They question whether Mexico has overcome decades of institutional corruption and fraud that long favored the ruling party — the Institutional Revolutionary Party for 71 years until it lost the presidency to Fox in 2000.

Lopez Obrador has sought to stoke those fears. On Saturday, he accused the respected Federal Electoral Institute, held up as an example to emerging democracies around the world, of being a "pawn of the party of the right."

Over 100,000 supporters rallying in the capital's main plaza Saturday chanted "Vote by vote!"

Turning to his charges that Fox unfairly aided Calderon, Lopez Obrador said the popular president "dedicated himself to attacking us and ended up being a complete traitor of democracy."

Representatives for Fox and Calderon were not immediately available to comment. Fox has stayed out of the public eye for two weeks in an effort to avoid accusations that he was meddling in the debate.

Lopez Obrador, a former Mexico City mayor, has said a software program was used to skew initial vote-count reports — a charge that revives memories of the alleged computer crash that flipped Mexico's 1988 election in favor of the then-ruling PRI.

Legal challenges were built into Mexico's elections process in recent years to help ensure clean elections, so Calderon can't be declared president-elect until the electoral court weighs allegations of fraud or unfair campaign practices. The court has until Sept. 6 to declare a winner.

The law allows a manual recount only for polling places where credible evidence of irregularities exist. Lopez Obrador's supporters say that applies to at least 50,000 of the approximately 130,000 polling stations.

"We are going to ask that they clean up the elections. We are going to ask that they count all the votes, vote-by-vote, poll-by-poll," Lopez Obrador said.

Despite the EU monitoring team's characterization of the vote count as fair, the leftist claimed election fraud was worse than under the PRI, which often using fraud to hold power.

Calderon says the vote was clean and has taken congratulatory phone calls from President Bush and the leaders of Canada, Spain and Colombia, among others — despite Lopez Obrador's plea for foreign governments to hold off on recognizing the result.

Lopez Obrador has repeatedly evaded questions about whether he would accept a court decision that went against him.

He provoked groans of disappointment from the crowd at the Zocalo in Mexico City when he told them not to block highways.

"This has been and goes on being a peaceful movement," he said. "We are not going to fall for any provocations."

Also Sunday, the Federal Electoral Institute wrapped up congressional vote tallies, determining the number of seats for each party.

According to National Action Party representative Jorge Zermeno, 206 seats in the 500-member lower house will go to Calderon's conservative party, 127 seats will go to Lopez Obrador's party, and 103 seats will go to the PRI. Minor parties have the 64 remaining seats.

López Obrador Ups Stakes On Mexico Poll (FT)

By Adam Thomson

Financial Times, July 10, 2006

The leftwing candidate in Mexico's presidential election at the weekend raised the pressure on the country's electoral authorities by openly claiming this month's vote had been fraudulent.

Calling on Mexicans to initiate a wave of nationwide protests, Andrés Manuel López Obrador of the Party of the Democratic Revolution (PRD) told an estimated quarter of a million people in Mexico City's main square: "If we allow them to impose themselves through fraud, it will be a regression to the past."

In one of the most impassioned speeches he has given yet, the charismatic 52-year-old campaigner asked supporters from Mexico's 300 electoral districts to march on the capital on Wednesday. He also called for another rally in Mexico City next Sunday.

Mr López Obrador's accusations follow a tense vote-count last week that handed victory to Felipe Calderón of the centre-right National Action party (PAN). According to the country's electoral authorities Mr Calderón, a 43-year-old Harvard-trained economist, beat Mr López Obrador by just 0.58 per cent. On Friday, several governments, including that of the US, sent messages of congratulations to Mr Calderón, the candidate of choice for Mexico's business community. The country's stock market and currency last week showed strong gains on the news.

But Mr López Obrador said he would submit evidence of foul play in the July 2 election to the electoral authorities. "This election process is not over yet," he said. Electoral authorities have until the end of August to weigh the evidence, and have to announce their decision by September 6. Mr López Obrador also accused President Vicente Fox of Mr Calderón's PAN of being "a traitor to democracy". Mr Fox, who is scheduled to leave office in December, was voted into power six years ago in an election that ended more than 70 years of rule by the Institutional Revolutionary party.

There is a widespread perception that the vote was rigged, and all last week demonstrators outside Mr López Obrador's campaign headquarters vowed to take their protests as far as necessary to reverse the result.

Leftist Is To Press Challenge Of Mexico's Election (WSJ)

By John Lyons And José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the left-wing candidate narrowly defeated in Mexico's presidential race, launched a legal campaign late last night to overturn the results, mixing allegations of vote fraud with broader claims that the election process was unfair.

The legal challenges came a day after Mr. López Obrador held a rally in Mexico City, kicking off the first of several protests he hopes will pressure election authorities to accede to his demands. Mr. López Obrador wants to nullify the results from more than a third of the 130,500 polling stations, and is demanding that all 41 million ballots be hand-counted a second time.

The 52-year-old former Mexico City mayor lost a July 2 vote by a slim margin -- around 240,000 votes -- to Felipe Calderón, 43, the candidate of President Vicente Fox's pro-market National Action Party, according to an official hand count conducted by Mexican poll workers and party representatives. Although he initially said the vote was clean, Mr. López Obrador has lashed out at election officials, Mr. Calderón, President Fox, and big business since the results were announced, claiming they formed a conspiracy to deny him victory.

"I won the presidency," Mr. López Obrador said early yesterday at a news conference. "I am going to defend our victory. This isn't over." The message was partly meant for the stream of heads of state, including Spain's socialist Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero and President Bush, who have extended congratulations to Mr. Calderón.

Despite his rhetoric, analysts say the veteran politician faces an uphill battle both to win a court ruling to overturn the election as well as to galvanize Mexicans into taking to the streets to support him. "López Obrador is now in the uncomfortable position of complaining about things that he said were fine at the time," said Federico Reyes-Heroles, a political analyst and writer in Mexico City.

Whatever the outcome, the dispute is likely to further polarize a divided nation, making governing more tricky for the next president.

Mr. López Obrador's legal challenges mark the first major test for the nation's special electoral tribunal, set up in the 1990s as the ultimate authority on electoral disputes as part of an effort to stamp out fraud. The court earned a reputation for flexing its muscle in 2000, when it annulled a local election in Mr. López Obrador's home state of Tabasco.

Now, the leftist is asking the electoral court to order a recount. In his legal complaint, delivered to the court late last night, he was expected to ask that the results from as many as 50,000 polling stations be thrown out for reasons including vote buying. He also was expected to ask the court to rule that the election was unfairly tilted against him by the meddling of President Fox and the collusion of electoral officials.

Mr. López Obrador's camp argues that Mr. Fox illegally campaigned for Mr. Calderón through government-sponsored advertisements touting the achievements of his government. Under Mexican law, a president can't endorse or campaign for a candidate. Mr. López Obrador may also argue that the Calderón camp surpassed spending limits to launch an illegal negative advertising campaign.

Leftist Starts Legal Battle Over Mexico Vote (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

MEXICO CITY, July 9 — A day after calling for mass demonstrations, Mexico's leftist presidential candidate began a legal battle on Sunday evening to try to overturn the results of the close presidential race.

The candidate, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, a former Mexico City mayor who campaigned on promises to reduce poverty, was planning to formally challenge the results in a single election district in the capital that went to the conservative winner of the election, Felipe Calderón. The act was largely symbolic, but his aides said other challenges would be submitted to local election boards and to the Federal Electoral Tribunal before midnight Monday.

Mr. López Obrador's lawyers contend that the initial count of the ballots, on election night a week ago, was careless. In some cases, they also assert that poll workers purposefully inflated Mr. Calderón's totals. Mr. López Obrador is calling for a complete recount in about 50,000 of the 130,000 polling places, where he contends he has evidence of irregularities or fraud.

"They counted the votes, but badly," said Mr. López Obrador, of the Party of the Democratic Revolution. "What we are asking is that they count the votes once again, polling place by polling place."

On Thursday, election officials determined that Mr. Calderón won the election by a narrow margin of 240,000 votes of 41 million cast. Although the Federal Electoral Tribunal has yet to ratify the official tally, Mr. Calderón has declared himself the winner and has received congratulations from the White House, Canada and the European Union.

Mr. López Obrador remains convinced he won and refuses to concede defeat. He is preparing legal challenges to present to both the Federal Electoral Tribunal and the Supreme Court.

At a rally of 150,000 people in the capital's central square on Saturday, he called on his supporters to stage two large marches this week to protest the outcome. Earlier, he told reporters he would mount a sustained campaign of peaceful protests.

As worries grew here that the marches could turn violent over time, the European Commission on Sunday called on both sides to show restraint while the courts dealt with the legal challenges.

The election results contain some oddities that Mr. López Obrador's lawyers hope to use to force a recount or, possibly, to annul the election. There were 900,000 "null votes," in which the voter's intention was unclear to poll workers. Since that number is unusually large and enough to change the outcome, lawyers for Mr. López Obrador's party contend that each ballot should be re-examined.

Second, there were numerous instances during the unofficial tally on Sunday night and Monday morning in which poll workers reported to the electoral institute's headquarters more votes for Mr. Calderón than he had actually received, especially in northern states where the conservative candidate's National Action Party is strong. Mr. López Obrador has said that pattern is evidence of fraud. Mr. Calderón's aides denied the party had committed any wrongdoing.

Finally, during the official tally on Wednesday and Thursday, the chiefs of local election boards uniformly rejected requests from Mr. López Obrador's representatives to recount ballots in thousands of polling places where there were irregularities.

Instead, the election officials stuck to the letter of the electoral law, which requires a recount only if a tally sheet is lost or contains an error or the ballot box appears to have been damaged. The law does not prohibit recounts for other causes, but it does not spell out the conditions either.

In about 2,600 polling places, election officials did recount ballots because of mistakes on tally sheets. Mr. López Obrador pointed out that in a vast majority of those cases, the counts were off.

Martín Ramírez, a spokesman for the electoral tribunal, said the court could not ratify the official tally and recognize Mr. Calderón as president-elect until it had ruled on all of Mr. López Obrador's legal challenges. By law the court must certify a new president by Sept. 6.

By late Sunday afternoon, the tribunal still had not received the official results from the Federal Electoral Institute, Mr. Ramírez said.

John M. Ackerman, an expert on electoral laws at the National Autonomous University of Mexico, said because electoral laws were relatively untested, it was hard to predict Mr. López Obrador's chances of success.

The electoral tribunal was empowered in 1996 to validate presidential elections. The only opportunity it has had to use those powers was in 2000, when President Vicente Fox of the National Action Party handily defeated the candidate of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, ending 71 years of its single-party rule.

Mr. Ackerman said that in the tribunal's short history it had ordered broad, though not complete, recounts in state and local elections. The largest recount, he said, was six years ago in the state of Jalisco, where the race was so tight and fiercely contested that the state was compared to Florida in 2000.

Mr. Ackerman also said the tribunal had not hesitated in the past to reverse decisions by the Federal Electoral Institute.

Mr. López Obrador has proved unpredictable himself. He is known for the demonstrations he staged in 1994 to protest his loss in the governor's race in his home state of Tabasco, charging that the governing party had committed fraud at the polls.

Now he has stepped up his accusations against President Fox, Mr. Calderón and their party, the PAN, saying they are betraying the democracy they helped create and engaging in the same fraudulent practices as the old governing party, the PRI. He also contends that Mr. Fox used state resources to help Mr. Calderón's campaign, a claim both men deny.

Haves And Have-Nots (NSWK)

By Joseph Contreras And Monica Campbell

Newsweek, July 10, 2006

The words on his T shirt read SMILE, WE'RE GOING TO WIN, but Abraham Flores was all frowns. Earlier in the day, the 24-year-old moving-company employee had voted for Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the former Mexico City mayor who ran for president on a pledge to help Mexico's poor. But preliminary returns looked grim. So Flores filed in to the famous Zócalo plaza in downtown Mexico City with hundreds of other angry voters to demand a recount. "If the elites get their way and López Obrador doesn't win, they'll hope the Mexican people will forget and go on with their lives," fumed the $10-a-day laborer. "But I doubt that will happen. We're sick of the elites trying to rule the country."

By the weekend, Flores's worst fears were confirmed: final tallies showed Felipe Calderón of the center-right National Action Party (PAN) defeating López Obrador by a mere 244,000 votes. It was Mexico's closest-ever presidential race. The ex-mayor announced plans to challenge the tally in court, and the federal election tribunal has until early September to certify or annul Calderón's apparent win. But no matter how the dispute plays out, the vote confirms an emerging trend in Latin America: a sharpening divide between haves and have-nots. "There are the people without running water and basic services, and those who can afford flats in New York City," says Juan Carlos Moreno-Brid of the U.N. Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean. "But this isn't just Mexico's challenge. Latin America is the most unequal region in the world."

Class tensions are certainly rising in Bolivia, where socialist Evo Morales won a landslide victory last December. Residents of the more prosperous provinces approved a ballot measure last week calling for greater autonomy from the central government. In Peru, voters split sharply along class lines in last month's runoff election: the private sector overwhelmingly backed ex-president (and eventual winner) Alan García against the populist challenge of a former Army officer. "In southern Mexico and Peru you have a lot of people who haven't enjoyed any of the benefits of globalization, and there's a great degree of anger and frustration," says Michael Shifter of the Washington-based Inter-American Dialogue think tank.

The fragmentation is not universal. Robust growth has helped foster consensus in countries like Colombia, Chile, Argentina and Brazil. But Mexico proves that growth alone is not a solution for class divisions. The Mexican economy expanded by 4.4 percent in 2004 and 3 percent in 2005. But almost half of the country's 107 million people still live in poverty, and inequalities are likely to widen before they narrow. Latin America's recent run of strong growth may peter out next year, particularly if the U.S. economy sputters. That would increase pressure on Calderón—who garnered only 36 percent of the total vote and is facing an opposition-led Congress. His first task may be to appease the many voters who feel cheated.

The Good Neighbor Strategy (TIME)

By MOISéS NAíM

Time, July 10, 2006

A presidential election too close to call. Aggrieved voters in the streets. Partisans exchanging accusations of fraud and demanding manual recounts. Lawyers drooling in expectation of weeks of court fights.

Sound familiar? It should. Mexico City today feels a lot like Tallahassee, Fla., six year ago. But Mexico's election is about much more than who will become the country's next President, and its result will have lasting implications for Latin America as a whole. In 2000, although U.S. voters were choosing between two very different presidential candidates, only a minority felt that the outcome would drastically alter the basic foundations of the nation. Not so for Mexicans. Voters believed the election would not only decide who would run the country for six years but also, more fundamentally, what kind of political and economic system Mexico would have. The platforms of the two leading candidates--the conservative Felipe CalderÃ³n and the leftist AndrÃ©s Manuel LÃ³pez Obrador--differed on the roles of the state vs. the market, the nature of political institutions, how to fight poverty and what kinds of links Mexico should have with the rest of the world.

That clash of visions is not confined to Mexico. Similar battles are raging throughout Latin America, which is witnessing the rise of a generation of politicians seeking to capitalize on frustration with the free-market, pro-American policies commonly pursued in the region in the 1990s, when much was promised and little was accomplished in terms of raising living standards. The leader of this turn toward populism is Venezuelan President Hugo ChÃ¡vez, who has cast himself as the heir to Fidel Castro, using his country's oil bonanza to purchase political influence all over the continent. But in recent months, the ChÃ¡vez movement has run up against opposition from forces that view it as wrongheaded, militaristic and undemocratic. In Mexico's election, as in Peru's last month, ChÃ¡vez turned out to be more of a liability than an asset to the leftist candidate carrying his banner.

That ambivalence provides an opportunity for the U.S. The issues fueling the ChÃ¡vez movement--poverty, inequality, exclusion, corruption and widespread frustration--haven't gone away. Despite the perorations of populists like ChÃ¡vez and

Castro, Latin America's maladies are not made in Washington but are self-inflicted wounds originating in the predatory Ã©lites that control policymaking in places like Buenos Aires, Caracas, BrasÃ-lia and Mexico City. Those are problems for which Washington has never had the skills or the means to influence. On the whole, the U.S. is better off letting Latin Americans figure out how to solve Latin America's problems.

But indifference has its costs too. After Sept. 11, the U.S.'s priorities of fighting Islamic terrorism and waging wars in Afghanistan and Iraq have led the Bush Administration to ignore Latin America as mostly irrelevant, which has allowed leaders like ChÃ¡vez to attack U.S. policies at will and sully Washington's reputation in the region. But the U.S. can still repair much of the damage--if it takes two bold initiatives that would break through the shortsighted policies that limit its opportunities in Latin America.

The first step toward draining the appeal of ChÃ¡vezism and restoring the U.S.'s image in Latin America would be to unilaterally lift the embargo on Cuba. The U.S. embargo has never worked as a tool to weaken Castro. Instead it has provided him with a wonderful excuse to hide his failures and justify the island's dire poverty and harsh political repression. The embargo is even less effective now that Cuba is so deeply intertwined economically and politically with Venezuela and other countries in the region. Embargoing Cuba without cutting off its ties to other countries is akin to staging an embargo against Portugal that ignores its ties to the rest of Europe. The U.S. embargo on Cuba has enormous political costs for the U.S. and no benefit other than pleasing a portion, but not all, of Cuban-American voters. Moreover, for the U.S. to maintain an embargo on Cuba while embracing Vietnam--a communist state with which the U.S. fought a long and costly war--and promoting trade and investment with Hanoi represents a blatant double standard that provides ammunition to U.S. detractors everywhere.

Another strategic surprise would be to engage the largest, most influential country in South America: Brazil. For decades U.S. policy toward Latin America has been driven by emergencies and a small-country bias: Cuba, the tiny Central American nations, Grenada and Haiti have all consumed far more of Washington's time and resources than giant Brazil, which was too big, remote and independent to be a pawn in the cold war. The only significant departure from the U.S.'s small-country bias has been with Mexico, first in the creation of NAFTA and then when Washington bailed the country out after its financial crash in 1994. Paying attention to Brazil would involve offering an attractive trade agreement that would grant freer access to the U.S. market for Brazilian steel, shoes, orange juice, ethanol and other products that currently face import barriers. The costs for the U.S. economy would be relatively minimal. For Brazil, such a deal would stimulate exports, drive investment and lift the economy.

Even more important, such an approach would reward and support a country (and a government) that is providing a powerful counterexample to the populist policies that are gaining favor in the region. That could be a very inclusive initiative: any Latin American country could be invited to join the two leading nations in the western hemisphere in this agreement. To be eligible, countries would need to adopt pro-poor, growth-inducing economic reforms that spur competition and open markets. They would also be required to enact political reforms that strengthen democratic practices and institutions. It could be a powerful stimulus for positive change, since few countries in the region could afford to be left out of an economic arrangement that included Brazil and the U.S.

Would this Administration be willing to pursue either of these moves? At this stage it doesn't seem likely. The first measure would provoke howls from many Cuban exiles in Florida, while the second would irk U.S. business interests that would face competition from Brazilian imports. But if Richard Nixon could go to China, perhaps George W. Bush could discover Brazil--and stop making a failed Caribbean dictator an important element of U.S. policy. It could be that an embattled, second-term U.S. President looking for a legacy other than a botched attempt at installing democracy in faraway lands could warm up to the idea of leaving a permanent, positive mark in his country's own neighborhood.

Saudi Arabia Tests Its Potential For Unlocking Heavy-Oil Reserves (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree And Russell Gold

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

With global energy demand soaring, Saudi Arabia, whose abundant reserves of light oil have supplied the world for decades, is looking to unlock its huge, hard-to-tap and largely unexploited reservoirs of heavy crude.

If it succeeds in overcoming the technical hurdles, the effort could significantly increase Saudi Arabia's oil reserves over the next several years, potentially adding some slack to tight energy markets. It would also be a blow to so-called peak-oil theorists who have forecast that world oil production is on the brink of peaking.

Crude-oil prices have more than tripled since 2002 as increases in global demand have outstripped production capacity. On Wednesday, crude-oil futures on the New York Mercantile Exchange reached a new high, settling at $75.19 a barrel before slipping back to finish the week at $74.09.

While there is still plenty of oil left in the ground, most of the supplies that are easy to reach already have been developed, forcing the global petroleum industry to turn to oil deposits that are trickier to recover. Heavy oils, which can be the consistency of molasses, or even denser, are costlier to bring to the surface than light oils. They also typically contain more contaminants like metals and sulfur.

Because refineries need special equipment to remove these impurities, heavy oil is priced lower than light oil. But a growing number of refineries around the world can handle heavy oil, turning it into such products as gasoline, diesel, jet fuel and heating oil, and Saudi Arabia recently announced plans to build more of them.

Earlier this year, in a critical trial of Saudi Arabia's heavy-oil potential, U.S. oil giant Chevron Corp. began a field trial of a technique designed to pump out heavy oil that was previously considered unrecoverable. In the pilot project, which it plans to expand to additional wells, Chevron is injecting steam to loosen up sludge-like heavy-oil reserves in Wafra, a field in the so-called neutral zone between Saudi Arabia and Kuwait. Oil from the neutral zone is shared equally by the two countries.

Chevron and the Saudis say initial results are promising and that the technique could greatly enhance recovery at some huge fields.

Saudi Oil Minister Ali Naimi said many heavy-oil fields in his country aren't currently included in its official tally of 260 billion barrels of recoverable reserves, the world's largest. If steam injection works in these fields, it would add "tens of billion of barrels" to Saudi reserves, Mr. Naimi said in an interview.

Chevron has used steam injections successfully for decades to greatly boost production in heavy-oil fields in California and Indonesia. Now, the Saudis and Chevron want to see if the technique will work in the more porous rock formations common in Middle East.

In addition to the Wafra test with Chevron, the Saudis are also considering developing the gigantic Manifa field, which is believed to have a large component of heavy oil. As its lighter components are pumped out, Manifa could also be a candidate for steam injection.

Without steam, heavy oil can be very difficult to pry out of the earth because it is so thick it barely flows. Heavy-oil fields sometimes yield as little as 5% of their oil with conventional pumping, compared with 35% or more in a light-oil deposit.

In some ultra-heavy-oil fields -- like the massive Canadian tar-sands deposits, where production is rapidly gearing up -- the oil is far heavier than in Saudi Arabia. Oil companies there are using a similar steam-injection technique, with even more heat, to make the oil extractable.

Rising world demand has taken up all of Saudi Arabia's light-oil output at a time when the kingdom's need for oil is rising sharply at home as it industrializes. Mr. Naimi, the Saudi minister, wants to tap the country's heavy-oil deposits to meet the country's own energy needs and to feed thirsty foreign markets by refining the oil into such products as gasoline.

The Wafra pilot is also a big test for Chevron, which wants to build on its long track record of developing heavy-oil fields in hard sandstone and shale rock formations. In century-old oil fields outside Bakersfield, Calif., Chevron has used steam injection for years to drastically increase the amount of oil that can be pulled out of the earth, radically extending the productive life of the fields.

"It's all about draining the tank to the bottom," says Jeff Hatlen, a Chevron engineer. Using steam, Chevron has managed to extract 80% of the oil from some reservoirs in the California oil fields, compared with 15% in the pre-steam days.

The Saudis hope for a similar boost in recovery. Using conventional pumping, Wafra is expected to yield only 3% of the billion barrels in its reservoir. But after steaming, as much as 40% could be pumped out.

Operating costs in Chevron's California heavy-oil fields were $14 a barrel last year, well above costs in the Middle East. That suggests that the Saudis could pay a premium to extract their heavy-oil deposits and still make a huge profit.

Unlike California's deposits, however, most of the Middle East's heavy oil is locked inside carbonite formations, where steam injection has never been tested on a large scale. If the steam leaks out through fissures in this softer rock, it would be difficult to build up the high temperatures needed to melt the heavy oil. It would also make the process more costly, since it takes lot of natural gas to make the steam.

The Chevron technique is to inject steam into a field through one well, soaking the oil-rich rock. As the steam heats the thick oil, its consistency thins to that of watery syrup. Then, the oil is pumped to the surface through another well.

Chevron's test in Saudi Arabia involves one steam-injection well, four producing wells and one observation well that collects data about the interaction of the oil and steam. Though it declined to give a timetable, Chevron is committed to expanding to a larger second phase that will include 16 injection wells and 25 producing wells as well as the installation of water-treatment facilities and steam-generation facilities. Total estimated cost: $300 million.

Chevron isn't alone in trying to use steam flooding in the Mideast. In Oman, Occidental Petroleum Corp. is preparing to spend $2 billion on a large-scale steam-injection project in the Mukhaizna field, which holds about a billion barrels of oil. After four years of negotiations, Occidental persuaded the Omanis to let it run the field, in part by promising them a ten-fold increase in production to 150,000 barrels a day.

Although it hasn't specified it will use steam flooding, Kuwait is planning a pilot project to exploit its northern heavy-oil fields. These fields are needed to help Kuwait meet its goal of raising output to some four million barrels a day by 2020 from the current 2.6 million barrels a day.

Three years ago, the U.S. Geological Survey estimated the world has more than one trillion barrels of heavy oil, mostly in Canada, Venezuela and elsewhere in the Western Hemisphere. Taken together, these reserves are comparable to the world's conventional light-oil reserves, the majority of which are in the Eastern Hemisphere.

But some experts believe the amount of heavy oil in the Middle East has been underestimated because of the focus on the giant deposits of light oil in the region. "They have quite a bit, and there is probably more heavy oil in the Middle East than the official figures show," says Emil D. Attanasi, an economist at the Geological Survey.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Detainee Rights Create A Divide On Capitol Hill (NYT)

By Kate Zernike And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

WASHINGTON, July 9 — The Supreme Court decision striking down the use of military commissions to bring terrorism detainees to trial has set off sharp differences among Republicans in Congress over what kind of rights detainees should be granted and how much deference should be shown the president in deciding the issue.

The debate is expected to consume the rest of the summer in Congress as lawmakers head into an election season expected to be dominated by issues of national security. The issue reflects the difficult legal, diplomatic and political choices the government faces in dealing with terrorism suspects.

The divisions do not fall strictly along traditional partisan lines and are as much within the parties as between them, particularly for Republicans. On one side of the debate are Republicans who believe Congress should give the president the authority to set up the kind of military commissions that were struck down by the court. Such commissions would sharply curtail defendants' rights.

On the other side are those who say the trials should be modeled on the military system of courts-martial, an approach that would give detainees more due-process rights than would the commissions. In between, many Republicans and Democrats alike argue for starting with the military judicial system and tweaking it to reflect the differences of trying terrorism suspects.

The debate will play out in a series of Congressional hearings quickly scheduled for this week, as lawmakers return to Washington after their weeklong Fourth of July recess.

Aides to President Bush said they had not yet reached any conclusions about what legislation should look like. Dan Bartlett, counselor to Mr. Bush, said lawyers for the White House, State Department and Justice Department were still reviewing the court's decision in the case, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld.

Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, who is expected to take a leading role on the issue as a member of the Armed Services Committee, argued that the administration's version of the military commissions had to be "reined in" to make clear, for instance, that evidence gathered by coercive interrogation techniques could not be introduced as evidence.

"I'm trying to get my colleagues to think about the international community's reception to what we do," said Mr. Graham, a former military lawyer. "We've got a chance to improve our image."

In its decision, the Supreme Court said, on a 5-to-3 vote, that the planned commissions were unauthorized by federal statute and violated international law.

Administration officials, who have been consulting with Mr. Graham, are looking to him to play a central part in drafting legislation. Senators John W. Warner of Virginia, who is chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and John McCain of Arizona also are expected to be at the forefront for the Republicans, while Senator Carl Levin of Michigan is quite likely to emerge as a point man for the Democrats.

On the Judiciary Committee, Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the Republican chairman, and Senator Patrick J. Leahy, the committee's ranking Democrat, who first proposed Congressional action on military tribunals in 2001, are also expected to play central roles.

The Supreme Court decision left lawmakers with the challenge of resolving a complicated legal issue under the pressure of a heated election season and a limited amount of time left on their calendar.

While both parties are united in saying they want to act quickly, they face fights over what form of trial to use and whether the protections of the Geneva Conventions apply to terrorism suspects.

In hearings on Capitol Hill this week, the House Armed Services Committee will take testimony from lawyers, including several sympathetic to the administration. Two Senate committees, Judiciary and Armed Services, will take testimony from constitutional lawyers and top military lawyers, who some Republican senators believe were ignored in the White House discussions that led to the establishment of commissions. The only administration officials scheduled to testify are lawyers from the Justice Department and the Pentagon.

While Republicans are divided on central issues, Democrats have their own challenge. They see the court's decision as a rare rebuke to Mr. Bush, and they hope to turn the debate into a broader one over presidential power. But they said they also recognized that they must cooperate on legislation or risk being portrayed as weak on terrorism.

Some Republicans and many Democrats say that the administration may have hurt itself by rebuffing efforts as early as 2001 by Republicans and Democrats in the Senate to set up some kind of military commission. "Congress is going to want to be a full partner, and not a rubber stamp for this process," said Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas and a close ally of the White House.

The central question is what kind of forum to set up. Commissions allow the government wide berth in introducing evidence, including hearsay, which is banned in military courts, and restrict the rights of the accused to be present in the court and to see the evidence against them. Military courts-martial, while not as strict as civilian courts, restrict the kind of evidence that can be introduced and allow the accused to interview witnesses and see even classified evidence.

The White House has long resisted anything like courts-martial, saying they could require the government to choose between dropping the charges and disclosing more than it wants to about the sources and nature of the intelligence used to develop a case against the detainees.

Senator Warner, who will direct the hearings as chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said he wanted a system that relied "as much as possible" on the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which the court decision said governed the treatment of detainees.

Many lawmakers said they supported an approach based on some tweaking of the military system. Senators Graham and Specter, along with Representative Duncan Hunter, Republican of California and the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, advocate allowing hearsay, as well as a procedure to deal with classified evidence. The rules would be looser than in a court-martial but stricter than in a commission.

"We have to have a system that operates in the war on terror and one that doesn't tie us into knots trying to prosecute the people who have killed Americans in large numbers," Mr. Hunter said.

John C. Yoo, a professor of law at the University of California, Berkeley, who worked on orders expanding presidential power in the treatment of detainees as a former lawyer for the Justice Department, said, "The debate that people are having is whether it's going to be a short bill that just overrules Hamdan completely, which you could do in one sentence, or whether it's going to be a much more comprehensive law that tries to set out essentially a code of procedure for the military commission."

But any effort simply to codify the president's order establishing commissions would be fiercely resisted by influential Democrats.

"The Supreme Court said the president cannot continue to break the law," said Mr. Leahy, the Vermont Democrat. "The worst thing to do would be to simply paper that over and say we'll make it possible for him to break the law."

An effort by Mr. Leahy in 2001 to introduce legislation establishing tribunals was rebuffed by the White House. "They said no, they knew what they were doing, they would do it alone," Mr. Leahy said. "What's happened? Five years, there have been no trials, no convictions, nothing has happened, we've had our reputation severely hurt throughout the rest of the world."

Mr. Graham similarly called it "a mistake" to give Congressional blessing to the military commissions as envisioned in Mr. Bush's presidential order. "We have a chance to start over," he said.

Another central question is whether the Geneva Conventions extend to accused terrorists. Mr. Graham and Mr. Cornyn say no, and Mr. Graham wants Congress to pass legislation overturning the court's finding that Common Article 3 of the conventions applies to detainees. The article's provisions outlawing degrading treatments, he believes, could mean that American soldiers would be subject to prosecution in the war on terror.

But Mr. Cornyn, a former judge, said that the reference to Article 3 meant simply that any court must be established within the military justice system.

"Congress should not, and the court did not hold that, they are entitled to the whole panoply of rights that the prisoner of war would be entitled to under circumstances where the Geneva Conventions apply," Mr. Cornyn said.

Other Republicans, though, fear that any system that does not pay heed to the court's mentioning of the Geneva Conventions risks being rejected by the court again.

"We've got to structure this law in such a way that if it ever came back up through the Supreme Court, it will not be struck down," Mr. Warner said. "It's important for the credibility of the United States to put this issue at rest and let the world realize we're affording them the protections as the Supreme Court outlined."

Democrats will argue that harsh conditions at Guantánamo have made the prison a rallying cry for new terrorist recruits.

"The issue we believe is most prescient is not the balance between security and liberty, where on issues like this the parties are relatively close, but on competence," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York. "They just don't do it right, wherever they go. By their stubbornness and refusal to work with Congress, they've made us worse off in Guantánamo today."

Congress has rearranged its schedule to debate the issue this month, and those leading the debate say that they want to vote on new legislation, if any is needed, by September.

Court's Decision Offers Scant Guidance (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 9 — In striking down President Bush's plan to have military commissions operate at Guantánamo Bay, the Supreme Court provided no clear road map for the White House and its allies in Congress as they ponder their next move.

But the court's majority opinion offered some ambiguous guidelines as to what changes might allow Guantánamo detainees to be tried before some kind of military tribunal, as White House officials say they remain committed to doing.

There are two major issues any proposed remedy must deal with, legal analysts say. One involves the Uniform Code of Military Justice, a domestic law that prescribes guarantees for defendants in court-martial proceedings roughly analogous to those in the nation's civilian courts; the other involves the Geneva Conventions, a set of international treaties to which the United States is a party.

The court's five-member majority ruled that the law requires that in most circumstances, procedures for military commissions should be consistent with those used in courts-martial, which are used to try active American service members for crimes.

Any exceptions to those procedures, the court said, would be permissible only if the president demonstrated that it was "impracticable" to abide by the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

The military commissions at Guantánamo had at least two substantial deviations from court-martial procedures in the court's view: The defendant could be excluded from the courtroom, and evidence that would not typically be admitted in a court-martial could be used if the judge thought it was useful, including hearsay and information obtained through coercive interrogations or torture.

That means that the military commissions might be saved if changes were made to make them more like courts-martial or the president adequately demonstrated that it was impracticable to do so.

The court was not clear as to how the president could fulfill that requirement of proving it was impracticable to provide all the rights of court-martial proceedings. But one possibility is that he could get Congress to formally agree, which might oblige the court to defer to that judgment.

If Congress also moved to change the commissions' rules to make them more like court-martial proceedings — required the exclusion of hearsay and other questionable testimony and so forth — the commissions might be acceptable to the court. But lawyers inside and outside the military agree that it would make it exceedingly difficult for the government to win those cases with such restrictions.

"That's obviously why they didn't want to use the court-martial system in the first place," said John D. Hutson, a retired rear admiral who served as the Navy's top lawyer until 2000 and is now the dean and president of the Franklin Pierce Law Center in Concord, N.H.

The second major issue raised by the court is the finding that the protections guaranteed in a section of the Geneva Conventions known as Common Article 3 apply to the detainees, even those deemed to be members of Al Qaeda. The court noted that Common Article 3 (so called because it appears as Article 3 in all four Conventions) has long been regarded as a minimum baseline of rights that must be afforded to all prisoners.

Justice John Paul Stevens, in writing the majority opinion, noted that Common Article 3 requires that even a Guantánamo detainee "be tried by a regularly constituted court affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples." He suggested that the military commissions could not be regarded as "regularly constituted" courts because in the United States system, court-martial proceedings fulfilled that role. So again, Congress might consider declaring that the military commissions are regularly constituted courts and let the courts decide if that is adequate.

The invocation of Common Article 3 raises another important question. If its provisions about trials apply, so might its provisions that prohibit "humiliating and degrading treatment," which is a higher standard than the most restrictive domestic statute, the so-called McCain Amendment.

Congress Argues The Recrafting Of Terror Tribunals (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, July 10, 2006

WASHINGTON

Two months after 9/11, President Bush announced a bold and controversial initiative. Under his power as commander in chief, he created a streamlined process in the military justice system to try members of Al Qaeda for war crimes.

The national debate that followed was rigorous and, at times, heated. But it produced no specific legislation affirming the new military-commission system.

Now, on the heels of a US Supreme Court rebuke of Mr. Bush for acting without clear legislative support, the debate is taking place again - this time in the halls of Congress. At issue is to what extent suspected terrorists should be afforded the same fair-trial protections as US soldiers facing prosecution in courts-martial.

The Bush administration and its supporters have said that generous procedural protections may make it difficult or impossible to prosecute some terrorists without revealing sensitive intelligence sources and methods.

Other analysts say that how the United States treats its captured enemies reveals something fundamental about America's character as a nation. They urge that Al Qaeda suspects be granted the same due process protections as American soldiers under the military justice system.

"If you set the higher standard, it is a signal to the rest of the world that we are treating these people under the rule of law," says Scott Silliman, director of the Center on Law, Ethics and National Security at Duke Law School.

In its ruling on June 29, the Supreme Court said the president's military commission process did not provide the minimal level of trial protections required under the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) and Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions.

"The military commission was not born of a desire to dispense a more summary form of justice than is afforded by courts-martial; it developed, rather, as a tribunal of necessity," says Justice John Paul Stevens, discussing the history of such commissions in his majority opinion. "Exigency lent the commission its legitimacy, but did not further justify the wholesale jettisoning of procedural protections."

The challenge for Congress is to decide how best to balance the concerns raised by the Supreme Court against the flexibility desired by the Bush administration. Specifically at issue is whether to retain or rewrite rules that heavily favor prosecutors by allowing hearsay and coerced statements to be introduced as evidence. Stricter rules of evidence might prevent prosecution of terrorists where testimony was obtained through harsh interrogation tactics, legal analysts say.

The rules also allow for a defendant to be excluded from any portion of his trial dealing with classified information. Although the rules permitted an appointed military defense lawyer to attend the closed portions of the trial, the military lawyer was barred from ever disclosing or discussing the classified evidence with the defendant.

The Supreme Court did not announce a strict standard. Instead, the majority justices quoted a provision of Common Article 3 that requires the military commission be "a regularly constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples."

It will now be up to Congress to decide which judicial guarantees are "indispensable" in the context of military-commission proceedings against accused terrorists.

"Justice Stevens has done us all a favor," says David Rivkin, a Washington, D.C., lawyer who worked in both the Reagan and first Bush administrations. "This is a road map of how to fix" the commission process.

Mr. Rivkin notes that the Supreme Court invalidated the commission system based on statutory grounds, rather than identifying constitutional violations. Congress can respond to statutory problems by rewriting the law, Rivkin says.

He says Congress will probably preserve most of the Bush administration's approach. "The bottom line is you are going to hand up procedures that are probably a little less sweeping than the existing commission rules, but not by much," he says.

Others are pushing for broader protections. The Washington-based National Institute of Military Justice is proposing that Congress rewrite the UCMJ to mandate that military commissions use the same procedures as general courts-martial. "This was a very poor likeness of military justice," says NIMJ President Eugene Fidell of the invalidated commission process.

Mr. Fidell acknowledges that tougher trial standards may mean that some terror suspects are never brought to trial. "There are times when you have to do that," he says.

Professor Silliman, who served for 25 years as an Air Force judge advocate, agrees. "We are under a tremendous amount of attack in the world's public opinion as a result of the atrocities in Iraq and our handling of Guantánamo Bay," he says.

Rivkin, who supports more relaxed trial standards, says military jurors will be able to work through the evidence and other issues, and render fair verdicts. But he says the larger issue is not which procedures Congress enacts, but that Congress recognizes the symbolic importance of treating terror suspects differently. He says those who comply with the law of war deserve certain protections. Terrorists, who follow no rules or law, should not, he says.

Says Rivkin: "Here, society is saying: 'These people aren't just criminals; as terrorists, they are something else.' That doesn't mean they don't get due process, you just slice it differently."

Guantanamo Probe Finds Evidence Of Plot (AP-Y2)

By Ben Fox

AP2, July 9, 2006

An investigation into three apparent suicides at the Guantanamo Bay prison has found that other detainees may have helped the men hang themselves or were planning to kill themselves too.

Authorities who searched other detainees' cells after the three were found hanged discovered instructions on tying knots, along with several notes in Arabic that were "relevant" to an investigation of a possible broader plot, officials said in court papers filed late Friday in Washington.

The detention center's commander, Navy Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris, said in an affidavit that investigators believe "the suicides may have been part of a larger plan or pact for more suicides that day or in the immediate future."

Authorities confiscated personal papers from nearly all 450 prisoners at Guantanamo Bay to "determine whether other suicides were planned or likely to be planned," Carol Kisthardt, the Naval Criminal Investigative Service agent in charge of the investigation, said in an affidavit.

Both affidavits were filed in support of a request for a judge to appoint a special review panel to review all the detainees' documents, which include letters from attorneys.

Lawyers for Guantanamo detainees have condemned the confiscation of the legal papers as a violation of attorney-client privilege and asked a judge to order their immediate return.

Investigators said they confiscated about 1,100 pounds of personal documents after three detainees were found hanging from their steel mesh cells before dawn on June 10 — the first reported deaths of prisoners at the prison.

Bill Goodman, legal director for the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents about 200 detainees, said Saturday that a special review panel would undermine trust between prisoners and their lawyers and delay the legal process.

"It's another roadblock," Goodman said.

The government said the panel's independence would be assured, and detainees' rights protected, by its including lawyers, law enforcement and intelligence personnel and translators who have not taken part in any legal proceedings against detainees.

The special panel, or "Filter Team," would review all the material and report any information that threatens national security or involves "imminent violence" but would not divulge anything that would violate attorney-client privilege, the government said.

Authorities took the papers after finding a note in Arabic related to the suicides in the mesh wall of the cell of one of the prisoners found hanged to death, Kisthardt wrote.

The note did not appear to be written by the prisoner, or another of the detainees who committed suicide, and it was written on paper provided by lawyers stamped with the words "Attorney-Client Privilege."

Among the papers, investigators also found a printout of an e-mail written by someone on the base that appeared to contain sensitive information about the location of cells and operations at Guantanamo, where the U.S. holds men suspected of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

Investigators also confiscated envelopes from detainees marked "Attorney-Client Privilege" but did not review the contents to see if they had any relevant information, Kisthardt wrote.

The Gitmo Fallout (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff And Stuart Taylor Jr.

Newsweek, July 17, 2006

David Bowker vividly remembers the first time he heard the phrase. A lawyer in the State Department, Bowker was part of a Bush administration "working group" assembled in the panicked aftermath of the September 11 attacks. Its task: figuring out what rights captured foreign fighters and terror suspects were entitled to while in U.S. custody. White House hard-liners, led by Vice President Dick Cheney and his uncompromising lawyer, David Addington, made it clear that there was only one acceptable answer. One day, Bowker recalls, a colleague explained the goal: to "find the legal equivalent of outer space"—a "lawless" universe. As Bowker understood it, the idea was to create a system where detainees would have no legal rights and U.S courts would have no power to intervene.

The "outer space" line became something of a joke around the office, but Bowker and a handful of his colleagues didn't find it all that funny. The White House was already planning to fly terror suspects to Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, or other secret U.S. prisons overseas, where they would have no way to challenge their detention. In January 2002, Bowker and other State Department lawyers pushed back. After seeing a Justice Department memo arguing that Qaeda and Taliban prisoners did not even deserve basic protections under the Geneva Conventions, they warned that the administration was inviting an enormous backlash, both from U.S. courts and foreign allies. It would also, they feared, jeopardize President George W. Bush's plans to try such prisoners in specially created military courts. "Even those terrorists captured in Afghanistan ... are entitled to the fundamental humane treatment standards of ... the Geneva Conventions," William Howard Taft IV, the State Department legal counselor and Bowker's boss, wrote in a Jan. 23, 2002, memo obtained by NEWSWEEK. In particular, Taft argued, the United States has always followed one provision of the Geneva Conventions—known as Common Article 3—which "provides the minimal standards" of treatment that even "terrorists captured in Afghanistan" deserve.

But the complaints went unheeded. The hard-liners forcefully argued that in wartime, the president had virtually unlimited powers to defend the nation. They may come to wish they'd listened a little more closely to the warnings. In a ruling late last month, the Supreme Court came down squarely on the side of the dissenters. The case involved Ahmed Hamdan, a captured 37-year-old Yemeni who once served as Osama bin Laden's driver and now sits in a Gitmo cell. The court blocked the Pentagon's plans to try Hamdan as a war criminal in a military commission authorized by President Bush. The court's reasoning was complex, but the majority opinion, written by Justice John Paul Stevens, concluded that the military commissions, with their limited protections for the rights of the accused, violated the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the basic provisions of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions—precisely the argument that Taft, Bowker and other State Department lawyers had tried to make four years ago.

Administration officials and Washington lawyers are still digesting the text of the ruling, but it is already becoming clear that it could have ripple effects that extend far beyond the trial of Hamdan and other Guantánamo prisoners. The president has long argued that Congress granted him wide-reaching powers in the days after 9/11, when it passed a resolution authorizing him to use military force against the perpetrators of the attacks. But in his ruling, Justice Stevens took a much narrower view of the president's wartime powers, rejecting the administration's argument that military commissions of the kind Bush had created were covered by the resolution. Now other antiterror programs that the president has justified by invoking the same congressional resolution might be vulnerable to serious legal challenge. Some legal scholars and current and former administration officials believe the case could undermine the secret foreign detention centers and the NSA eavesdropping program, two cornerstones of the terror war. "This is an extremely damaging decision for presidential power," says a former senior administration lawyer, who asked for anonymity owing to his intimate involvement in the legal wrangling over prisoner treatment. "And it was largely a self-inflicted wound." The bitter irony: an administration determined to expand executive power may have caused a serious contraction.

Another possible side effect is that other countries, emboldened by the ruling, could use the case to justify efforts to bring war-crimes charges against CIA officers, U.S. service members and traveling government officials who had a hand in authorizing or carrying out harsh treatment of prisoners. Conceivably, those who violate provisions of Article 3—which mandate humane treatment for all captured prisoners—could also be criminally prosecuted by future administrations under a U.S. law known as the War Crimes Act. "This has opened up a can of worms," says Sen. Lindsay Graham, a South Carolina Republican. "You could have a situation if we don't bring some restraint where anybody who has done anything to an Al Qaeda suspect that's harsh could be prosecuted." Bowker says he and other State Department lawyers specifically warned about just such a scenario during the early debates. "The implications of this—for potentially being arrested and tried in other countries—is certainly a little scary," says Ted Olson, the former solicitor general.

Defenders of the administration's position put the blame for any such troubles on a Supreme Court they say is once again meddling where it doesn't belong. Historically, they argue, courts have given the president wide latitude during wartime. "It shows that the imperial judiciary thinks that, in addition to abortion, affirmative action and religion, war should be within its grasp," says John Yoo, now a Berkeley law professor, who was one of the chief authors of the administration's antiterror legal doctrines. But other insiders concede that the White House, by going too far, provoked the court to step in.

The court decision's possible effects have set off an intense debate within the administration over how to respond. One camp, headed by national-security adviser Stephen Hadley and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, want to use the decision as the basis for a wide-ranging "fix" that would accept a role for Congress and the courts on detainee issues. That would, at a minimum, require Congress to authorize military commissions under new rules that provide greater protections for the accused—and establish some standards for the treatment and interrogation of terror suspects. (It could also lead to a shutdown of Guantánamo—a goal President Bush has moved toward in recent weeks.)

But hard-liners—led by Addington, now Vice President Cheney's chief of staff—are fiercely resisting. They, along with some congressional Republicans, want to nullify the court ruling by rewriting portions of the Uniform Code of Military Justice and granting the president the powers the court rejected.

One person closely watching the case, and the fallout, is Hamdan himself. Last week, heavily guarded and shackled with leg irons, he met with his lawyer, Neal Katyal, to review the decision in a Gitmo interrogation room. He was "overcome with joy" that he might have a chance at a trial, Katyal says, and discussed the legal subtleties of the opinion. "He understood it better than most of the lawyers familiar with the case did," Katyal insists. A little farfetched, perhaps. But languishing in the cell, bin Laden's driver will have plenty of time to sharpen his analysis of the case that bears his name.

Lawmaker: Congress Not Told Of Programs (USAT)

USA Today, July 10, 2006

The Bush administration was running several intelligence programs, including one major activity, that it kept secret from Congress until whistle-blowers told the House Intelligence Committee, Chairman Pete Hoekstra, R-Mich., said on Fox News Sunday.

Hoekstra wrote to President Bush in May, warning him that failure to disclose intelligence activities to Congress may violate federal law. Hoekstra wrote that Congress “should not have to play ‘Twenty Questions' to get the information that it deserves under our Constitution.”

“I take it very, very seriously,” Hoekstra said Sunday. “We've now been briefed.”

The White House declined to comment directly on the allegations in Hoekstra's letter, disclosed in Sunday's New York Times. “We will continue to work closely with the chairman and other congressional leaders on important national security issues,” said Alex Conant, a White House spokesman.

Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Ind., told supporters in South Bend that if he runs for president his central theme would be to bring the country together. “I can be more of a force for reconciliation, and I think that's vitally important to our country right now,” Bayh said after returning from three days of campaigning in Iowa, which holds the first presidential contest in January 2008.

Bayh, whose father, Birch, was an unsuccessful candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1976, said he likely will decide whether to run after Thanksgiving. He said whether he can raise enough money to be a viable candidate will be part of the decision, but not the primary factor.

Former U.S. House majority leader Tom DeLay suggested Friday that he is considering running again for Congress after a judge said his name must remain on the fall ballot in Texas.

DeLay, who is awaiting trial on charges of money laundering and conspiracy in a Texas campaign finance case, won the Republican primary in March. He resigned June 9 and said he had moved to Virginia.

A federal judge ruled last week in favor of the Democratic Party, which sued to keep DeLay's name on the November ballot.

DeLay told supporters in Sugar Land, Texas, he would decide whether to run after a federal appeals court reviews the judge's ruling.

Congressman Says Program Was Disclosed By Informant (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau And Scott Shane

WASHINGTON, July 9 — The chairman of the House Intelligence Committee said Sunday that the Bush administration briefed the panel on a "significant" intelligence program only after a government whistle-blower alerted him to its existence and he pressed President Bush for details.

The chairman, Representative Peter Hoekstra, Republican of Michigan, wrote in a May 18 letter to Mr. Bush, first disclosed publicly on Saturday by The New York Times, that the administration's failure to notify his committee of this program and others could be a "violation of law."

Mr. Hoekstra expanded on his concerns in a television appearance on Sunday, saying that when the administration withholds information from Congress, "I take it very, very seriously."

Mr. Hoekstra and other officials would not discuss the nature of the undisclosed intelligence programs. But officials have said he was not referring to the National Security Agency's wiretapping operation or to the Treasury Department's bank monitoring program, both of which he was informed about. Mr. Hoekstra made clear on Sunday that he was particularly troubled by the failure to notify the Intelligence Committee of one particular major program.

"We can't be briefed on every little thing that they are doing," Mr. Hoekstra said in an interview on "Fox News Sunday." "But in this case, there was at least one major — what I consider significant — activity that we had not been briefed on that we have now been briefed on. And I want to set the standard there, that it is not optional for this president or any president or people in the executive community not to keep the intelligence committees fully informed of what they are doing."

The White House declined to comment on the issue Sunday but said last week that it would continue to work closely with Mr. Hoekstra and the intelligence committees.

The criticism of the White House was particularly surprising coming from a Republican committee chairman who has been an important ally of the Bush administration. Mr. Hoekstra has vigorously defended the administration's handling of a number of controversial issues, including the N.S.A. operation, the prewar intelligence on Iraq, and the treatment and interrogation of terrorism suspects.

Mr. Hoekstra has also been an outspoken critic of government employees who leak classified information to outsiders and of the news media for printing articles about it, and he has suggested that tougher legislation may be necessary.

But on Sunday, discussing how he learned of the administration's failure to brief the committee, Mr. Hoekstra said, "This is actually a case where the whistle-blower process was working appropriately."

"Some people within the intelligence community brought to my attention some programs that they believed we had not been briefed on," he said, adding, "They were right."

In talks with the administration, the committee "asked by code name what some of these programs" were, Mr. Hoekstra said. "We have now been briefed on those programs. But I wanted to reinforce to the president and to the executive branch and the intelligence community how important, and by law, the requirement that they keep the legislative branch informed of what they are doing."

Officials said in interviews last week that the administration had briefed the House Intelligence Committee at least twice in recent weeks, after Mr. Hoekstra's letter, to discuss details of the previously undisclosed programs. But some committee members say they remain wary that the administration is continuing to withhold information.

Regarding the leaks of classified information, Mr. Hoekstra said at a hearing on May 26 that he thought that there should be strong protections for intelligence agency whistle-blowers who bring their concerns to Congress, reducing the risk of leaks to the news media.

"We need to make sure the whistle-blower process is an open door," Mr. Hoekstra said at the hearing. Otherwise, he said, when intelligence officers see something they believe to be illegal or unwise, "they just go, 'Well, I'll just go to the press.' "

Congress is considering stronger protections for whistle-blowers, and a bill approved by the House Government Reform Committee in April would make it easier for intelligence agency employees to report concerns without fear of retaliation from superiors. But last month the Senate passed a separate whistle-blower bill that excludes employees of the intelligence agencies from its protections.

Hoekstra Urges Bush To Impart Intelligence Details (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Bush administration briefed top lawmakers on a significant intelligence program only after a key Republican committee chairman angrily complained of being left in the dark, the chairman said yesterday.

House intelligence committee Chairman Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.) would not describe the program, but he said it was significant enough that the administration should have briefed him and others voluntarily, without waiting for them to learn of it through government tipsters.

"There was at least one major -- what I consider significant -- activity that we had not been briefed on that we have now been briefed on," Hoekstra said on "Fox News Sunday." "Some people within the intelligence community brought to my attention some programs that they believed we had not been briefed on. They were right."

Hoekstra said the briefings took place after he complained in a May 18 letter to President Bush of hearing about "alleged Intelligence Community activities" not described to committee members in classified briefings. "If these allegations are true," he wrote to Bush, "they may represent a breach of responsibility by the Administration, a violation of law and . . . a direct affront to me and the Members of this committee."

Yesterday, Hoekstra appeared mollified. But he said he still believes the administration falls short of its legal obligations to brief key congressional members on significant intelligence operations.

"I wanted to reinforce to the president and to the executive branch and the intelligence community how important, and by law the requirement, that they keep the legislative branch informed of what they are doing," he said. "It is not optional for this president or any president or people in the executive community not to keep the intelligence committees fully informed of what they are doing."

Numerous Democrats and civil liberties groups have alleged that the administration ignores laws involving due process and congressional notification in conducting surveillance and intelligence programs in the name of fighting terrorism. Until Hoekstra's

May 18 letter was disclosed Saturday by the New York Times, the most prominent Republican questioning the administration's tactics was Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania.

Hoekstra's remarks left unclear the nature of the intelligence programs he alluded to in his letter. He did not specify whether they involved domestic surveillance, a contentious area in which newspapers have reported about programs involving warrantless wiretaps, extensive gathering of phone records and monitoring of international bank transactions. Hoekstra, like many other GOP lawmakers, has defended the programs as important tools in combating terrorism, and he has resisted Democrats' calls for full inquiries into the programs' legality.

Hoekstra also had shown deep interest in an April report by the National Ground Intelligence Center regarding 500 chemical munitions shells that Iraqi troops had buried in the 1980s, which were uncovered in 2004. Hoekstra and Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) have said the shells justify claims that deposed Iraqi president Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction, but the administration has not embraced those assertions. On June 29, Hoekstra complained in a letter to Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte about an administration background briefing for reporters that played down the shells' significance.

Sources said yesterday that they believe Hoekstra did not hear of the report on the shells until after he wrote to Bush.

An aide to Hoekstra said he could not elaborate on the chairman's letter to Bush or his remarks yesterday. The chairman did not respond to a request for an interview.

Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), the ranking Democrat on the House intelligence committee, said in a statement that she agrees with Hoekstra that "vigorous congressional oversight is impossible unless the administration shares critical information with the appropriate committees of Congress."

Lawmaker Questions Bush Intel Programs (AP-Y2)

By Nedra Pickler

AP2, July 10, 2006

The White House possibly broke the law by keeping intelligence activities a secret from the lawmakers responsible for overseeing them, the House Intelligence Committee chairman said Sunday.

Rep. Pete Hoekstra, R-Mich., said he was informed about the programs by whistleblowers in the intelligence community and then asked the Bush administration about the programs, using code names. Hoekstra said members of the House and Senate intelligence committees then were briefed on the programs, which he said is required by law.

"We can't be briefed on every little thing that they are doing," Hoekstra said. "But in this case, there was at least one major — what I consider significant activity that we have not been briefed on. I want to set the standard there that it is not optional for this president or any president or people in the executive community not to keep the intelligence committees fully informed of what they are doing," he said on "Fox News Sunday."

Hoekstra complained to President Bush in a letter dated May 18 that was disclosed in Sunday's New York Times.

In the letter, Hoekstra said the failure to brief the intelligence committees "may represent a breach of responsibility by the administration, a violation of law and, just as importantly, a direct affront to me and the members of this committee who have so ardently supported efforts to collect information on our enemies."

Frederick Jones, spokesman for Bush's National Security Council, said the only comment the White House would have on the letter was that the administration "will continue to work closely with the chairman and other congressional leaders on important national security issues."

Hoekstra has been critical of the administration before. In his letter, he also objected to the president's nominees for the director and deputy director of the CIA. He also complains about the role of the director of national intelligence — a position created in response to the Sept. 11 attacks.

Helping The Terrorists (WT)

By Jack O'Neill

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

Everyone entrusted with U.S. government classified information is legally bound to protect it. They may not reveal the data to anyone not authorized to receive it. Collectively our national security depends on that trust. There are no exceptions. Or are there? What about individuals who seek out media surrogates to reveal classified information for them? In return these individuals demand protection from exposure and legal action. How can they be protected from exposure and legal action for such serious offenses? By the media erecting a solid, impregnable First Amendment stonewall.

There it is. If you want to reveal information critical to our national security for any reason, turn it over to a reporter. Once the information is in the hands of a reporter, the reporter and his or her news media claim the authority to decide its relevance to our national security and who should know.

On Dec. 15, 2005, New York Times reporters James Risen and Eric Lichtblau revealed that government sources had handed them classified information on how the National Security Agency uses the Echelon eavesdropping system in our war with terrorists. As requested by their sources, the New York Times then revealed this critical information to the world. Terrorists worldwide now know the details of a critical tool in our war against them. It's a fact. There will now be far fewer "dots" for our intelligence community to identify and connect.

It's a no-brainer how the terrorists, our sworn enemies, reacted.

The New York Times explained why they are protecting their sources: The sources "were granted anonymity because of the classified nature of the program." The New York Times then explained why these sources had violated the trust our nation had placed in them: "because of their concerns about the operation's legality and oversight." On June 23 of this year, New York Times reporters Risen and Lichtblau told the world that the CIA and the Treasury Department were using bank transactions obtained from a Belgian cooperative to track suspected al Qaeda members. Yes, the New York Times permanently erased even more "dots."

Can you hear terrorists cheering? Should government sources that reveal classified information to reporters feel secure hiding behind media-erected stonewalls? Consider the case of Dr. Wen Ho Lee, the atomic scientist at the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico. He had been suspected of disclosing classified information to China.

During the media frenzy surrounding Dr. Lee, New York Times reporter Risen again reported information obtained from government sources. He wasn't alone. Along with the Times, reporters from The Washington Post, the Los Angeles Times, ABC News and the Associated Press all used information received from government sources during their hard-hitting media frenzy. Trouble is, Dr. Lee hadn't revealed any classified information. Dr. Lee sued the Energy and Justice departments, claiming they had violated his rights by revealing he was under investigation for being a spy.

During the federal trial, the reporters were ordered to reveal the government sources of their stories. The reporters refused. The federal judge held the reporters in contempt of court. The reporters faced fines and jail time. Their sources faced exposure.

The media organizations pleaded in federal court that the First Amendment protected the right of their reporters to refuse to identify their government sources. The media lost. The media appealed. Every appeal denied the existence of such First Amendment protection.

The media organizations were left with one last appeal -- to the Supreme Court. However, the Supreme Court had previously ruled that the First Amendment offered no such protection. If the media went to the Supreme Court and lost, their crumbling First Amendment stonewall would totally collapse. Their sources would be exposed in a public court, and the media would then be required to report the names of their sources to the world.

The legal staff of five media organizations jointly agreed that their only alternative was to buy their way out of their legal morass. They paid Dr. Lee $750,000 in order to void the contempt sanctions the judge had issued against the reporters.

In this case, the resources of media giants protected their reporters. Their reporters would not have to pay hefty fines or serve jail time.

But what about the media's anonymous sources that revealed the NSA's Echelon eavesdropping and the bank transactions used to track suspected al Qaeda members? Will the media giants commit all of their resources to protect and defend each and every one? Or will the media's anonymous sources be next to pay a price for erasing "dots"?

Investigations, Lawsuits Still Dogging 9/11 Lawyer (WP)

By Jerry Markon

Carla J. Martin's moment of infamy ended nearly as quickly as it began.

An obscure government lawyer, she had been a minor player in the most major of cases: the death penalty trial of Sept. 11, 2001, conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui. But that all changed in an instant, when she violated a court order by sharing testimony with witnesses and coaching them about what to say.

Suddenly, the former flight attendant rocketed across TV screens and newspaper front pages, cast as the villain whose misconduct nearly derailed the prosecution's case. Berated by a federal judge, Martin, 51, walked out of an Alexandria courtroom with her head down -- and back into anonymity.

But even as her public profile has diminished, Martin's actions have spawned a wave of legal proceedings. Federal prosecutors in Philadelphia are exploring the possibility of criminal charges against her, and Pennsylvania's lawyer disciplinary board has begun an investigation, according to court documents and sources familiar with the case. Martin remains on paid leave from the Transportation Security Administration, which is also investigating her conduct. And seven family members of Sept. 11 victims have filed suit against her in the District.

The woman at the center of the storm is emotionally distraught, crying when she talks about the criminal investigation and feeling like a prisoner in her own apartment, Martin's mother said last week.

"She's not doing very well. It's terrible, devastating for her," said Jean Martin Lay, who believes that her daughter did nothing wrong. "She doesn't do much of anything but stay at home, as far as I know."

Martin declined to comment through her attorney, Roscoe C. Howard Jr., who said: "She is doing probably as well as can be expected for somebody who is trying to see what her fate will be. We're just waiting to see how the government decides to proceed."

A longtime government aviation lawyer, Martin had been a liaison between the Moussaoui prosecutors and witnesses expected to testify about airport security. Although those witnesses were crucial to the government's argument that Moussaoui deserved to die for his role in the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, prosecutors said Martin's role was limited. She was merely a legal conduit who located files and arranged witness interviews and was never to be involved with legal strategy or litigating the case, they said.

Yet for reasons that remain a mystery, Martin e-mailed trial transcripts to seven witnesses and coached them on their testimony. In Alexandria, U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema had ruled that most witnesses could not attend or follow the trial and could not read transcripts to prevent them from altering their testimony to conform to what others had said.

An angry Brinkema halted the trial only a week after it had begun in March and accused Martin of "egregious errors" that undermined Moussaoui's constitutional rights. After an extraordinary hearing at which an agitated Martin declined to testify, the judge barred all seven witnesses from testifying -- effectively gutting the prosecution's argument for the execution of the only person convicted in an American courtroom in the Sept. 11 attacks.

Brinkema later allowed prosecutors to find new aviation witnesses not tainted by contact with Martin, and the trial resumed. Moussaoui was sentenced to life in prison in May. By that time, the criminal investigation of Martin was well underway, according to documents unsealed in U.S. District Court in Alexandria.

The U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria, which prosecuted Moussaoui, has recused itself from the investigation, which is being led by a Philadelphia-based assistant U.S. attorney and two FBI agents.

Members of the Moussaoui prosecution team have been interviewed about their dealings with Martin, along with some of her Transportation Security Administration colleagues, according to law enforcement sources and lawyers familiar with the investigation. They spoke on condition of anonymity because the probe is ongoing.

Prosecutors have indicated to Martin's attorneys that criminal charges are possible, sources said, but it remains unclear whether they would be filed in court. Among the charges being considered, sources said, is lying to a federal officer, a felony. Prosecutors have been questioning witnesses about an incident in which a member of the Moussaoui prosecution team, David J. Novak, sent a letter to Moussaoui's attorneys saying that aviation industry witnesses they were seeking would not meet with them.

After hearing testimony in March, Brinkema called the letter a "bald-faced lie." It was based on information from Martin, prosecutors said.

Martin has also been warned by Brinkema that she could be held in criminal or civil contempt of court for violating the court order. Either the judge or the Justice Department can initiate a criminal contempt investigation, but any such proceeding is considered unlikely before the criminal investigation is completed.

Martin has met with the Philadelphia prosecutors at least once to answer questions and has turned over documents and her laptop computer, according to court documents and lawyers familiar with the case. Martin's attorneys are trying to persuade the government not to file charges, sources said, and part of their strategy is to blame the Moussaoui criminal prosecutors for not telling Martin about the court order barring contact with witnesses.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Mary E. Crawley, who is leading the criminal investigation, said that because of the probe, "it would be inappropriate for me to say anything about that matter at this time." She declined to comment further.

Yolanda L. Clark, a spokeswoman for TSA, said that agency's investigation of Martin's conduct "is awaiting the conclusion of the criminal inquiry." Martin was a career Federal Aviation Administration lawyer who moved to the new TSA in 2002, largely because of her work on the case of the 1988 explosion of Pan Am Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland. The salary for her job title at TSA, an attorney adviser, is as much as $120,000.

The Disciplinary Board of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, through which Martin holds her law license, has also begun an investigation of Martin, according to law enforcement sources and a D.C. lawyer who filed an ethics complaint with the board about Martin's conduct in the Moussaoui case. The lawyer would not allow his name to be used, but he provided a copy of the complaint to The Washington Post. He said the board wrote him a letter saying his complaint was dismissed because the board had already initiated an investigation of Martin.

An official with the board did not return telephone calls.

Martin's attorneys have asked a federal judge in the District not to proceed with the civil suits against her until the criminal probe is completed. The suits, filed in U.S. District Court by seven people who lost relatives Sept. 11, argue that Martin "illegally coached witnesses and otherwise attempted to shade and alter evidence before the Moussaoui court" to help her "friends" in the airline industry avoid civil liability.

The seven Sept. 11 family members are among plaintiffs who have sued American Airlines, United Airlines and other defendants, alleging that they failed to prevent the attacks. Martin had been playing a role for TSA in that civil lawsuit that was similar to her role in the Moussaoui criminal case.

At a March court hearing in Alexandria, Brinkema speculated that Martin could have provided the testimony to the witnesses in the Moussaoui case out of "loyalty to the aviation industry." But the judge acknowledged that she didn't know what motivated Martin's actions and that they could have resulted from "overzealousness."

Al Qaeda Link To July 7 Sought (WT)

By Massoud Ansari

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

KARACHI, Pakistan -- Pakistani intelligence officials say they are on the trail of a British "go-between," the al Qaeda recruiter who reportedly introduced the July 7, 2005, bombers to Osama bin Laden's terrorist network, the Sunday Telegraph has learned.

The wealthy British passport holder, who is of Afghan origin, is thought to use the nom de guerre "Abdul Rehman," which means "willing disciple of God."

The Pakistani officials think that Rehman met the suspected attack ringleader Mohammad Sidique Khan, in a British mosque and later introduced him and fellow bomber Shehzad Tanweer to al Qaeda.

Rehman's recruiting role could prove crucial in piecing together al Qaeda's role in the London bombings. Rehman, thought to be in his 50s, is thought to have fought against the Russians in Afghanistan.

"When he was fighting against the Russians, he used to bring mujahedeen from the Western countries with him," an unidentified Pakistani official said. After the Russian withdrawal from Afghanistan, Rehman is thought to have recruited Muslim youths from the West to fight in Bosnia and Chechnya.

"He is very rich and quite often arranged funds for the militant organizations, before and after 9/11," the official added.

Rehman is thought to connect would-be terrorists to al Qaeda frontmen without necessarily being present when the two parties meet. He has succeeded in avoiding detection by operating on a small scale and exercising extreme caution, the official said.

"He passes on these individuals or small groups only when he is convinced that these boys are real jihadists," the official said.

The interest in Rehman's role developed only days after a video of Tanweer, in which he tried to justify his actions, was released to coincide with the first anniversary of the London bombings.

The video also featured a statement by Ayman al-Zawahri, al Qaeda's second in command. Al-Zawahri said Khan and Tanweer had been trained "in the manufacture of explosives" at camps run by the terrorist network.

Peter Clarke, the head of anti-terrorism at Scotland Yard, said last week that considerable uncertainty remained about exactly how, or whether, the July 7 bombers were linked to the terrorist network.

"It is not easy to find out what happened," Mr. Clarke said. "Such information as we do have does suggest there is probably a link to al Qaeda. We need to know who else, apart from the bombers, knew what they were planning. Did anyone encourage them? Did anyone help them with money, accommodation or expertise in bomb making?"

A Pakistani intelligence official said Rehman's role emerged in the interrogation of three militants arrested as they returned from Afghan terrorist training camps. He quoted one of the interrogated captives as saying: "Rehman had met with Khan in a mosque somewhere in [Britain], and Khan expressed his wish to obtain training to carry out terror attacks inside [Britain]."

It had been known that Khan and Tanweer traveled together to Pakistan between November 2004 and February 2005. It is now suspected that Khan, at least, was taken to a remote tribal area of Pakistan or Afghanistan. He was then put through a "crash course" in explosives training.

An intelligence official said: "This new course dispenses with much physical and mental training and lasts ... 10 to 15 days, while they impart various methods in explosives and detonators. This includes how to make suicide jackets, how to convert readily available goods like fertilizer into explosives, how to make car bombs and certain other tips."

Terrorism: From Al Qaeda—Plots And Promos (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, July 10, 2006

How real was the latest alleged New York terrorism threat? Several federal and local counterterrorism officials confirmed to NEWSWEEK that Lebanese authorities in April arrested a suspected Islamic militant for allegedly participating in a fairly elaborate plot to flood the PATH subway tunnels that carry New Jersey commuters to a station near Ground Zero in lower Manhattan. The officials, who asked for anonymity due to continuing investigations, said the plot involved blowing up a temporary barrier—called a slurry wall—that currently stops the Hudson River from flooding the site where the World Trade Center stood; according to the terrorists' plan, with the dike breached, water would pour into the cavity left by the 9/11 attacks and also undermine nearby skyscrapers and flood the trans-Hudson tunnels that carry PATH trains to New York from New Jersey. A federal counterterrorism official described the scheme as more "aspirational" than operational. Three of the officials said that while there was no evidence any of the latest New York plotters (two more plotters have been detained overseas and others are sought) had set foot on U.S. soil, the investigation was examining a possible Canadian connection.

News of the New York plot surfaced amid a flurry of new messages from Osama bin Laden, his chief deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri, and one of the suicide bombers in last July's attack on London. The new messages demonstrated the increasing media savvy of Al Qaeda's high command. A day or two before the release of one recent message from bin Laden, his media handlers issued Internet "teasers"—brief announcements declaring that a bin Laden message was about to be released. Later, an elaborately produced Qaeda message surfaced commemorating the London bombings; the presentation included a previously unseen extended English-language video of Shehzad Tanweer, one of the suicide bombers, and an American-accented Qaedite called Azzam the American. Zawahiri also appeared on tape to claim the London bombers had attended Qaeda camps (an assertion British and U.S. investigators have not yet validated). One of the U.S. counterterrorism officials said the use of promos and edited video packages with English speakers demonstrates the increasing sophistication of Al Qaeda's PR methods. The official also said the fact that Zawahiri appeared in recent video messages but bin Laden has appeared only in audio messages suggests the two terror leaders live apart, and that bin Laden is still stringently protecting himself.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

NYC, Miami Cases Show FBI Efforts To Pre-empt Plots (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, July 10, 2006

The plotters hadn't bought explosives or even been to the USA to scout their alleged target, but Web postings convinced the FBI that a plan to blow up and flood New York City's commuter tunnels was, as assistant director Mark Mershon put it, “the real deal.”

The arrests of the alleged plot's leader and two others, announced Friday, are typical of the FBI's post-Sept. 11 strategy in counterterrorism cases: detect and disrupt plots in their early stages rather than wait to collect additional evidence more likely to produce a conviction.

“The FBI is doing what they said they'd do,” says Brian Levin, director of the Center for the Study of Hate and Extremism at Cal State University in San Bernardino.

“Because someone is maybe laughable, or doesn't look like your idea of a polished terrorist doesn't mean they're not capable of maximum destruction. So you try never to take that chance.”

Friday's announcement followed the terrorism arrests last month of seven Miami men alleged to have discussed blowing up Chicago's Sears Tower.

The closest the men came to contacting al-Qaeda was meeting an FBI informant posing as a member of the terror group.

The cases have prompted some to suggest that the FBI is overstating the danger posed by wannabe jihadists.

“This is starting to look like the president's version of rounding up the usual suspects,” says Joseph Cirincione, national security analyst for the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank in Washington.

“There is a pattern of dramatic announcements, followed by revelations that these plots weren't as serious as we all initially thought.”

Security specialists say the New York City case also highlights the FBI's increased attention to Islamic jihad websites. Increasingly, terrorists are using chat rooms and e-mail for training, planning operations and recruiting members, says Walid Phares, a scholar of Islamic terrorism at the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies in Washington.

"With the decline of al-Qaeda as a centralized organization, (the Internet) has become the host for a 'virtual jihad,' " Phares says.

In New York City, FBI officials went public only after the Daily News reported details of the case, including the name of the alleged plot leader, Assem Hammoud, and his arrest in Lebanon in April.

The FBI moved because plotters "were about to go to a phase where they would attempt to surveil targets … and acquire the necessary resources to effectuate the attacks," Mershon said.

In a speech in May, deputy attorney general Paul McNulty credited this new "aggressive, proactive and preventative course of action" with winning 253 convictions in 435 terrorism cases since 2001. Cases are brought, he said, "at the moment our investigation reveals both a risk to our national security and a violation of our nation's laws."

Successful pre-emptive prosecutions include the cases of six Lackawanna, N.Y., men who sought terror training in Afghanistan, and six Portland, Ore., men and one woman who tried to travel to Afghanistan to fight with the Taliban. Six were arrested before they reached the battlefield.

Priority Shifts To Disruption Of Plots (WP)

By David B. Caruso

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

NEW YORK -- No one can know for sure whether an al-Qaida loyalist had what it took to follow through on a suspected plot to bomb Hudson River train tunnels. He had no explosives and no detailed plan, and isn't believed to have visited New York, authorities said.

But U.S. officials said they weren't willing to find out.

"We don't wait until someone has lit the fuse (to) step in and prevent something from happening. That would be playing games with peoples' lives," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Friday as Assem Hammoud's arrest in Lebanon was being announced.

Policy makers and security experts said the bust illustrates a shift in U.S. counterterrorism policy that has played out in other recent high-profile cases, including the arrest of seven men suspected of wanting to bomb Chicago's Sears Tower.

Law enforcers, they said, are now willing to act swiftly against al-Qaida sympathizers, even if it means grabbing wannabe terrorists whose plots may be only pipe dreams.

"Before 9/11, the FBI was thinking in terms of criminal convictions," said Rep. Peter King, chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee.

That meant waiting to act until investigators had hard evidence of a major crime, the New York Republican said. These days, he said, the priority is disruption.

"You may end up not winning it in court, but you get a bad guy off the street," he said.

Authorities announced the arrests of Hammoud and two suspected accomplices on Friday.

FBI Assistant Director Mark J. Mershon called the suspects the "real deal," but he described the suspected scheme as being in its earliest stages. The plotters had only talked about an attack, authorities said.

The announcement came two weeks after the arrest of an unconnected group of men in Miami and Georgia on charges that they were talking about blowing up skyscrapers in Chicago.

In that case, an FBI official described the group of mostly U.S. citizens as "more aspirational than operational," with no explosives, funding or ties to established terrorist organizations.

The formative nature of the suspected plots prompted skepticism.

Joseph Cirincione, a national security analyst for the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank, said he worried that the arrests of rather minor conspirators were being played up for political purposes.

"This is starting to look like the president's version of rounding up the usual suspects," he said. "There is a pattern of dramatic announcements, followed by revelations that these plots weren't as serious as we all initially thought."

Some of the suspected plots taken to trial in the past few years have appeared to be unsophisticated, but that hasn't hurt prosecutors in court.

In May, a Brooklyn man, Shahawar Matin Siraj, was convicted of plotting to plant a bomb in a Manhattan subway station, despite defense claims that he was a patsy coaxed into discussing a bombing by a government informant.

In April, a federal jury convicted a young farm worker in Lodi, Calif., of supporting terrorists by visiting an al-Qaida training camp during a trip to Pakistan. Prosecutors claimed Hamid Hayat was interested in attacking hospitals, banks and grocery stores, but they presented no evidence of actual planning of such assaults at trial.

DOJ_NMG_0038955

In November, a young, outwardly pro-American Pakistani man was convicted in New York of trying to help an al-Qaida operative sneak into the United States, despite his claims that he wasn't aware that the acquaintance of his father's was a terrorist.

Chertoff said it would be a mistake to assume that the only terrorist "is the kind of guy you see on television, who's kind of a James Bond type."

"The fact of the matter is, mixing a bomb in a bathtub does not necessarily take rocket scientists," Chertoff said. "We would be dangerously putting people at risk if somehow we believed that only criminal masterminds or terrorist masterminds were threats."

In a speech to the American Enterprise Institute in May, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty defended government pursuit of groups that had not yet advanced to violence.

"In the wake of Sept. 11, this aggressive, proactive and preventative course is the only acceptable response from a department of government charged with enforcing our laws and protecting the American people," McNulty said.

Bag Searches Become Routine On NYC Subway (AP-Y2)

By Tom Hays

AP2, July 10, 2006

It was billed as a necessary counterterrorism tactic after the deadly mass transit bombings in London: Anyone entering the city's sprawling subway system could be subjected to a random search of backpacks, briefcases and shopping bags.

One year and countless searches later, the practice once thought of as a temporary imposition, with the potential to trample civil rights, remains in effect and is barely causing a stir.

"We consider it a valuable tactic to use," Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly said in a recent interview. "It's not a panacea, it's not a cure-all, but it's another tool in our toolbox."

Officials won't say how many bags police have searched in the past year, or specify where and when they do it. Unpredictable deployment keeps would-be bombers off balance, they say.

The program has resulted in five arrests — not for terrorism, but for drug possession, disorderly conduct and other minor charges.

Still, the nation's largest police department considers the city's 468 subway stations and the average 4.5 million riders who use them daily on average to be ripe targets for terrorism. The subway inspections are just one element of a counterterrorism program that costs the NYPD roughly $200 million a year.

Each day, police set up checkpoints in a handful of stations across the city, often during the afternoon rush. A typical checkpoint has three uniformed officers equipped with a folding table and flashlights used to peer into bags, a far cry from the elaborate screening stations in airports.

At a checkpoint at the Wall Street subway stop last week, about every 10th person was stopped for a search that lasted perhaps 10 seconds. The officers shooed away some commuters who tried to voluntarily open their bags for inspection.

If the chosen were bothered, it didn't show.

"I'm trying to make a train, but it's OK," said Eric Mergenthaler, a 38-year-old stock trader. "I understand why they're doing it."

The New York Civil Liberties Union believed the searches were such violations of privacy that it went to court last year to stop them. A federal judge disagreed, saying that following the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks the need for such measures was "indisputable, pressing, ongoing and evolving."

The NYCLU has appealed. Its lawyers argue the searches are too infrequent to be a real deterrent, yet frequent enough to violate constitutional rights.

"We're in favor of making people feel comfortable, but not at the expense of the Constitution," said NYCLU Legal Director Christopher Dunn.

Kelly cited a poll of registered voters last year that found 72 percent favored the program.

"The public seems to be happy with it, and the cops are positive about it," he said of the search program. "I think so far it's worked very, very well."

Storm Damage As Hurricane Season Begins, Disaster Insurance Runs Short (WSJ)

By Liam Pleven, Ian Mcdonald And Karen Richardson

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

Last year's violent hurricanes continue to roil a vital corner of the insurance industry: Demand for disaster coverage is far outstripping supply, and the consequences are rippling through the economy.

The crunch isn't coming just because companies and individuals are buying more insurance. Insurers themselves, anticipating future destructive storms, are trying to buy more coverage on the policies they write -- a crucial segment of the business known as reinsurance. But reinsurers, which also paid out billions last year, are wary of getting hit hard again and have raised their rates substantially. Businesses and homeowners are paying the price.

In late January, a private-equity fund called First Reserve Corp. discovered firsthand how much the market has changed. The Greenwich, Conn., firm wanted to buy an oil-and-gas platform in the Gulf of Mexico. During a conference call with colleagues in Houston, the fund's executives learned that insuring the project would cost about $25 million a year, not the $2 million they'd expected.

"That kind of shut the room up," says Mark McComiskey, a managing director at First Reserve. The firm decided to kill the deal.

In the wake of Hurricane Katrina, billions of dollars poured into the insurance industry from investors hoping to profit from rising premiums. After hard hurricane seasons, such cash influxes often buoy insurers and help stabilize premiums.

But this time, the new capital was insufficient to soak up the increase in demand. "There's just this loud sucking sound in the market now," says J.C. Sparling, an executive vice president at Mercator Risk Services Inc., an insurance brokerage.

Disaster-insurance rates have risen so sharply that businesses with exposure to hurricanes are canceling projects, paying more for whatever coverage they can get, and in some cases, going without insurance altogether.

CDC Publishing LLC, a Vero Beach, Fla., firm that publishes construction-industry data, says it's spending 12 times as much for hurricane insurance as it did last year. Pinnacle Entertainment Inc., a Las Vegas-based hotel and gaming firm, cut its weather-catastrophe coverage from $400 million to $100 million after suffering extensive damage at a Biloxi, Miss., casino last year.

And Wal-Mart Stores Inc. said in May it would drop its coverage for severe windstorms because it had become too expensive. Instead, the retailer will cover losses from such storms out of its own pocket.

Some insurance players are stepping into the void. Hedge funds and private-equity firms are pouring billions of dollars into new and risky investment vehicles that provide capital to back coverage for specific risks. In addition, Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway Inc. seems to be betting big on reinsurance even as other investors pull back.

"If you like to watch football, you probably enjoy the game a little more if you have a bet on it," says Mr. Buffett. "I like to watch the Weather Channel."

After last season's devastating hurricanes, companies that predict the cost of storms rolled out new computer programs that foretold a mounting toll from future hurricanes. In addition, rating services such as A.M. Best Co. Inc. changed their approaches to judging the financial strength of insurers that write catastrophe policies. As a result, many insurers have to keep more cash in reserve to back up their policies.

After seven costly hurricanes in two years, insurers also are questioning how much risk they want to take in vulnerable coastal areas. The shortage of available coverage is particularly acute in the reinsurance sector, where insurers buy coverage against the policies they write. Hurricane Katrina caused nearly $40 billion in insured losses, and reinsurers covered more than half that total, according to Guy Carpenter & Co., a reinsurance brokerage unit of Marsh & McLennan Cos.

The cost of property-catastrophe reinsurance is projected to rise 25% this year, according to Robert Hartwig, chief economist at the Insurance Information Institute, a trade group. In hurricane-prone areas, rates are rising as much as fourfold, he says.

"There have been times where no matter what the price was, we've had a difficult time finding the [coverage] we need," says Dee Megna, the vice chairman of Guy Carpenter. "It's similar to the situation we saw post-Hurricane Andrew in 1993 and post-9/11, but this is actually worse than those two."

The depth of the shortage has taken the industry by surprise in recent months. Paul Karon, chief executive of Benfield Inc., a U.S. reinsurance broker owned by the United Kingdom's Benfield Group Ltd., says prices for renewals rose about 25% on average on Jan. 1. By contrast, he said, June 1 prices doubled compared with the year earlier.

Allstate Corp., one of the nation's largest property insurers, bought significantly more catastrophe reinsurance than it had in the past. In last year's third quarter, the company registered a $1.55 billion hurricane-related loss. Earlier this year, it paid $400 million for $2 billion worth of reinsurance coverage for losses from hurricanes and other catastrophes.

Last year, U.S.-based insurers purchased about $37.5 billion in catastrophe reinsurance coverage, according to Benfield. This year, they will buy about $47.5 billion worth, a 27% increase, the firm says.

Allstate is aware that such coverage is getting harder to find. Referring to its deal earlier this year, Michael Trevino, a company spokesman, says: "I would guess we couldn't get it today."

There are many indications that Mr. Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway, which had $115.5 billion in cash and invested assets on hand at the end of March, is stepping into the fray. Berkshire boasts rare and coveted top ratings from services such as A.M. Best, Standard & Poor's, and Moody's.

The company's exact commitment to the hurricane business can't be learned, but people familiar with Berkshire's business say it's writing more reinsurance on oil rigs than in previous years. In addition, others in the insurance industry say they've noticed the company's increased presence.

"They were more active with us in the U.S. than they've ever been," says Mr. Karon of Benfield.

Mr. Buffett declined to comment specifically on how much Berkshire is underwriting. In his latest annual letter to shareholders, Mr. Buffett said he was willing to take on billions of dollars in risk if he got paid enough.

"If prices seem appropriate, however, we continue to have both the ability and the appetite to be the largest writer of mega-cat coverage in the world," he said.

One indication of Berkshire's activity: Berkshire Hathaway Reinsurance Group reported a 19% increase in the premiums it receives for writing catastrophe reinsurance in the first quarter, to $425 million. That increase follows a 22% increase in the previous quarter, compared with a year earlier.

Berkshire also sells insurance directly to businesses. Harrah's Entertainment Inc. went to Berkshire directly last December when it was facing a shortfall in coverage from other insurers after suffering big hurricane damage.

"They were one of the very few who were able to take a lead, primary position on an account such as ours," says Lance Ewing, risk manager for the company.

The reinsurance business is also getting a helping hand from Wall Street. Some firms are using a financial vehicle known as a sidecar. With sidecars, investors -- often hedge funds -- provide capital to back coverage for very specific risks, such as damage to gas rigs or Florida homes. Investing in a reinsurance company exposes investors to all kinds of insurance risks; a sidecar allows them to be more choosy.

If disaster strikes, the capital is tapped. If not, investors get their money back, plus premiums paid by policy holders. Benfield set up a sidecar with partners that raised about $310 million, which backs up policies it has taken on. Since Katrina, investors have sunk more than $3.2 billion into sidecars.

"You're betting on three months of weather, and then you're out," says Mr. Karon.

Benfield's sidecar proved very useful to Dale Hammond's company. His Homewise Insurance Group of Tampa, Fla., insures about 35,000 homes in Florida, largely against hurricane damage. The sidecar made possible 17.5% of the reinsurance the company wanted. "It was a good, creative solution using the financial markets," says Mr. Hammond.

Another, more-established route is catastrophe bonds. Investors get their cash back and an allotted return -- these days in excess of 10% -- if storms don't hit at a certain place and time. If a storm hits and losses rise above a stipulated level, insurers can tap investors' money to pay off claims. Insurers have raised about $2 billion so far this year through catastrophe bonds, as much as in all of 2005.

While creative, none of these solutions can keep up with demand. On May 9, an Atlanta, Ga., insurer, RSUI Group Inc., a part of Alleghany Insurance Holdings LLC, told agents it had not bought all the reinsurance it wanted. As a result, it wouldn't offer new hurricane insurance along the coast between North Carolina and East Texas, with a few exceptions.

Homeowners have had similar experiences in places like Florida, but individuals in many states have a backstop. In Florida, they can buy insurance from Citizens Property Insurance Corp., a state-created insurer of last resort that sells coverage to individuals who can't find it elsewhere.

For companies, on the other hand, the crunch could get costly. Wal-Mart's chief financial officer, Tom Schoewe, told analysts in May that storm coverage offered to the mammoth retailer this year was "substantially more limited and higher-priced" than previously.

Mr. Schoewe said buying coverage "did not make sense for Wal-Mart." Instead, the retailer is insuring itself. Wal-Mart wasn't specific about how it would do that -- and a spokesman declined further comment -- but typical options include paying for damage out of pocket or setting up its own insurance business.

If Wal-Mart had self-insured during its financial year ended January 31, 2005, that would have cost the company two cents in earnings per share, due to that year's storms. In fiscal 2006, the impact would have been four cents, according to Mr. Schoewe. That would have cut the company's net income by an estimated $168 million, or 1.5%, according to investment bank Goldman Sachs Group Inc.

Casino-operator Pinnacle Entertainment is taking risks beyond cards and roulette. After Hurricane Katrina, the company's Biloxi casino barge was found several hundred feet from the water on the other side of a highway, according to company disclosures at the time. Back then, Pinnacle had $400 million in coverage per storm, according to regulatory filings. Last month, the company told shareholders that due to tighter supply and higher rates, effective April 1 it has only $100 million per storm in weather-catastrophe coverage.

"It is unlikely that Pinnacle will obtain any additional coverage covering these risks this year," the company said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission. A spokeswoman declines to comment.

The insurance industry is "going to drive commercial enterprises out of certain areas in this country," says Bill Black, president of CDC Publishing, which has three offices in Florida.

Last year, the company paid $10,000 in premiums for hurricane and business-interruption coverage. This spring, the premiums went up to $120,000. Another jump of a similar magnitude, Mr. Black says, could force him to consider relocating his Florida offices.

WAR NEWS:

Attacks In Iraq Intensify Sunni-Shiite Violence (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, July 10, 2006

BAGHDAD — Masked Shiite gunmen roamed through a west Baghdad neighborhood Sunday, dragging Sunnis from their cars or picking them out on the street and killing them in a rampage that police said killed 41 people — a dramatic escalation of sectarian violence.

Hours later, two car bombs exploded near a Shiite mosque in the city's north, killing 17 people and wounding 38 in what appeared to be a reprisal attack, police said.

Black-clad Shiite militiamen manned checkpoints on roads into most major Shiite neighborhoods to guard against revenge attacks, as scattered clashes occurred across the Iraqi capital.

Sunni leaders expressed outrage over the killings, and President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, appealed for calm, warning that the nation stood “in front of a dangerous precipice.”

A senior government official, Haidar Majid, contested the police figures, saying late Sunday that only nine people died in the area of Jihad. Police Lt. Mohammed Khayoun insisted the figure of 41 was correct — with 24 bodies taken to Yarmouk hospital and 17 to the city morgue. The discrepancy could not be reconciled.

The attack could further enflame Shiite-Sunni tensions.

The trouble started about 10 a.m. when several carloads of gunmen drove into the Jihad area along the main road to Baghdad International Airport, police and witnesses said. The gunmen stopped cars, checked passengers' identification cards and shot dead those with Sunni names.

U.S. and Iraqi forces sealed off the area. Smoke from burning tires wafted through the streets. A U.S. military statement said coalition and Iraqi forces found 11 bodies.

A Shiite shopkeeper said he saw heavily armed men pull four people out of a car, blindfold them and force them to stand to the side while they grabbed five others out of a minivan.

“After 10 minutes, the gunmen took the nine people to a place a few meters away from the market and opened fire on them,” Saad Jawad al-Azzawi said.

Wissam Mohammad al-Ani, a Sunni, said three gunmen stopped him as he was walking toward a bus stop and demanded his identification. They let him go after he produced a fake ID with a Shiite name, but they seized two young men standing nearby.

The violence comes a day after a Saturday night car bombing at a Shiite mosque that killed two people and wounded nine.

The spokesman for a Sunni clerical association, Mohammed Beshar al-Faydhi, blamed the Jihad attack on the Mahdi Army militia, led by radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Al-Faydhi told Al-Jazeera television that he had documents to prove it.

Al-Sadr denied responsibility and called on both Shiites and Sunnis to “join hands for the sake of Iraq's independence and stability.” He assured Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, leader of the largest Sunni Arab party, that he would punish any of his militiamen if they were involved.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, has promised to disband Shiite militias and other armed groups, which are blamed for much of the sectarian violence. On Friday, Iraqi troops backed by U.S. jets raided a Shiite militia stronghold in Baghdad's Sadr City neighborhood, killing and wounding dozens of people.

Scores Of Sunnis Killed In Baghdad (WP)

BAGHDAD, July 9 -- Shiite Muslim militiamen rampaged through a Sunni Arab neighborhood in Baghdad early Sunday morning, killing more than 50 people and discarding bodies in the streets, according to Iraqi officials and witnesses. Hours later, attackers struck back, detonating two car bombs near a Shiite mosque.

Sunni politicians described the violence against the Sunni residents of the al-Jihad neighborhood in western Baghdad as one of the deadliest waves of murder since the aftermath of the U.S.-led invasion in 2003.

The killings occurred on a day when the U.S. military announced charges against four soldiers in the alleged rape and murder of a girl and the killing of three members of her family in the southern Iraqi town of Mahmudiyah. [Details, A14.]

Sectarian killings escalated sharply across Iraq after a bomb destroyed a revered golden-domed Shiite shrine in Samarra on Feb. 22. The bombing prompted reprisal attacks on Sunni mosques and pushed the country further toward all-out civil war.

In Baghdad on Sunday, the armed men, some wearing masks and dressed in black, descended on the al-Jihad neighborhood in buses after sunrise. They set up checkpoints along a main commercial street, demanded identification cards from passersby and burst into homes to single out Sunni Arabs to kill, residents said.

One resident, Hazim al-Rawi, said he gathered up his family and fled the neighborhood after he saw 15 bodies outside his home.

"Some of them were tortured with drills," he said of the bodies. "Some of them were hanged by ropes."

A U.S. military spokesman said that Iraqi national police and American soldiers found 11 dead Iraqis in three locations in the neighborhood. The higher casualty reports "do not marry up with what we have found," Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington said.

Still, Sunni politicians said the spate of attacks gravely exacerbated the problems in Baghdad, where killings occur almost daily, and they accused Iraqi police of collaborating with Shiite militiamen in the violence.

"This is a new step. A red line has been crossed," said Alaa Makky, a Sunni member of parliament. "People have been killed in the streets; now they are killed inside their homes."

Attackers retaliated by detonating two bombs in cars parked at al-Timim Shiite mosque in central Baghdad. At least 12 people were killed, including five policemen, and 18 were wounded, according to Lt. Col. Memduh Abdulla of the Rusafa police district. The Associated Press reported that 17 people were killed and 38 hurt.

"We've said it several times that there are people who want to create civil war," Wafiq al-Samarrae, an adviser to Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, said on al-Jazeera television. "Today, this country is on the edge of civil war, not sectarian strife."

Police picked up 57 bodies from the al-Jihad neighborhood, and three Interior Ministry policemen were also killed there, said Ali Hussein, a commando with the Interior Ministry who ferried bodies to Baghdad's Yarmouk Hospital. Gen. Saad Mohammed al-Tamini of the Interior Ministry confirmed that more than 50 people were killed.

Some of the corpses that littered the streets lay handcuffed, pocked with bullet holes, while others were pierced with bolts and nails, witnesses said.

Iraqi officials and residents of the neighborhood identified the gunmen as members of the Mahdi Army, the powerful militia controlled by the radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. In the past three days, Iraqi troops, with the support of U.S.-led forces, have raided the homes of militiamen and detained some of their leaders.

U.S. commanders and diplomats say Sadr and his militia constitute one of the gravest threats to Iraq's security. Two years ago, U.S. forces fought Mahdi Army militiamen in Baghdad and in the southern holy city of Najaf. Sadr also holds considerable sway over the political system, with ties to more than 30 members of parliament and several cabinet ministers.

On Sunday, Iraq's deputy prime minister for security affairs, Salam al-Zobaie, accused the Defense and Interior ministries of working with the militias to carry out the killings.

"Interior and Defense ministries are infiltrated, and there are officials who lead brigades who are involved in this," Zobaie said in an interview on al-Jazeera. "What is happening now is an ugly slaughter."

After the killings, Sadr appealed for calm but criticized what he called a "Western scheme" that foments "a civil and sectarian war among brothers."

"Iraq is passing through a critical phase and a worsening security situation in spite of the presence of an independent government," Sadr said in a statement. "I call on all parties, both governmental and popular, to exercise self-control first, and to shoulder their responsibility before God and society."

Other officials in Sadr's organization condemned the killings in al-Jihad and denied that the Mahdi Army was involved.

"We regret the statements made by some Sunni Arabs who said that the Mahdi Army militia had conducted the raid at Jihad and killed the innocent people there," said Riyadh al-Nouri, a top aide to Sadr and his brother-in-law. "If the Mahdi Army wanted to enter into a fight, Iraq would become a blood bath."

In al-Jihad, a predominantly Sunni neighborhood along the road to Baghdad International Airport, police in white pickup trucks patrolled the roads. Fighters gathered in the streets holding rocket launchers and belts of machine-gun ammunition while helicopters swarmed overhead. A hot wind scoured the neighborhood, scattering the black smoke that billowed from burning tires.

The Iraqi government later imposed a daytime curfew in the neighborhood, and mosque loudspeakers broadcast warnings that residents should flee or they would be killed.

Hayider Hussein, a resident, said that outside his house, militiamen were milling around a minibus in which the bodies of the driver and a dozen passengers could be seen.

"They were all shot in the head," he said.

Ali Muhsin, 58, a retiree who lives in the neighborhood, said he saw gunmen in three cars pull up near his house and begin shooting people. Four corpses lay on the ground about 100 yards from his door and he saw four other people shot at a vegetable market nearby, he said.

Muhsin described seeing gunmen get out of a sedan, remove two bodies from the trunk "and throw them on the street."

Residents said the violence stemmed from a car bomb attack on the Shiite al-Zahra mosque Saturday night, expanding into door-to-door pursuit of Sunnis by Shiites.

Outside the morgue at the Yarmouk Hospital, a distraught woman wearing a red head scarf searched for her missing brother. At 7 a.m., she said, black-clad gunmen broke into her house and demanded to know the family's tribal name. When her brother responded "Jubour," one of the gunmen said, "You are definitely Sunnis."

"I swear on Hussein, I swear on Ali, that we are Shiites," her brother, Muzahim Salman, pleaded, referring to relatives of the prophet Muhammad who are revered by Shiites.

The gunmen locked the woman, who refused to give her full name, and her mother in a room before kidnapping her brother. A half-hour later, she said, she called her brother's cellphone.

"The man who answered said: 'We are the Mahdi Army. We killed your brother. Go to the morgue and pick up his body.' "

Sectarian Fighting Intensifies In Baghdad (LAT)

By J. Michael Kennedy And Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, July 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Shiite militiamen and Sunni Arab insurgents went on murderous sprees here Sunday, killing at least 60 people in shootings and bombings in a bloody outbreak that raised the specter of a city sinking deeper into sectarian warfare.

The Sunday-morning killings of at least 36 Sunni Arab men by Shiite militiamen in the Jihad neighborhood, in apparent retaliation for a mosque bombing the previous night, were among the most serious examples of open street warfare between Shiites and Sunnis to date.

The execution-style killings immediately set off a political firestorm, with one Sunni leader accusing the government of negligence and Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, downplaying the events, insisting that the "situation in Baghdad is under control."

But as dusk settled, a pair of car bombs apparently set off by Sunni Arab insurgents damaged a Shiite mosque in a northern Baghdad neighborhood, killing at least 19 worshippers and wounding 59 others, possibly setting the stage for another round of reprisal killings by Shiite gunmen.

The violence came in the same day that the U.S. military announced that five more U.S. soldiers had been charged in connection with the alleged rape of an Iraqi and the slaying of the young woman and her family in March. Four soldiers were charged with rape and murder, the fifth with dereliction of duty. None was named.

Last week, a former U.S. Army private, Steven D. Green, was charged with rape and murder in federal court in Charlotte, N.C. He pleaded not guilty.

The sectarian violence underscored a dramatic worsening of security conditions in the capital even after the formation of a government in May and the imposition of a massive lockdown by Iraqi troops and police. It also raised fears that the beleaguered country might soon dissolve into all-out civil war.

Sunni Arab politicians, who have already threatened to pull out of the nascent government, blamed the violence on Shiites, demanding that security forces crack down on militias who are believed to operate in part out of the security services.

"Acts of militias are now being expanded in Baghdad and they have become a source of concern and harm to people," said Vice President Tariq Hashimi, the head of the largest Sunni Party, adding that the government needed to "safeguard the lives of the innocent, who have become targets for these militias."

Violence in the religiously mixed Jihad neighborhood began Saturday morning after a suicide bombing at a Shiite mosque killed at least eight worshippers and passersby, officials said.

Early Sunday morning, militiamen began roaming the neighborhood and setting up checkpoints, asking those trying to pass through to show their identity papers, which give name and tribe -- both clues to whether the bearer might be Sunni or Shiite.

One witness, who asked not to be identified, said Shiite gunmen took to the streets about 7 a.m. and established a roadblock a short distance from his home. He said a neighbor of his, a Sunni, was loaded on to a bus filled with gunmen after he showed his identity papers.

"There have been some problems in this neighborhood," said the witness. "But it never reached killing because you showed the wrong identification card."

By midmorning, a number of bodies were strewn about the streets and Sunni insurgents had set up their own roadblocks nearby in retaliation.

A hospital official where bodies were taken said at least 36 young Sunni men were killed, many pulled from their home or vehicles. Also among the dead from the Jihad fighting was a Shiite family of five, a mother and four children, who were killed when gunmen tossed a grenade into their home, hospital officials who received the victims said.

At midmorning, Iraqi and U.S. troops sealed off the area, with helicopters whizzing above. The neighborhood is only a short distance from the U.S. military headquarters here, located adjacent to the Baghdad International Airport.

The Saturday-night car bomb that apparently triggered the attack took place a short distance from the Zahra Shiite mosque. At least eight people were killed and more than a dozen others were wounded in the explosion, a hospital official said.

A number of Shiite and Sunni mosques have been attacked in recent days, each apparently in reprisal for the other.

In the aftermath of the killings Sunday morning, the prime minister's office issued a brief statement saying that some media reports overstated the seriousness of the situation.

"The situation in Baghdad is under control and the concerned apparatuses are dealing with what is going on," said the statement.

However, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, described Iraq as being "upon a dangerous edge." He called on Iraqis to remain calm and avoid any immediate response to the killings, but also to be watchful.

"What happened today requires us to be honest with ourselves and others to condemn these horrendous actions loudly," he said.

Also Sunday, two Sunni clerics from the Muslim Scholars Association were killed in Samarra as they were driving away from a local mosque. A car pulled alongside them and gunmen dressed in camouflage and black masks shot the clerics and sped off.

Officials in the increasingly violent northern city of Kirkuk, at the heart of a volatile oil-rich province claimed by ethnic Kurds, Arabs and Turkoman, said at least four police and civilians were killed and six injured in various shootings and bombings throughout the city.

Gunmen Massacre Dozens In Baghdad (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, July 10, 2006

Gunmen massacred dozens of people in a Sunni district of Baghdad on Sunday, in what appears to be an escalation of the sectarian violence which has engulfed the country for nearly five months.

Bombings and abductions are common in many parts of the city, but this was one of the first times a group of gunmen had taken control of a section of Baghdad and conducted a massacre on this scale.

The interior ministry said at least 42 people had been killed in the attack in the Jihad district, a possible reprisal for the Saturday car-bombing of a nearby Shia mosque that killed three.

Iraqi security sources quoted by wire agencies said the gunmen had set up fake police checkpoints and pulled motorists from cars, or checked identity papers for Sunni names, before gunning their victims down.

Residents and Sunni politicians blamed the Mahdi Army, loyal to radical Shia leader Muqtada al-Sadr, for the massacre, but Sadrist spokesmen denied responsibility. Sadrist sympathisers say the militia targets only known extremists who carry out attacks against the Shia.

Shia militants have recently given signs of imitating some of the tactics of the more radical Sunni groups. Last week, presumed militiamen kidnapped a Sunni legislator, Tayseer al-Mashhadani, and sources in the Iraq Islamic Party to which she belongs say her abductors have issued demands including release of detainees and a halt to the bombing of Shia mosques.

As a result, the main Sunni coalition has boycotted parliament and says it is considering pulling its four ministers out of the cabinet, which would be a significant setback to Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

Iraqi security forces appear to be cracking down on the militias. The US military reported that Iraqi soldiers had raided a militant stronghold early on Sunday in the Shia district of Kadhemiya, killing nine and capturing seven.

Meanwhile, four more US soldiers were charged with rape and murder and a fifth with dereliction of duty in the alleged massacre of a family in the district of Mahmudiya, south of Baghdad.

Baghdad Erupts In Mob Violence (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, July 9 — A mob of gunmen went on a brazen daytime rampage through a predominantly Sunni Arab district of western Baghdad on Sunday, pulling people from their cars and homes and killing them in what officials and residents called a spasm of revenge by Shiite militias for the bombing of a Shiite mosque on Saturday. Hours later, two car bombs exploded beside a Shiite mosque in another Baghdad neighborhood in a deadly act of what appeared to be retaliation.

While Baghdad has been ravaged by Sunni-Shiite bloodletting in recent months, even by recent standards the violence here on Sunday was frightening, delivered with impunity by gun-wielding vigilantes on the street. In the culture of revenge that has seized Iraq, residents all over the city braced for an escalation in the cycle of retributive mayhem between the Shiites and Sunnis that has threatened to expand into civil war.

The violence coincided with an announcement by American military officials that they had formally accused four more American soldiers of rape and murder, and a fifth soldier of "dereliction of duty" for failing to report the crimes, in connection with the deaths of a teenage Iraqi girl and three members of her family.

With movement in Baghdad difficult after a military cordon was established to suppress the violence, facts were hard to ascertain. The death toll from the shootings alone ranged from fewer than a dozen, according to the American military, to more than 40 reported by some news services. The bombing near the mosque later claimed at least 19 lives and left 59 wounded, officials said.

The military's announcement about the soldiers brought to six the number implicated in the rape-murder, one more than previously disclosed. The case has enraged Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and led to apologies by the highest American military and civilian officials in Iraq. A photograph of the girl's passport distributed by news agencies on Sunday showed that she was 14.

Only seven weeks old, Mr. Maliki's government is facing increasingly difficult obstacles. Worsening violence has undermined his intention to disarm the country's sectarian militias. At the same time, the growing furor over criminal accusations against American troops has tested Mr. Maliki's divided loyalties to his American allies and to an Iraqi public that has grown weary of the American presence.

The killings on Sunday in the western Baghdad neighborhood of Jihad began in late morning, near the site of a car bomb explosion in front of a Shiite mosque on Saturday, residents and officials said. Initial reports said the bombing had killed three people, but the American military said Sunday that at least 12 people, including 3 children, had died in the blast, and at least 18 had been wounded.

According to some residents and Sunni Arab officials interviewed by telephone, the gunmen, whom they accused of being members of a feared Shiite militia, the Mahdi Army, set up checkpoints around the neighborhood, indiscriminately pulled scores of Sunni Arabs from their homes and cars and killed them on the street. Other bodies were found with their hands bound behind their backs and gunshots in their heads, residents said.

But as often happens in Iraq, accounts of the violence varied widely. Residents and some Iraqi officials said in interviews that more than 35 people had been killed in the attacks. The Associated Press quoted Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razzaq of the Iraqi police as saying that 41 bodies had been taken to hospitals. And an official at Yarmouk Hospital, the main medical center in western Baghdad, said in a telephone interview that at least 23 bodies had been delivered from Jihad, and 10 people had arrived wounded from the shootings.

But American and some Iraqi security officials said the casualty figures were far lower. Lt. Col. Jonathan B. Withington, spokesman for the Fourth Infantry Division, which oversees security around Baghdad, said the Iraqi police had reported finding only 11 bodies. It was unclear whether that toll included victims delivered to the morgue.

American and Iraqi security officials also said they could not confirm the accounts of the seemingly arbitrary street killings, and Colonel Withington said the Iraqi security forces were mobilized immediately after reports of "sporadic gunfire" in Jihad. By early afternoon, Iraqi and American forces had sealed off the neighborhood, officials said.

Several prominent Sunni Arab political and religious leaders criticized the Iraqi and American security forces for their inability to control the violence. In comments broadcast on Al Jazeera, Salam al-Zubaie, a deputy prime minister and a Sunni, called the events in Jihad "a real massacre," and suggested that the country's Shiite-led security forces were to blame because they had been infiltrated by militiamen. The government forces, he said, "coordinate with these filthy terror groups who are roaming the streets."

Mr. Maliki's office, in a statement, tried to distance itself from Mr. Zubaie's comments, saying "they do not represent the government's point of view." Mr. Maliki, a Shiite, has vowed to crack down on militias regardless of sectarian affiliation and to eradicate militia influence from the government's security forces.

In recent days, American and Iraqi troops have conducted several operations against the powerful Mahdi Army militia, which is loosely under the control of the influential Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, and is regarded by Sunni Arab leaders as a main force behind many sectarian reprisal killings. Iraqi and American forces captured two Mahdi Army leaders on Friday and raided a suspected militia bastion on Saturday.

Some Jihad residents and Sunni Arab leaders accused the Mahdi Army of committing the killings on Sunday, but officials in Mr. Sadr's organization denied that. "The Mahdi Army takes care of the national interest," Abdel Hadi al-Daraji, a spokesman for Mr. Sadr, told Al Jazeera. Mr. Sadr joined other government leaders in publicly calling for calm, and he requested an emergency session of Parliament to discuss the crisis and "prevent a sea of blood," his office said in a statement.

President Jalal Talabani warned Iraqis against falling prey to "acts of violence that some want to look sectarian."

Militias of all stripes appeared to be bracing for fallout from the morning's attacks. Mahdi Army fighters interviewed by telephone said they were preparing for a wider battle. Mahdi militiamen had set up checkpoints in the city's predominantly Shiite neighborhoods and, according to residents, were preparing for Sunni reprisals. A Mahdi Army platoon commander who identified himself only as Sheik Faleh said, "If anything happens, we will attack."

Later in the day, the deadly double-car bombing next to a Shiite mosque in Kasra, a mixed neighborhood in northeastern Baghdad, also seemed intended to stoke sectarian fury.

Seven people were killed and at least eight wounded in various insurgent attacks around Kirkuk, including a bomb that exploded in a bus, killing one civilian and wounding seven, the police said. In Samarra, gunmen assassinated a top official in the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni organization, and two of his guards, the police said, while in Karbala, a police captain was killed.

The American command here said an American soldier was killed early on Sunday in the greater Baghdad area in a "noncombat-related incident," but did not elaborate.

In the rape-murder case, the American military did not identify the five newly accused soldiers, who remain on active duty in Iraq. The first to be implicated was Steven D. Green, a recently discharged private first class arrested June 30 in North Carolina on suspicion of participating in the crimes on March 12.

A affidavit filed in the case against Mr. Green implicated five soldiers: Mr. Green; three soldiers who accompanied him to the farmhouse in the town of Mahmudiya, 20 miles south of Baghdad, where investigators say the rape and murders took place; and another soldier who remained at a checkpoint.

But the new accusations, made Saturday and disclosed Sunday, indicate that another soldier was also inside the farmhouse at the time of the crimes, according to a military official who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to publicly discuss such details.

The soldier who has been accused of dereliction of duty is, according to the military statement on Sunday, "not alleged to have been a direct participant in the rape and killings," suggesting that it was the soldier who was aware of the plan but stayed at the checkpoint.

The formal accusations against the five soldiers set in motion the military's court-martial process. According to military officials, the soldiers will now face an investigation under Article 32 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice, a process similar to a grand jury hearing, which will determine whether enough evidence exists to put the men on trial.

In Iraq's Mayhem, Town Finds Calm Through Its Tribal Links (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And Qais Mizher

AMARA, Iraq — In the soft heat of the late evening in this southern Iraqi town, men come to the Najmawi coffee shop to play dominoes. Lights illuminate faces. Tiles click quietly.

The scene, which unfolds nightly in a garden near the Tigris River, is unimaginable in central and western Iraq, where night turns neighborhoods into dangerous ghost towns.

It was not always this tranquil. It used to be that Shiite Islamists smashed furniture and stopped games at Najmawi's. Dominoes, they said, were un-Islamic.

The British forces charged with security here did not intervene. They have enough troubles of their own, they said, trying to keep themselves safe on routine patrols.

But in a surprising twist, the region's tribes, particularly powerful in neighborhood life here, have weighed in forcefully, using their authority, often in a nonviolent way, to force the Islamists to back off.

Large portions of Iraq's rural south have been relatively peaceful, like the provinces of Muthana, where Japanese forces recently left, and Dhi Qar, whose capital, Nasiriya, is patrolled by the Italians, and it is possible that tribes are playing a similarly quiet but central role in keeping order.

"Now people feel safe," said Hassan al-Najmawi, 31, the coffee shop owner. The Islamists, he said, "have lifted their hands from the dominoes, the music shops, the young people's clothing."

The story of how Amara, the capital of a leaf-shaped province called Maysan, came to be relatively safe for its citizens — even as danger increased for the British — is a hopeful tale of small-town camaraderie, fierce independence and, above all, tribal power.

It offers an alternative to the grim formula that has applied in the provinces where a poisonous mix of sects, political parties and ethnicities has led to relentless bloodletting that the central government has been powerless to stop.

The differences reflect, in part, fundamental splits between rural and urban life in Iraq. Maysan, a province of about 920,000, is the countryside. More than 60 percent of its work force is employed in the private sector, mostly farming; in the wealthier, urban areas, a majority is employed in public service.

Because it is rural, it is smaller and easier to control than the bigger, more fractured communities in the cities, like Basra to the south, Iraq's second largest city.

There, many political parties and their militias are fighting over control of the province and its oil. Amara has just two militias, both Shiite: the Mahdi Army, loyal to the anti-American cleric Moktada al-Sadr, and the Badr Organization, the armed wing of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

But the most important factor is the network of tribes.

In cities, generations of busy urban life have dulled people's tribal connections, while in the countryside, particularly in the south, tribes oversee all aspects of daily life — celebrating weddings, intervening in family disputes, administering justice after a killing and collecting money to help someone in need.

The 14 or so tribes in Maysan, with its vast expanses of marshes, are particularly strong — if often at odds with one another.

Even Saddam Hussein could not force the marsh Arabs, as they are known, to submit. He resorted to digging giant canals to drain their wetlands and stamp out their way of life.

"The tribe in Iraq is the basic building block of society," said Abd al-Kareem al-Mahamedawy, a tribal sheik from Amara who fought Mr. Hussein for years.

Mr. Najmawi is a smiling 31-year-old who laughs a lot and has difficulty sitting still. He has lived in Amara his whole life, and took it personally when, about a year after the American invasion, religious Shiites and their militias began to boss people around. Local men who called themselves members of the Mahdi Army, the grass-roots armed group that follows Mr. Sadr, began to come to his shop and disrupt business.

"They are troublemakers," he recalled, sitting in an office in his shop on a balmy evening in late May. "They don't feel shy. They do anything." The militia asked to use his cafe for a meeting. He refused. He later allowed a civil society group to hold a seminar on corruption in Amara. His shop was bombed that night. Suspicions focused on the Mahdi militia.

Meanwhile, the Islamists were using the new lawlessness to impose their will, delivering lashes to those found with alcohol in their cars and confiscating un-Islamic merchandise. But the population of Amara is small, about 300,000, and residents knew who was part of the militia.

"I have a big coffee shop," Mr. Najmawi said. "You see how many people are in it. I know who likes Mahdi militia, and I know who hates them. Let me tell you, only a very few join them."

The reaction of the tribes was hardly a foregone conclusion. In the American-led effort in Iraq, they were an afterthought. Few were courted, and they were all but left out of the political process, which began here in earnest in early 2005.

Followers of Mr. Sadr dominate the 42-member provincial council. The governor is a former Mahdi Army commander. The police chief is a former Badr member.

"We didn't go the extra mile to encourage the tribes to participate, which was perhaps a mistake," said Edward Ferguson, the British political adviser in Amara.

And they fight among themselves. Lt. Col. David H. Labouchere, the commander of the British forces here, described what appeared to be tribal fighting that he watched at night from a helicopter in April. Mortars and rocket-propelled grenades exploded without stop, and when the electricity went out, the village, outside of Amara, "lit some fires and kept on fighting," he said.

But a direct attack from a militia brought the tribes together. In May 2005, two Mahdi fighters bombed the Manar engineering company, which belonged to the Kaabi tribe, infuriating its leaders. In a tribal trial called a fahsal, the attackers' families agreed to pay $18,000 in damages and to banish the two men from Amara.

A short time later, the Kaabi tribe invited the town's leading tribal sheiks to its mudhif, a guesthouse made of reeds that is the rough equivalent of a town hall.

"We invited them all," said Khalid Jabor al-Ali, the Kaabi sheik.

The gathering agreed to punish any militia member who attacked a tribe or its property. The tribes would watch the townspeople and the known militia members among them.

Suddenly, the stakes for carrying out an attack were substantially higher.

"We said anyone who does rebel attacks, his blood will no longer be tribal blood, and his tribe will reject him," Mr. Ali said, sitting on a mat in the same mudhif.

Gradually, quietly, he and other sheiks said, life began to shift.

Amar al-Sadi, 24, the owner of Al Qawthar Music Shop, said attacks on shops, common a year ago, had become rare. Islamic militia members still come from time to time to make sure the shop, which also sells movies, has no pornography, but mostly he is left alone.

Even people on the street seem irreverent. On an evening in late May, a group of young men stood just half a block from Mr. Sadr's central office in Amara, clapping and singing. A woman walked past a cleric and made a gesture with her hands, as if shoving him away, the Iraqi equivalent of a raised middle finger.

"The clerics are pushing the people, and that makes the people hate them," said Kadham al-Mashetet, the sheik of the Sarrai tribe, who saw the angry gesture.

Late last year, the number of killings began to drop. In March of this year, the police in Amara registered six homicides, the lowest rate since the British military began collecting data in the beginning of 2005. The average rate for the first five months of this year fell by 71 percent compared with the previous five months, according to British military figures.

The trend is the opposite in Basra, where violence has risen significantly in the past year. With the tribes watching in Amara, the stakes for killing were higher, and militia members weighed attacks carefully. The militias themselves seemed intent on preserving the status quo.

The police chief, Ismail Arar Qadim al-Majdi, linked to Badr, said he tried to avoid retaliatory attacks.

"I know who is doing the killing here," Mr. Majdi said in an interview. "When I arrest someone, they reply by a mortar. If I keep up this arresting, it will be the same as in Basra. I want to keep the city quiet, so I try to avoid this."

It is not clear, however, how firm his control is. Late last month, the son of a sheik was killed in a shooting, an ominous crime that has baffled the town. Some sheiks blamed Iran, where the Badr Organization had operated in exile. For the British soldiers here, the power of tribes can be vexing, particularly during efforts to build a Western-style legal system. Six months ago, for example, a man shot another dead in front of a police officer. He was arrested, taken to jail and then promptly released, after the attacker's tribe agreed to pay $3,000 and promise three women in marriage to the family of the dead man, said Colonel Labouchere, the British commander.

"Tribes hold the key to this province," he said. "If we try to employ our own version of law in this country, we are not going to win."

The tribes have helped the occupying forces at times. They successfully mediated in 2004, when the Mahdi militia fought the British in an uprising across Iraq's south inspired by Mr. Sadr.

At that time "the tribes went to the Sadr office and said, 'Take your guys off the streets,' " said Mr. Ferguson, the British political adviser. In Dhi Qar Province, west of Amara, tribal leaders recently interceded in a similar fashion, he said.

The role of the tribes in the American-led effort may continue to grow.

Colonel Labouchere, who cares for two pet goats in a sleepy outpost in a former Hussein military camp and is planning the British withdrawal from the area, said he hoped the tribes could replace his forces as the central pillar between the Madhi Army and the Badr Organization.

In an effort to exert more influence on politics, about 1,000 tribesmen gathered in March and established a new provincewide tribal council of 35 sheiks.

And if Iraq holds a new set of provincial elections as scheduled for later this year, the tribes might increase their direct representation.

For now, Mr. Najmawi takes pleasure in testing the Islamists.

In a bold affront, he decided to show the World Cup games in his garden on a big screen for maximum effect. He even advertised around town with posters.

Before the first game, two men from Mr. Sadr's office came and delivered a warning: Go to the Sadr office and obtain permission. Soccer, they said, is un-Islamic.

"I never went," Mr. Najmawi said.

More U.S. Soldiers Face Charges In Rape Case (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, July 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Four more U.S. soldiers have been charged with raping a young Iraqi and killing her and three of her family members in March, the U.S. military announced Sunday.

The military said in a statement that the charges had been lodged against four soldiers accused of rape and murder. A fifth soldier was charged with dereliction of duty in the case; although he did not participate in the alleged crimes, he knew about them but failed to report the incident, the military said.

The charges were lodged Saturday, the military said. The five soldiers face an Article 32 investigation, the military's equivalent of a grand-jury inquest, to see if evidence warrants bringing them before a full-scale military tribunal or courts-martial.

"The preferral of court-martial charges is merely an accusation," the statement said. "Those accused are presumed innocent until and unless proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt."

A former U.S. Army private, Steven D. Green, 21, already appeared in federal court last week in Charlotte, N.C., pleading not guilty to rape and murder charges in the case. He could face the death penalty if convicted.

The statement said the five new suspects were charged with conspiring with Green to commit the crimes. The military did not release their names.

Green received an honorable discharge from the military and returned to the United States before the alleged incident in Mahmoudiya, south of Baghdad, came to light late last month. An affidavit submitted by an FBI special agent in connection with the request for an arrest warrant said military personnel files showed that a "personality disorder" had led to his discharge.

Green was a member of the 502nd Infantry Regiment, which is attached to the 4th Infantry Division in Iraq.

Unlike most incidents of alleged abuse of Iraqi civilians by U.S. soldiers, the killings of the young Iraqi and her family did not occur in the heat of battle but were planned out for as long as a week, military officials have alleged.

According to the affidavit by Special Agent Gregor J. Ahlers, who said his information came largely from Army investigators who interviewed at least three of the soldiers involved, Green allegedly killed three family members before he and another soldier raped the young woman, whose age is in dispute. Green then allegedly shot the victim to death with an AK-47 found in the house.

Two soldiers allegedly went with Green and his alleged accomplices to the house but only stood guard. Another soldier stayed at a checkpoint to monitor radio traffic.

Unlike a civilian grand jury, the military investigation allows the accused to attend and, through defense counsel, to cross-examine government witnesses, call witnesses and present evidence, said Army Maj. J. Todd Breasseale, a spokesman for U.S. forces in Iraq.

The five newly accused servicemen remain in Iraq but have been removed from their normal duties and are not allowed to leave their base, Breasseale said.

"They have had their weapons removed from them and are escorted at all times," he said.

4 Soldiers Accused Of Rape, Murder (USAT)

By Rick Jervis And Andrea Stone

USA Today, July 10, 2006

BAGHDAD — Four more soldiers were charged with rape and murder in connection with the slaying of a young Iraqi woman and her family in Mahmoudiya, south of Baghdad, the U.S. military announced Sunday.

Another soldier was accused of failing to report the offenses but was not believed to be involved in the attack, a military statement said. The soldiers, who are from the 101st Airborne Division and whose names were not released, were charged Saturday.

In all, six soldiers have been implicated in the March 12 incident, the latest of several alleged crimes by U.S. servicemembers in Iraq. Ex-soldier Steven Green was charged with one count of rape and four counts of murder. He pleaded not guilty to killing the young woman, her parents and 5-year-old sister.

According to an FBI affidavit filed in Green's case, Green and others targeted the young woman for a week before the attack. Army spokesman Paul Boyce said investigators were trying to determine the age of the young woman. Military spokesman Maj. Mark Wright said investigators have asked Iraqi authorities to help navigate cultural sensitivities to exhume the body.

The soldiers drank alcohol, abandoned their checkpoint, changed clothes to avoid detection and headed to the victims' house, about 200 yards from a U.S. military checkpoint, the affidavit said.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki last week called for an independent investigation. He also questioned why U.S. troops receive immunity from prosecution in Iraqi courts for crimes committed there.

Mahmoudiya Mayor Mouayad Fadhil applauded the new charges and said he hopes the United States continues to investigate.

The top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad issued an apology last week for the Mahmoudiya incident, saying, "the alleged events of that day are absolutely inexcusable and unacceptable behavior."

Military investigators are looking into at least five incidents in which U.S. troops are accused of killing Iraqi civilians. Among them: the alleged killings by Marines of 24 Iraqis in Haditha in November.

The string of recent allegations hurts U.S. and Iraqi government efforts to win over ordinary citizens and undermines support for the insurgency.

"Stories like this accusation and the others are like losing a battle," says Andrew Krepinevich of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, a defense policy group. "Whether they're true or not, they can be viewed as a significant setback for us."

Four More GIs Charged With Rape, Murder (WP)

By Jonathan Finer And Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, July 9 -- Military investigators brought charges against four more American soldiers accused of taking part in the rape and murder of an Iraqi girl and the killing of three members of her family, the U.S. military said Sunday.

The four active-duty soldiers from the Army's 502nd Infantry Regiment of the 4th Infantry Division are accused of conspiring with Steven D. Green, a former private, who was charged with rape and murder in federal court earlier this month.

A fifth soldier from the unit, who was not accused of direct involvement in the March 12 attack in the southern town of Mahmudiyah, was charged with dereliction of duty for failing to report the incident, the military said in a statement. It did not name the five soldiers.

Green was honorably discharged with a "personality disorder" after the attack was carried out but before it came to light. He pleaded not guilty to the charges on Thursday in U.S. District Court in Louisville.

According to military officials and court documents, the soldiers entered the family's home, took the girl to another room and raped her. They then reportedly shot her and killed her mother, father and 7-year-old sister and tried to set a fire to cover up the crimes. The killings were initially reported as an insurgent attack.

Court documents said the soldiers had previously seen the girl from a roadside checkpoint they manned near the home, and a neighbor said her family had grown concerned that she could become a target.

The incident was the latest in a series of recent accusations against U.S. forces involving unarmed Iraqi civilians, including the alleged shooting deaths of 24 people in the western town of Haditha in November. The military initially reported those deaths as having been caused by a roadside bomb attack that also killed a Marine.

But a Time magazine report in March disclosed that the civilians died of gunshot wounds and that U.S. forces were responsible.

Army Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the No. 2 officer in Iraq who oversaw the investigation of the Haditha killings, concluded recently that Marine leadership repeatedly failed in pre-deployment training, in the tone set by commanders and in how information was reported up the chain of command, defense officials said. Chiarelli found that commanders were negligent in how they responded to conflicting reports they received from units about the Haditha killings.

In June, seven Marines and a Navy corpsman were charged with murder and other crimes related to the shooting death of a crippled man in Hamdaniyah, a village west of Baghdad. Residents there said the soldiers planted a rifle and a shovel near the victim's body to make it appear as though he had been burying roadside bombs.

Later in June, three soldiers were charged with killing three Iraqi detainees in U.S. custody and threatening to kill another soldier if he told anyone what had happened.

But the Mahmudiyah incident has provoked a particularly strong reaction from the Iraqi government because of the incendiary nature of the alleged crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0038968

In recent days, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and several other Iraqi politicians have called for a review of a regulation that precludes U.S. forces from facing prosecution in Iraqi courts. Maliki said the immunity -- implemented by the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority, which governed Iraq after the 2003 invasion -- has encouraged crimes against Iraqis.

Four Soldiers Charged With Rape, Murder (WT/AP)

By Ryan Lenza

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

TIKRIT, Iraq -- Four more U.S. soldiers have been charged with rape and murder and a fifth with dereliction of duty in the rape-slaying of an Iraqi girl and the killings of her relatives in Mahmoudiya, the military said yesterday.

The five were accused Saturday after an investigation into charges that American soldiers from the 101st Airborne Division raped the teenager and killed her and three relatives at her home south of Baghdad.

Former soldier Steven D. Green was arrested last week in North Carolina and has pleaded not guilty to one count of rape and four counts of murder. He was ordered held without bond on the charges, which carry a possible death penalty.

Yesterday's disclosure of additional rape and murder charges against U.S. soldiers came on a particularly violent day, with more than 50 Iraqis killed in a spate of sectarian attacks.

Masked Shi'ite gunmen roamed through west Baghdad's Jihad neighborhood yesterday, dragging Sunnis from their cars, picking them out on the street and killing them in a rampage that police said left at least 41 persons dead in a dramatic escalation of sectarian violence.

Hours later, two car bombs exploded near a Shi'ite mosque in the city's north, killing 17 persons and wounding at least 38 in what appeared to be a reprisal attack, police said.

Black-clad Shi'ite militiamen manned checkpoints on roads into most major Shi'ite neighborhoods to guard against revenge attacks, as scattered clashes occurred across the Iraqi capital.

Sunni leaders expressed outrage over the killings, and President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, appealed for calm, warning that the nation stood "in front of a dangerous precipice."

A senior government official, Haidar Majid, contested the police figures, saying late yesterday that only nine persons died in Jihad.

Police Lt. Mohammed Khayoun insisted the figure of 41 was correct -- with 24 bodies taken to Yarmouk hospital and 17 to the city morgue. There was no way to reconcile the discrepancy.

Regardless, the brazen attack was likely to further enflame Shi'ite-Sunni tensions and undermine public confidence in Iraq's new unity government. It also raises new questions about the effectiveness of the Iraqi police and army to curb sectarian violence in the capital.

Police and Shi'ite leaders speculated the rampage was carried out in retaliation for a Saturday night car bombing at a Shi'ite mosque that killed two persons and wounded nine.

Clashes also broke out between gunmen and Iraqi police in at least three neighborhoods across the capital, police and residents said. Three Shi'ite militiamen were killed in fighting with security forces in one of them, police said.

The spokesman for a Sunni clerical association, Mohammed Beshar al-Faydhi, blamed the Jihad attack on the Mahdi Army militia, led by radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Sheik al-Sadr denied responsibility and called on both Shi'ites and Sunnis to "join hands for the sake of Iraq's independence and stability." He assured Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, leader of the largest Sunni Arab party, that he would punish any of his militiamen if they were involved.

In the rape investigation, the U.S. statement said the five soldiers still on active duty will face an Article 32 investigation, similar to a grand jury hearing in civilian law. The Article 32 proceeding will determine whether there is enough evidence to place them on trial.

One of the soldiers was charged with failing to report the attack but is not believed to have participated in it directly, the statement said. The four facing murder charges could face the death penalty if convicted.

The names of the five were not released, but a U.S. military official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation, said yesterday that the soldiers recently charged are two sergeants, two privates first-class and one specialist.

The March 12 attack on the family was among the worst in a series of cases of U.S. troops accused of killing and abusing Iraqi civilians.

U.S. officials are concerned the suspected rape-slaying will strain relations with the new U.S.-backed government and increase calls for changes in an agreement that exempts American soldiers from prosecution in Iraqi courts.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has demanded an independent investigation into the case, which followed a series of claims that U.S. troops killed and mistreated Iraqi civilians.

According to an FBI affidavit filed in Mr. Green's case, he and at least two others targeted the teenager and her family for a week before the attack, which was not revealed until witnesses came forward in late June.

Also yesterday, an American soldier died in a "noncombat related incident," the U.S. command said without giving further details.

In the western city of Ramadi, a car bomb exploded next to a U.S. convoy, wounding four American soldiers, the military said. The attack occurred as the convoy headed to the government center in the city, an insurgent hotbed 70 miles west of Baghdad.

A Soldier's Shame (TIME)

By Julie Rawe With Aparisim Ghosh

Time, July 10, 2006

Family members describeÂ Abeer Qasim Hamza al-Janabi as tall for her age, skinny, but not eye-catchingly beautiful. As one of her uncles put it, "She was an ordinary girl." So perhaps it was sheer proximity that made the 15-year-old so tantalizing. Her house was less than 1,000 ft. from a U.S. military checkpoint just outside the Iraqi town of Mahmudiyah, and soldiers manning the gate started stopping by just to look at her. Her mother, who grew concerned enough to make plans for Abeer to move in with a cousin, told relatives that whenever she caught the Americans ogling her daughter, they would give her the thumbs-up sign, point to the girl and say, "Very good, very good."

Abeer's brother Mohammed, 13, told TIME he once watched his sister, frozen in fear, as a U.S. soldier ran his index finger down her cheek. Mohammed has since learned that soldier's name: Steven Green. Last week Green, 21, a former Army private first class who was honorably discharged because of a "personality disorder" a month before the criminal allegations came to light, pleaded not guilty to charges of raping Abeer and killing her along with her parents and 7-year-old sister. The grisly March 12 slayings--in which Abeer's skull was smashed and her legs and torso set on fire--sparked the military's fifth investigation into U.S. personnel accused of murdering Iraqi civilians. But unlike the massacre in Haditha, where Marines are suspected of shooting up to 24 innocent people in November following the death of a beloved comrade, the butchering of Abeer's family does not appear to be the result of vengeance or confusion. Instead, all signs point to premeditated depravity.

According to an affidavit based on sworn statements from several members of Green's infantry unit, Green and three other soldiers abandoned the traffic checkpoint they were manning 20 miles south of Baghdad, in a region littered with roadside bombs, before heading to Abeer's house. Some of them had been drinking, and all but one had changed out of their uniforms, allegedly to avoid easy identification. A fifth soldier, who remained at the checkpoint to monitor the radio, said that when the men returned in bloodied clothes, each of them told him not to speak of the incident again.

Given that the area was known to be a terrorist stronghold, many former and active-duty officers are wondering how such a small convoy of soldiers--a single vehicle's worth--was left on its own, apparently far from the watchful gaze of a superior officer. "Where were the older sergeants, and the lieutenants and captain who should have prevented this crime from happening?" asks Barry McCaffrey, a retired four-star general.

The apparent lack of supervision makes it harder for military officials to cast this as a one-time, isolated incident, particularly after an Army general concluded last week that Marine officers had been negligent in failing to probe the deaths in Haditha. In a joint statement, the U.S. ambassador and the senior U.S. commander in Iraq called the soldiers' alleged acts in Mahmudiya "absolutely inexcusable and unacceptable." Officials say one purpose of their pledge to vigorously and transparently investigate and prosecute the crimes is to quell the calls from Iraqis, among them Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, to stop granting U.S. troops immunity from local prosecution, a notion that Pentagon officials consider "a nonstarter," especially in a country whose legal system is practically nonexistent.

If there was an element of strategic calculation behind the public remarks of U.S. officials, there was genuine emotion too. In private meetings with Abeer's relatives, military officers apologized repeatedly, and a one-star general hugged her two orphaned brothers. "The general seemed emotionally distressed. He was not pretending," concluded Mahdi Obeid Saleh, Abeer's cousin, who says he rushed to the crime scene and doused the flames on her burning body. Both Saleh and Army investigators initially thought the attack was the work of insurgents. "This is what happens when you harbor terrorists," a military translator lectured Saleh on the day of the slayings.

It wasn't until some three months later that officers got wind of a different story. In June, after insurgents killed a member of Green's troop and kidnapped and beheaded two others--there's suspicion, but no evidence yet, that this attack was a response to the rape and killings--another soldier in their infantry unit told Army combat-stress counselors in Baghdad about the alleged murders in Mahmudiya. Within 24 hours of the initial report, Army officers turned the case over to military criminal investigators at

Iraq's Camp Slayer. Six days later, the FBI arrested Green near his grandmother's house in Nebo, N.C., where he was visiting after attending a troopmate's funeral at Arlington National Cemetery.

The details of Green's biography contain little to suggest he was destined for trouble but nothing that indicates he knew how to avoid it either. He was born in Midland, Texas, and bounced between parents who divorced when he was 4. Green, who was in his teens when his mother spent six months in jail for drunken driving, dropped out of school after 10th grade. In February 2005, fresh from a three-day jail stint for underage possession of alcohol, he enlisted in the Army, and a month later--during basic training--he was baptized in a makeshift prayer room in a kitchen at Fort Benning, Ga. In December, after Green had been sent to Iraq, he was quoted in a newspaper article as saying of a house-to-house search for insurgents, "It's kind of disappointing that we didn't find anything."

Five months later, Green was honorably discharged with a "personality disorder." In fiscal 2005, 1,038 soldiers--or 0.21% of those on active duty--were discharged with this classification, which used to be referred to as Section 8. (Corporal Klinger was always trying to get one on M*A*S*H.) An Army spokeswoman says such cases can take weeks or even months to process and require a psychiatric evaluation followed by an opportunity for the soldier to modify his behavior as well as the option to file an appeal.

The Pentagon won't say how long it took to process Green's case. But even if his possible instability was a factor in the alleged atrocity, that doesn't explain why his fellow soldiers stood by--and helped him cover his tracks. Pentagon officials say charges could be brought against as many as four other soldiers, including the one who allegedly joined Green in the rape.

Green is scheduled to be arraigned next month in Kentucky--home to Fort Campbell, where he was most recently stationed--and could end up facing the death penalty. Close relatives won't talk about him. Even distant ones are reluctant. In tiny Denver City, Texas, where he spent a couple of years with his mother's ex-husband and which he claimed as his hometown on Army paperwork, Green's former stepgrandfather thought back about the meals they had shared. "He always seemed a little bit different," B.J. Carr said, before his wife interrupted, "We don't know that boy."

Justice: Immune? (NSWK)

By Malcolm Beith And John Barry

Newsweek, July 10, 2006

The arrest of former U.S. Army Pfc. Steven D. Green—for the alleged rape of an Iraqi woman and the murder of her and three relatives near the town of Mahmudiyah—brought apologies from U.S. officials. But that didn't stem a growing debate over Coalition Provisional Authority Order 17, which exempts members of the U.S. military from Iraqi laws.

"We cannot go on having these unfortunate incidents repeated, and we have to work on stopping them from happening again," Iraqi national-security adviser Mowaffaq al-Rubaie told NEWSWEEK. "There is no way we can accept CPA Order 17 anymore." U.S. officials, unnamed because of diplomatic sensitivities, said Iraqi P.M. Maliki's need to oppose the order might lessen if any wrongdoers in the Haditha and Mahmudiyah cases are held accountable. Green pleaded not guilty in a U.S. federal court last week.

Republican Lawmakers Cite Shells As WMD Proof (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

Congressional Republicans are at odds with Democrats -- and the Bush administration -- over the significance of 500 munitions found in Iraq since 2003 and recently disclosed by the Pentagon.

The rocket and artillery shells hold deadly sarin and mustard gas, a small part of the vast weapons of mass destruction (WMD) arsenal that Saddam Hussein built in the 1980s.

Republican lawmakers say the 500-plus shells, with more likely to be found in the coming months, are evidence that Saddam was still concealing WMDs in 2003 in violation of United Nations resolutions to disarm after Iraq's failed invasion of Kuwait.

The resolution "didn't say pre-'91 chemical weapons," said Rep. Curt Weldon, Pennsylvania Republican. "It didn't say post-'91 chemical weapons. It said chemical weapons. Saddam Hussein violated this resolution and others like it. ... In part because of such violations, we voted to authorize the use of military force in Iraq."

Democrats dismiss the findings. They say the munitions were found in small clusters and are 1980s vintage. In other words, Iraq produced them before the 1990 invasion of Kuwait and thus they are irrelevant to the CIA's flawed 2002 National Intelligence Estimate (NIE), on which President Bush largely based his decision to go to war to keep Iraq's WMDs from terrorists, they say.

To the consternation of congressional Republicans, including Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, the House Intelligence Committee chairman, the Democrats are getting support from the administration.

When the office of Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte conducted a phone-in briefing for reporters last month, the presenters downplayed the munitions finding, just like the Democrats.

"The priority of the ISG [Iraq Survey Group, which headed the hunt for WMDs] was to look for post-Desert Storm [1991] munitions, newer stuff," an anonymous briefer told reporters. "It was not looking for older stuff. And so this doesn't really bear on the issue."

That dismissive remark generally dovetailed with press reporting. But it irked Mr. Hoekstra, who had held a press conference to announce that the administration had declassified a report on the 500 shells. Mr. Hoekstra wrote an unusually blunt June 29 letter to Mr. Negroponte, accusing his staff of misstating the ISG's mission statement. The ISG was not limited to poking around for post-1991 weapons, he said. He also accused Mr. Negroponte of ignoring requests for information from a Republican senator.

"I am very disappointed by the inaccurate, incomplete, and occasionally misleading comments made by the briefers," he wrote.

Negroponte spokesman Carl Kropf said of the letter, "We'll respond in some fashion to be determined."

Republicans say that with the passage of time, as new information surfaces, the CIA's much-maligned NIE does not look quite as bad. To be sure, inspectors have not found the tons of chemical weapons stockpiles it had predicted, or an active nuclear weapons program, or continued manufacturing of WMDs.

But the NIE contained other components. For example, it said hundreds of chemical weapons munitions remained unaccounted for, after U.N. inspectors destroyed thousands. The NIE did not specify the shells had to be post-1991, so the discovery of more than 500 munitions since 2004 would tend to validate that finding.

What's more, the ISG did find that Saddam planned to resume WMD production quickly once U.N. sanctions were lifted. He had already corrupted the U.N.'s oil-for-food transactions by bribing foreign government officials and suppliers of prohibited weapons.

That ISG finding has been buttressed by newly declassified transcripts of taped conversations between Saddam and his top aides. The palace talk: WMD production would be resumed once the West lost interest in containing Baghdad.

Republicans received a bit more support from the administration in a subsequent House Armed Services Committee hearing last week.

"We do assess that the chemical munitions that have been found are hazardous, and potentially they could be lethal," Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency, testified. "The chemicals that are contained in the munitions that are referred to in this report are capable of creating mass casualties."

The committee also heard from David Kay, who initially led the search for WMDs before turning the job over to Charles Duelfer. He generally downplayed the discovery. "I don't think any of us should be surprised that we are still finding chemical munitions produced before 1991 in Iraq," he said. He added that his main task was to try to find WMD that the CIA said were produced after U.N. inspectors left in 1998. He found none.

The DNI briefers stressed to reporters that the new report on munitions is not a dissent from the final March 2005 report of Mr. Duelfer.

But there does seem to be a difference in how the two assess the danger to U.S. troops.

"The ISG believes that any remaining chemical munitions in Iraq do not pose a militarily significant threat to coalition forces because the agent and munitions are degraded and there are not enough extant to cause mass casualties," Mr. Duelfer wrote.

Col. John Chiu, commander of the National Ground Intelligence Center, which is conducting the WMD search in Iraq, told the Armed Services committee that, "The munitions that we're finding, the agents within those munitions are still toxic, and if exposed to enough of a degree, would prove to be lethal. ... They do constitute weapons of mass destruction."

Vietnam Vets' Experience On Boats Gets Use In Iraq (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, July 10, 2006

LITTLE CREEK, Va. — Thomas Cutler's combat experience on a patrol boat in Vietnam is more than 30 years old, yet it couldn't be more relevant to today's Navy.

Cutler, 58, is among a group of Vietnam veterans informally advising the Navy as it reconstitutes river patrols. The Navy wants to extend its reach into the shallow brown waters of deltas and rivers, often the front line in the war against terrorists and insurgents. Next spring, the first sailors since the days of the Vietnam-era swift boats will relieve Marines on river patrols protecting Haditha dam in Iraq.

"It is dangerous," says Cutler, an author and former naval officer. "But you don't go into the military to knit socks."

After Vietnam, the Navy abandoned its river patrols and focused instead on big ships and fleets to oppose the Soviet Union during the Cold War.

Now, the Navy plans a river force of three 12-boat squadrons. Each boat will have a crew of five. The boats will be able to top 40 knots, stop quickly and operate in less than a foot of water. They'll have armor and .50-caliber machine guns.

In all, there will be about 900 sailors involved in the river patrol effort. By comparison, there were 4,500 sailors in 450 boats patrolling coastal and inland waters during Vietnam.

At first, Vietnam veterans were concerned "we weren't building a robust enough force," said Capt. Michael Jordan, commodore of Riverine Group One. "But when we described what we were doing, they said, 'This makes sense.' "

The main mission is defeating Iraqi insurgents who often try to escape on rivers after attacking, said Adm. Michael Mullen, the chief of naval operations.

Iraq's rivers "are really the old smugglers' routes," Jordan said, "routes that have been in use for hundreds if not thousands of years. We've got checkpoints on roads but none on the water."

The Navy's river patrols eventually will be deployed around the world as part of the Navy Expeditionary Combat Command. The command, established in October 2005, aims to fight piracy, stop narcotics trafficking and intercept illegal arms and weapons of mass destruction, said Rear Adm. Donald Bullard, its leader. It also is the home of the Seabees, the Navy's construction teams, and technicians who defuse explosives.

The command allows the Navy to play a more visible role in the war on terror. "This is not just about relieving stress on the Army and Marines," Bullard said.

Vietnam veterans have participated in two seminars with Navy officials to advise them on the new river force. One was held at the Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md., and the other was in Norfolk, Va.

The Navy sought Cutler's expertise, in part, because he wrote a history of the Navy's river patrols in Vietnam, Brown Water, Black Berets.

Before sailors patrol the Euphrates River in Iraq, they'll be trained by Marines to fight and learn the basic language skills they'll need to develop relationships with the local people. Simply being able to talk about fishing can be helpful, Jordan said.

"With language training, we can show that we care about people rather than imposing our will. That we're really there to help them out," said Lt. Cmdr. Frank Okata, 33, a logistics officer for the river patrol squadron.

Okata said the sailors need small boats to take the fight to the insurgents. "Most of our enemies aren't going to be sending out fleets to engage us," he said. "We need small boats to go after them."

Cutler said that mission makes lessons from Vietnam more relevant.

He counseled the Navy to think about snakes, leeches and malaria and to consider factors such as the way moonlight can silhouette a target or a sailor and how the glare of sunshine can blind a river crew.

Larry Weatherall, 58, a veteran of more than 200 river patrol missions in Vietnam, advised sailors to rely on helicopters and other aircraft for help in killing adversaries. He said the need for air support was an important lesson from Vietnam.

"When you get in a firefight, it's good to have angels come out of nowhere to help suppress enemy fire," he said.

Today's sailors have also been instructed by Vietnam vets to carry extra ammunition, said Cmdr. Bill Guarini, 39.

"It's fun stuff: going 40 knots on the water, shooting the best weapons," Guarini said. "We're all outdoorsy people. It's exciting, plus there's a sense that you're doing something special."

Petty Officer 2nd Class Tyson Carter, 25, recently completed combat training with Marines at Camp Lejeune, N.C. It was hot and humid, and he loved it. He'll be a gunner on a Navy patrol boat.

"It's all about the adrenaline," said Carter of Choctaw, Okla. "We're taking the fight to the enemy."

A Vietnam Lesson, Unlearned (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

By 1971, after years of mindless fighting, dying and widespread atrocities in Vietnam, portions of the U.S. military had fallen into a horrendous state of affairs. Morale had plummeted. Drug use was widespread. Soldiers in units that had previously fought bravely and well were threatening mutiny. Officers and N.C.O.'s were targeted for death by frightened and resentful enlisted men. Racial conflicts abounded.

The biggest lesson we failed to learn from Vietnam was how utterly tragic it was to pull the trigger on an unnecessary war. Now once again we are condemned to suffer the consequences, and those consequences are not always self-evident.

For example, the U.S. military — its capabilities and its reputation so painstakingly rebuilt in the decades since Vietnam — is again falling victim to lowered standards, breakdowns in discipline and a series of atrocities that are nothing less than a betrayal of the many honorable men and women in uniform and the country they serve.

The Army has had to lower its standards because most young Americans want no part of George W. Bush's war in Iraq. Recruiters, desperate to meet their quotas, are sifting for warm bodies among those who are less talented, less disciplined and, in some cases, repellent.

John Kifner reported in The Times last week about a study by a watchdog group that showed that recruiting shortfalls caused by the war in Iraq have allowed "large numbers of neo-Nazis and skinhead extremists" to infiltrate the military.

The study, by the Southern Poverty Law Center, which tracks racist groups, was titled "A Few Bad Men." It said that recruiters and base commanders, under intense pressure to fill the thinning ranks, "often look the other way" as militant white supremacists and anti-Semites make their way into the armed forces.

The center quoted a Defense Department investigator as saying: "We've got Aryan Nations graffiti in Baghdad. That's a problem."

This comes 10 years after a Pentagon crackdown on extremist activity in the armed forces. The crackdown followed the Oklahoma City bombing, which was carried out by Timothy McVeigh, a gulf war veteran, and the murder of a black couple by skinheads in the Army's 82nd Airborne Division.

This is the sort of thing that happens when the military is run by power-hungry amateurs who lack the maturity and the sense of history to temper their arrogance.

It was already known that the Army had become more reluctant to release soldiers who were seriously out of shape, or pregnant, or abusing alcohol or drugs. The pressure to put somebody — anybody — in uniform also led to the lowering of standards for admission to the junior officer ranks. For example, minor criminal offenses that previously would have been prohibitive could suddenly be overlooked.

As the Abu Ghraib scandal unfolded, I wondered how such completely and obviously unfit characters as Charles Graner Jr. and Lynndie England had not previously been weeded out of the military, which had bragged for so long about how high its standards had become.

Now we're faced with the case of American soldiers suspected of raping an Iraqi teenager and murdering her and her family. This is one of at least five cases currently being investigated in which American troops have been accused of killing unarmed civilians. Marines are suspected of slaughtering 24 Iraqis, including women and children, in the western town of Haditha last November — a case that in its horror, if not its scale, recalls the My Lai massacre of Vietnam.

Despite the administration's repeated attempts to put the best face on Mr. Bush's war, the predicament confronting the military is growing more, not less, dire. There are still not nearly enough American troops in Iraq to secure the country. Some troops are on their third or fourth tour of duty in the war zone, which is beyond unfair.

According to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, the military will be not be able to maintain its current force levels in Iraq for much longer. It doesn't take much imagination to know what happens when you stretch a rubber band too far.

The proud American military has been badly hurt by the wrecking-ball policies of the Bush administration. It deserved better.

Canadian, 15 Taliban Killed In Afghanistan (AP-Y2)

By Noor Khan

AP2, July 10, 2006

Hundreds of Canadian and Afghan soldiers raided Taliban strongholds throughout southern orchards Sunday, sparking fighting that killed at least 15 militants and one Canadian.

Two Canadian soldiers were wounded in Kandahar province's Zharew district, the scene of some of the fiercest fighting in an ongoing anti-Taliban offensive being waged across southern Afghanistan.

Canadian Cpl. Anthony Boneca was killed in the Pasmhol village in Zharew during a "combined coalition-Afghan operation" against the Taliban, said military spokesman Maj. Marc Theriault.

Several hours later, "intense close quarters" fighting broke out nearby, leaving at least five Taliban militants dead and two Canadian soldiers slightly wounded, said another coalition official, Lt. Cdr. Mark MacIntyre.

A coalition airstrike killed another 10 militants in the neighboring Panjwayi district, where Canadian troops launched a campaign against Taliban strongholds Saturday, according to a military statement. Two Canadians also were wounded.

"The fighting we have seen over the last 48 hours has been pretty intense and there has been a number of fire fights," MacIntyre said.

Most of the fighting is taking place in fields and orchards where small bands of Taliban fighters have taken cover, MacIntyre said.

At least 18 Canadian soldiers have been killed in Afghanistan since 2002. Four were killed in an April roadside bomb blast in the deadliest attack against the 2,300-strong Canadian contingent since deployment to Kandahar in February.

In a sign of the deadly Taliban threat in the south, the British government is preparing to deploy hundreds of extra soldiers and more equipment to the volatile Helmand province where more than 3,000 British troops are moving into.

Britain's defense secretary, Des Browne, is expected to announce the deployments to Britain's House of Commons on Monday after military commanders urgently requested reinforcements, a British defense official said on condition of anonymity as he was unauthorized to speak to the media.

Six British troops have been killed in Helmand in a month and Browne acknowledged on Saturday that a British deployment into the south had "energized opposition" from a resurgent Taliban.

Britain has around 5,000 troops in Afghanistan, with 3,000 of those in Helmand — where soldiers will head a NATO-led peacekeeping mission at the end of July.

During recent months, Afghanistan has been gripped by the bloodiest spate of violence since a U.S.-led invasion ousted the Taliban regime after the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks.

Some 10,000 U.S., Canadian, British and Afghan forces have deployed across southern Afghanistan as part of Operation Mountain Thrust in a bid to loosen the Taliban's hold on the region. At least 20 coalition troops have been killed in combat across Afghanistan since the offensive started in May, according to an Associated Press tally based on coalition figures. Most of the fatalities have been in the south.

Separately, Spain's defense minister announced Sunday that an explosion the previous day in western Afghanistan that killed a Peruvian solder and slightly wounded four Spanish troops was probably caused by a remote-controlled 8.8 pound anti-vehicle land mine.

In eastern Laghman province, Afghan soldiers killed a militant Saturday after their patrol was ambushed, a Defense Ministry statement said. One Afghan soldier was wounded.

Afghan soldiers also arrested four suspected Taliban members, including a local leader identified as Mullah Nazar, in southern Uruzgan province, the statement said. The troops also confiscated a quantity of explosives and Iranian and Pakistani checks valued at $300,000.

For Afghan Cabbies, A Poetry Tradition Spurs War Of Words (WSJ)

By Masood Farivar

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, D.C. -- There aren't many places in the U.S. that can count poetry societies run by Afghan cab drivers. Washington has two. And they don't like each other.

"An Evening with the Dervishes" prefers what it calls the serious, scholarly pursuit of poetry. The group views itself as a literary clique focusing on masters such as Abdul Qadir Bedil, a 17th century poet and Islamic mystic, or Sufi. Its gatherings feature top scholars and poets.

"An Evening of Sufism," notwithstanding its name, brings all forms of Afghan poetry to large audiences. It also treats attendees to free refreshments and pop-music performances.

On a Friday evening earlier this year, Maroof Popal checked in on "An Evening of Sufism," the group he helped found and later abandoned to establish the more highbrow Dervishes. Inside a drab, low-ceilinged hall, an Afghan woman dressed in a black pantsuit rose to the podium. She informed the audience of nearly 200 that she'd just finished her poem in the parking lot.

Mr. Popal, 52 years old, couldn't contain his disappointment. "Why read a poem if you haven't given it much thought?" he muttered, gently slapping his head with the palm of his hand.

As another woman finished her poem about the "new and tragic phenomenon of suicide bombings in our beloved country," the cab driver walked outside for a smoke.

"Nowadays, by the grace of God, there are so many poets and writers out there," he said, taking a drag. "The question is, Do you want to listen to vulgar poetry or listen to someone who can offer us the real thing?"

The ethnic and political tensions that racked Afghanistan in the 1990s have cooled off, despite the recent Taliban insurgency. But having given up battling over the merits of the Taliban and the Northern Alliance, exiled Afghans here have found a new outlet for factional debate: how to celebrate the ancient Afghan art of poetry reading.

Poetry has deep roots in Afghan culture; the art form began more than 1,000 years ago in the ancient cities of Central Asia. Today, the Afghan passion for poetry, much of it Sufi-inspired and in Persian, extends to everyday life: Afghans pepper their conversations with snippets of poetry and engage in "poetic duels" in which each side recites a line of verse that begins with the letter that ended the opposing side's line.

The two groups meet in the same Masonic lodge in Springfield, Va., on different Friday nights each month. Mostly they adhere to Afghan social norms, treating each other with civility and even deference. Occasionally, they drop by each other's gatherings. But at times, their rivalries have burst into the open.

Members of "An Evening of Sufism" accuse the Dervishes of tearing down their flyers from Afghan stores, and have dubbed them "hash-heads," which in Afghanistan is a term associated with the uneducated. Wali Popal, the group's current moderator -- who is not related to Maroof Popal -- dismisses "An Evening with the Dervishes" as an "imitation."

The Dervishes say an "Evening of Sufism" lobbied the Masonic Lodge to keep them out. They also accuse the group of spreading false rumors that they pay big money to attract top scholars. Both groups deny the others' charges.

One of the Dervishes, Yusuf Bakhtary, a former school teacher and now a cabdriver, says he wants to ban music entirely from his group -- it occasionally invites a sitar player -- if only to distinguish it from "An Evening of Sufism."

He quotes Bedil: "Hypnotized by the spell of popular acceptance, how long shall I keep on uttering vulgarity?"

The poetry debate goes back to the early 1980s, when Maroof Popal, who left Afghanistan in 1978, began driving a taxi at Washington D.C.'s National Airport. There, he met other Afghan cabbies once or twice a week to read the poems of Bedil in any available space: the back of a furniture store, the showroom of an Afghan-owned car dealership.

At the end of 12-hour shifts, dog-tired and sometimes hungry, they'd sit cross-legged in a circle. Over cups of tea and candies, they tackled some of the most technically difficult poems written by the great Sufi poets, occasionally pausing for philosophical reflection over individual words -- "fog," "mirror," "silence."

Every now and then, when they found themselves stumped, they'd call upon a poet and Bedil scholar, M. I. Negargar. Calls to the former Kabul University professor -- who had taught one of the cabbies and lives in England -- soon became an integral part of their readings. Chipping in 25 to 50 cents each, they'd buy a phone card and hunch over the speakerphone as the professor brought the poems to life.

As Afghanistan degenerated into civil war in the 1990s, ethnic tensions flared among the exiled Afghans. Hoping that poetry would unite the community, the cabbies joined other like-minded Afghans to underwrite monthly public readings.

"People were revolted by politics," says Hashim Rayiq, a local Afghan civil engineer who helped formalize the poetry sessions. "I said, 'Let's have at least one night without politics.'"

The group they formed in summer 2000 -- "An Evening of Sufism" -- was quickly a hit. Within months it was holding monthly gatherings attended by hundreds, first in a banquet hall and later in a church and eventually in the Masonic Lodge. As the Taliban fell in 2001, it thrived.

"No Afghan organization has lasted six years," Mr. Rayiq says proudly.

Unless you count a 2004 rupture, that is. Maroof Popal and others say "An Evening of Sufism" was infiltrated by Tajik nationalists who supported the Northern Alliance, as well as former Afghan Communists. The newcomers, they say, tried to exclude the works of Pashtuns -- Afghanistan's dominant ethnic group, from which the Taliban hailed -- from the proceedings.

Wali Popal, the moderator of "An Evening of Sufism," denies the charges.

Yet even before politics intruded, some of the cabbies, who were never comfortable with the proliferation of poets and the size of the new group, had been itching to return to the Bedil readings and scholarly debates. Along with Maroof Popal, they broke away and founded "An Evening with the Dervishes" in late 2004.

One December night, the Dervishes dedicated their session to Prof. Negargar, whom they flew in for the occasion. More than 300 people showed up, mostly men in suits or black leather jackets, cell phones and keys dangling from belts. The only music for the evening would be the classical sitar, played by the son of one of India's great musicians, the late Vilayat Khan.

A silence fell over the hall as the professor spoke for two and half hours on the "concept of the unity of God in world religions" with dozens of lines of classical poetry recited from memory.

Four months later, "An Evening of Sufism" hosted an evening about Sa'duddin Ansary, a little known, second-tier 18th century poet. Wali Popal arranged for several of the poet's descendants to attend. A crowd of 200 showed up, nearly one third of them women.

The poems of Ansary moved the audience, but the loudest applause was reserved for the young poets, including the editor of an Afghan cultural magazine who read her poem lamenting suicide bombings. The evening ended with pop tunes performed by an Afghan keyboard player wearing a black shirt with a stenciled-on white tie.

Prof. Negargar says the sparring between the two groups is a little juvenile. "It is like a third grader who has started reading history poking fun at a first grader because the first grader studies only reading and math," he says.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Hearing Postponed In Case Against Former Qwest CEO (WSJ)

By Shawn Young

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

The judge overseeing the criminal insider trading case against former Qwest Communications International Inc. Chief Executive Joseph Nacchio delayed an important hearing in the case because of the complex logistics involved in reviewing classified material introduced by the defense.

Saying he needed extra time for his staff to get the security clearances and facilities that are legally required for handling the classified materials, Denver-based U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham on Friday postponed the hearing to August 25 from July 14. He is scheduled to rule on a variety of motions from both sides, including a defense motion to dismiss the case.

Mr. Nacchio is fighting charges that he sold $101 million in stock in early 2001 with insider knowledge that the Denver-based phone company was about to falter. In court filings, his attorneys have said he was optimistic about the company's prospects because, based on classified information, he thought Qwest was poised to win important contracts related to national security.

Prosecutors have argued that the national security aspect of the defense is a smokescreen with no relevance to the charges. Even if the company had won the government contracts, they wouldn't have solved the underlying problems that Mr. Nacchio knew the company faced, prosecutors have said in court filings.

Mr. Nacchio was indicted late last year on 42 counts of insider trading that carry a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison each. Qwest eventually restated $2.5 billion in revenue and $2.2 billion in earnings for 2000 and 2001. Mr. Nacchio is not accused of falsifying the books. In addition to the criminal charges, Mr. Nacchio faces civil fraud charges in a suit brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Papers From Jefferson Office Raid In Limbo (AP-Y2)

By Mark Sherman

AP2, July 10, 2006

Prosecutors and investigators building a bribery case against Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record) have been unable to examine the documents and computer files seized in a search of the lawmaker's Capitol Hill office.

The materials were placed off limits by President Bush for 45 days, a cooling-off period that ended Sunday. Yet there has been no resolution of the court fight or talks between congressional leaders and the Justice Department.

The president acted after congressional leaders denounced the FBI's search on May 20 and May 21 as an unprecedented and unconstitutional intrusion on their turf by federal agents.

Bush directed Solicitor General Paul Clement to keep the materials while Justice Department officials negotiated with Congress' lawyers and a legal challenge made its way through the federal courts.

Until the judge in the case rules on the constitutionality of the search, prosecutors will not examine what it yielded, department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said.

U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan, who signed the warrant authorizing the search, indicated at a hearing last month that he was likely to reject the main argument advanced by Jefferson, D-La., and House lawyers that the Constitution's speech or debate clause prohibits searches of congressional offices.

That clause protects senators and representatives from being questioned by the president, a prosecutor or a plaintiff in a lawsuit about their legislative work.

"The speech-or-debate clause is not a hide-and-conceal clause," Hogan said.

Jefferson has not been charged and has denied wrongdoing. But a business executive has pleaded guilty to paying Jefferson more than $400,000 in bribes. An affidavit filed with Hogan to justify the May search also says the FBI videotaped Jefferson in August 2005 accepting $100,000 from another business executive, who actually was a government informant. The FBI said it recovered $90,000 from a freezer in Jefferson's home.

Separately, negotiators for Congress and the Justice Department are seeking to develop procedures in case the FBI again feels the need to search lawmakers' offices.

While federal agents had never searched a congressional office before entering Jefferson's, some lawmakers fear the FBI could return to Capitol Hill for searches growing out of the broad corruption investigation linked to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

In the Jefferson case, government lawyers have objected to providing advance notification to the target of the search or his agents and to allowing him access to the scene while the search is taking place.

Lawmakers have said they should have the ability to review documents before deciding whether they can be seized in a search. Justice Department lawyers said members of Congress do not warrant such special treatment.

Federal Prosecutor Weighs Life, Death (PTR)

By Jason Cato, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, July 10, 2006

The decision, like any involving life or death, is difficult.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan is considering whether to seek the death penalty against two drug dealers accused in the 2004 slaying of a Beaver County man whose son was to testify against one of them. No defendant in a federal case has ever been sentenced to death in Western Pennsylvania.

Many people familiar with the federal death penalty, including the attorney to defend the most recent case four years ago in Pittsburgh, think Buchanan will seek it in the case against Jelani Solomon, of Beaver County, and Claron Hanner, of Pittsburgh's Knoxville neighborhood.

"She has a reputation as an aggressive prosecutor," said Richard Kammen, who defended Joseph P. Minerd, accused of the New Year's Day 1999 pipe-bomb killings of his pregnant former girlfriend and her young daughter. Minerd was convicted of the killings, but jurors deadlocked on the death penalty, and he was sentenced to life in prison.

"I would not be surprised if she seeks the death penalty in this case," Kammen said.

Frank Helisek Sr. was inside his New Brighton home on Jan. 19, 2004, with family members and his priest, when the doorbell rang. He opened the door and a gunman fired multiple shots through the storm door. One bullet hit Helisek in the chest, ripped through his aorta and lodged in his spine.

Prosecutors say the gunman was Hanner, a 28-year-old drug dealer.

Evidence includes Hanner's cell phone, which prosecutors say he dropped at the scene, as well as the murder weapon containing Hanner's DNA and bits of glass from the shattered storm door imbedded in his shoes.

Hanner's motivation, prosecutors say, was a payment of cash and cocaine from Solomon, 27, of Beaver Falls. Solomon was to go on trial the next day. The lead witness was to be Helisek's son, and the killing was intended to send a message, prosecutors say.

Solomon and Hanner are being prosecuted under federal drug trafficking conspiracy laws, which allow both to face the death penalty for using a gun to kill someone in a planned, drug-related crime. Pennsylvania does not have such a law.

Attorneys for Solomon and Hanner will meet with Buchanan this month to try to talk her out of seeking the death penalty. First up are Solomon's attorneys on Wednesday.

"We absolutely challenge the allegations outright," said Martin A. Dietz, one of Solomon's attorneys. "We dispute that Jelani Solomon had any involvement at all."

The ultimate decision will come from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, but he likely will follow Buchanan's recommendation, Kammen said. Buchanan said she will make her recommendation in August.

Buchanan recommended the death penalty be sought against two people in a 2000 interstate murder-for-hire scheme. Lawrence Skiba, of White Oak, received a reduced sentence for cooperating with prosecutors against the shooter, Eugene DeLuca, of Oak Lawn, Ill. DeLuca committed suicide after prosecutors told him they intended to seek the death penalty, Buchanan said.

Getting a federal death sentence is difficult. One reason is that federal death penalty defendants are guaranteed two attorneys apiece -- including at least one with death penalty experience -- as well as resources for investigators and experts.

"It's clear that the federal system provides an adequate defense, and that makes it a little unusual in the death penalty world of the United States," said David Bruck, a death penalty expert and law professor at Washington and Lee University. "The federal system gives a picture of what one might expect when it comes to fairness."

Defense attorneys often use the theory of "residual doubt" -- that if any possible doubt can be created, jurors will choose life over death.

"Polls indicate that people's support for the death penalty drops pretty remarkably when there's the option for life without parole," Kammen said. "It makes the system much, much more cautious -- as it should be."

Buchanan said her decision will be based on law, not on whether she thinks prosecutors can persuade a jury to impose the death sentence.

"The taking of a human life is an extreme sanction that should only be taken after careful consideration by the prosecutors, the jurors and the judge," she said. "However, if the law requires the death penalty be sought, we have to follow the law."

Man Slain In Attack On Couple In Georgetown (WP)

By Lori Montgomery And Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

Three assailants who cut the throat of an aspiring politician from Britain killed him and tried to rape his female companion early yesterday in the driveway of a Georgetown mansion, police reported, after the couple had returned from a night at the movies.

The victim, Alan Senitt, 27, a Jewish activist and volunteer for former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner, died at the scene, police said. The woman, whom police declined to identify, was not injured.

Within hours, D.C. police arrested four people in connection with one of the most brutal crimes in years on the affluent streets of Georgetown and said they were looking for possible links to other recent attacks in the city.

Christopher Piper, 25, of Southeast Washington was charged with felony murder and attempted sexual assault. The others -- Jeffery Rice, 22, of Southeast; Olivia Miles, 26, of Northeast; and a 15-year-old boy from Southeast whom police declined to identify because he has been charged as a juvenile -- all face murder charges.

According to police and others, the attack occurred shortly after 2 a.m. as Senitt was seeing the woman home. The couple walked north on 31st Street NW, then turned west toward Wisconsin Avenue on Q Street NW, where the woman lives.

The two were rummaging in the trunk of a car when they were approached by three men wielding a gun and a knife. Police said Piper, who had the gun, grabbed the woman and began dragging her down the driveway. Out of view of his companions, he tried to pull off her clothes, police said. The attacker made a comment "in reference to his intent to commit a sexual assault," said Lt. Robert Glover of the police department's violent crimes branch, which is handling the investigation.

Meanwhile, the other two assailants grabbed Senitt, stabbed him and slashed his throat.

As Senitt lay dying, the three men fled with the woman's purse. The woman ran onto Q Street, flagged down a taxi and begged for help.

"She came in the street and was yelling, 'Stop! I need help! We got robbed!' " said taxi driver Ayalew Haile, who returned to Georgetown yesterday to retrieve his cab, which was trapped behind police tape for much of the day. "I stopped because you have to help someone. My passenger called the police for her."

Police received the 911 call at 2:18 a.m. and responded with paramedics almost immediately. They found several people trying to help Senitt, Glover said, "though those efforts were fruitless." Senitt's body was taken to the medical examiner's office.

The woman, a former babysitter for developer Herb Miller, lives in Miller's basement apartment. She was too upset to talk to reporters, said Miller, who was at his Maryland farm at the time of the attack. He rushed to Washington upon hearing the news. "It's very sad," he said. "So quickly to take somebody's life for nothing."

Barely three hours after the attack, at 5:30 a.m., police arrested Piper and Rice in the 2700 block of Robinson Place SE. The 15-year-old boy and Miles, who is accused of driving a green Toyota suspected to be a getaway car, surrendered to police around lunchtime, authorities said. All four are expected to be arraigned in court today.

As he was being escorted by police, a man in handcuffs whom WRC-TV (Channel 4) identified as Rice apologized for what happened. But he told the station during a brief sidewalk interview, "I did not have anything to do with the murder."

Second Police District Cmdr. Andy Solberg said the quick arrests resulted from leads detectives have developed while investigating two robberies that occurred last month in the same neighborhood. He declined to provide details. Police reports show that a trio of attackers robbed Georgetown pedestrians in the early hours of June 4 and June 11, fleeing with wallets, cash and cellphones.

In late May, three couples walking on the Mall at night were robbed by three assailants in separate incidents. The robbers wore black ski masks in at least one of the cases. In all three attacks, the women were specially targeted: One was groped, one was beaten and a third was sexually assaulted.

Glover declined to comment on a possible connection between Senitt's slaying and those attacks but said police are "taking a broad look at any other crimes that may fit what happened here."

By yesterday afternoon, police had reopened Q Street. People strolled past Miller's house, where two police cruisers stood guard. A few doors down, a woman tending geraniums said she had been awakened by police sirens but didn't know a killing had occurred until she contacted a radio station.

Police officials and D.C. Council member Jack Evans (D-Ward 2) are scheduled to discuss the crime with residents at 6:30 tonight in a meeting at Christ Church, 31st and O streets NW.

"We've had a spate of robberies, but what's unusual here is the sheer viciousness of the crime. It's awful," said Bill Starrels, a Georgetown advisory neighborhood commissioner. "You have a young man trying to get his lady friend home safely. And he essentially gave up his life trying to get her home safely."

Word of Senitt's death traveled rapidly across the Atlantic Ocean to family members in London and friends in Jerusalem. An activist dedicated to fighting anti-Semitism and promoting Israel, Senitt served twice as the elected head of the Union of Jewish Students, which represents about 5,000 college students in Britain.

Later, Senitt worked for Greville Janner, a member of the House of Lords from Prime Minister Tony Blair's Labor Party who founded the Co-Existence Trust, a group that promotes Muslim-Jewish relations.

Last month, Senitt quit that job and moved to Washington to volunteer for Warner's potential presidential campaign and study political fundraising. Senitt was a Labor candidate this year for the council in the northwest London neighborhood where he was raised. He lost, but Danny Stone, a friend who took over at the Co-Existence Trust, said Senitt was committed to a life in politics.

"He was a serious contender for mainstream political life," Stone said. "He was up and coming. He would have been brilliant, I'm sure of it."

Senitt's parents, Jack and Karen, sister Emma and brother James issued a statement mourning the loss of "a much loved son and brother." They asked that they be allowed "to grieve in private."

"The Jewish community as a whole has lost one of its bright young leaders and the wider world has lost a champion of peace and goodwill," the statement said. "It will take us a lifetime to come to terms with our tragic loss."

Judge Denies Bail To Reputed Mobsters (MH)

By Laura Wides-munoz

The Miami Herald, July 10, 2006

A federal judge denied bond Friday to the alleged boss of the Genovese crime family's South Florida operations and three others awaiting trial on charges of extortion, robbery, and money laundering. He will consider bond for another man.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Barry Seltzer denied bail for Renaldi "Ray" Ruggiero, 72, whom federal prosecutors identified as a Genovese capo or captain, and three of his co-defendants -- Joseph Dennis Colasacco, 54, Charles Steinberg, 30, and Mitchell Weissman, 54, said Weissman's attorney John Contini.

Seltzer, prosecutors and attorneys for defendant Francis O'Donnell, 47, will continue negotiations for O'Donnell's release on Monday, said Theresa Van Vliet, one of his attorneys. O'Donnell heads Coach Industries Group, a financial services firm.

The five men was arrested June 30 along with an alleged Genovese "soldier" Albert "Chinky" Facchiano, 96. Facchiano, of Miami, was released on a $100,000 bond that day. Clement Santoro, 50, was arrested in New York in connection with the group's activities and is also awaiting a decision on bond.

The case, considered the latest blow to one of New York's most powerful Mafia families, deals with 10 years of alleged criminal activity, including murder. The family's reputed acting boss, Liborio S. "Barney" Bellomo, and 31 others were arrested in February in New York.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Jeffrey Kaplan told the courts the investigation of the Florida group began in 2001 and lasted mainly through 2003, when Internal Revenue Service agents searched Ruggiero's home. More than 130 undercover recordings of the men's conversations "brought out the violent nature of the defendants," Kaplan said.

Prosecutors alleged that Colasacco beat a man with a gun while Weissman held a baseball bat over him. The victim eventually escaped, covered in blood, Kaplan said. The men later met the victim at Ruggiero's West Palm Beach restaurant, aptly named Soprano's, to again threaten him, prosecutors said.

Prosecutors also said that the FBI learned that Ruggiero said he would flee if necessary and that he had contacts through the grand jury that was investigating him.

But Ruggiero's attorney, Michael Salnick, repeatedly sought to dispel claims that his client was connected to the Mafia or a dangerous person.

"If I said I knew someone who happened to be an alleged member of organized crime, that wouldn't necessarily mean I'm a member of organized crime, right?" Salnick asked FBI agent Willie James Creech, who testified.

Salnick asked the courts to release his client before trial, noting that Ruggiero suffers from serious health problems, has no passport and has left the country once in 20 years.

The indictment covered alleged illegal enterprises from 1994 to the present, with a few specific examples.

DOJ_NMG_0038980

If convicted under the racketeering charges, Ruggiero could face 20 years to life in prison and fines of up to $1.75 million. Convictions would result in lower maximum sentences for the other defendants.

Teen Sought In Ga. Killing Is Captured (MH)

By Karin Dryhurst

The Miami Herald, July 10, 2006

A teenager wanted in the killing of a Georgia college student was arrested by Fort Lauderdale police Friday near his grandmother's home.

Roosevelt Lawrence, 18 and allegedly a member of the Bloods street gang, surrendered to police and FBI agents in Lauderdale Manors, according to the Fort Lauderdale Police Department.

Lawrence, along with two others, are the suspects in an armed robbery/carjacking in which one victim died in Valdosta, Ga., near the Florida border, said Fort Lauderdale police Detective Chuck Morrow.

The gunmen aimed through a vehicle window and shot Valdosta State University student Mason Harper, 24, twice in the upper body just after 1 a.m. June 29. Two suspects were quickly apprehended and charged with homicide, Morrow said.

Lawrence, of Valdosta, was identified as one of the shooters. Police continue to investigate who fired the other shot.

Harper had been expected to graduate in December with a marketing degree.

His grandmother, Helen Harper, said his younger brother Andrew had wanted to move to Valdosta to be closer to Mason. They were looking at a potential home for Andrew when Harper was shot.

Harper's family expressed relief Saturday that the last suspect had been apprehended.

`JUST SAD'

"We are a little relieved, just sad," Helen Harper said. ``We are trying to deal with it as much as we can."

Harper's grandmother described him as a generous man who served as a role model for other young black men.

According to a July 3 Valdosta Daily Times article, Harper managed his own marketing and advertising business, Platinum Plus Entertainment, and raised money for the African American Male Initiative, a program for black male freshmen at Valdosta StateUniversity.

"He had his life planned out," Helen Harper said. ``He just helped everybody he could.

``He was just kind-hearted toward everything and everybody."

The Valdosta Daily Times reported that Mason Harper and his brother Andrew were parked in front of a rental property when Andrew spotted two shadows approaching the vehicle.

Andrew began emptying his wallet for the men while Mason put his hands up in the air. Mason was shot, and Andrew tried to perform CPR, the Daily Times reported.

The Lowndes County Sheriff's Office issued warrants for Lawrence's arrest on charges of murder and possession of a firearm. Believing that Lawrence had fled the state, the FBI in Atlanta also obtained federal warrants for unlawful flight, Morrow said.

The South Georgia Gang Task Force learned that Lawrence, whose street name is "Bo," has relatives and associates in South Florida.

On Thursday, the Georgia task force asked the FBI Fugitive Task Force in South Florida to conduct a local investigation.

The FBI unit began surveillance of three locations in Plantation and Fort Lauderdale, said Morrow, who is a member of the FBI Violent Crimes Fugitive Task Force.

Morrow said he saw Lawrence leaving a store on West Sunrise Boulevard Friday evening and requested assistance from FBI agents and Fort Lauderdale patrol officers.

The agents and officers followed Lawrence to a house at 1223 NW 18th Ave., where his grandmother lives.

"We didn't want to lose this guy," Morrow said. ``It was a brutal homicide."

Lawrence surrendered without incident around 8 p.m. Friday, Morrow said.

EXTRADITION PENDING

Lawrence is being held without bond at the Broward County Jail awaiting extradition to Georgia.

Police will continue to investigate whether the homicide was gang related, Morrow said. The task force also will investigate any connection to gang activity in South Florida.

"We will check to see what associates he has down here locally," Morrow said.

Lauderdale Police Catch Georgia Suspect Wanted In Connection With A Slaying (FLSUNSEN)

By Brian Haas, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, July 8, 2006

Federal and local authorities in Fort Lauderdale on Friday arrested a reputed member of the Bloods street gang wanted in connection with a shotgun slaying in Georgia.

Roosevelt Lawrence, 18, was wanted in connection with the June 29 shooting death of a 24-year-old Valdosta, Ga., man in his car, said Detective Chuck Morrow, who tracks fugitives for the Fort Lauderdale Police Department and is part of the FBI Violent Crime Fugitive Taskforce in South Florida. Morrow said Lawrence and two other men carjacked Mason Harper, 24, on North Troup Street in Valdosta, shooting him twice at point-blank range with shotguns.

The Valdosta Police Department, Lowndes County Sheriff's Office and the FBI's South Georgia Gang Taskforce immediately suspected after the slaying that Lawrence, a known member of the Bloods street gang, had fled to Fort Lauderdale, Morrow said.

Fort Lauderdale police and the South Florida FBI Violent Crime Fugitive Taskforce got the call Thursday that he might be in the area. They had their man within 24 hours.

Morrow said agents put several areas in Plantation, North Lauderdale and Fort Lauderdale under surveillance. He said he spotted Lawrence coming out of a convenience store on West Sunrise Boulevard on Friday about 7:45 p.m. He and the task force members followed him to a home in the 1200 block of Northwest 18th Avenue and set up a perimeter. Lawrence had already fled once, Morrow said.

"We wanted to eliminate any kind of chase with this guy," he added.

But when agents moved in, they took Lawrence down without incident. He was booked on a murder warrant and a charge of possession of a firearm during the commission of a crime.

A woman who answered the phone at the home where Lawrence was nabbed said she was the suspect's grandmother but wouldn't provide her name.

"I'm not giving any information on Roosevelt Lawrence," she said before hanging up.

Lawrence is being held in the Broward County jail without bond until he can be extradited. WALB-Ch. 10 in Albany, Ga., reported that two other suspects in the case have been arrested in Georgia and are being held on murder charges.

Accountant Acquitted In Bribery Case (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

Pr. George's Man Said Fee Seemed Legitimate

An Upper Marlboro accountant was acquitted yesterday of conspiring with two Prince George's County officials to shake down a security company for $250,000 in exchange for a county contract worth more than $1 million.

Accountant Paul L. Wright testified at the eight-day trial that he believed a $10,000 payment to his company in November 2004 was part of a legitimate consulting arrangement and that he had no knowledge of any bribery scheme.

Prosecutors had alleged that Wright conspired with two county officials to target Interior Systems Inc. (ISI). Prosecutors had said that payments totaling $250,000 in exchange for the contract were to be laundered through one of Wright's companies.

The jury deliberated for about 2 1/2 hours yesterday before acquitting Wright, 52, of three charges. Jurors left quickly after the verdict, and efforts to find them for comment were unsuccessful.

Moments after he was acquitted, a relieved Wright hugged one of his attorneys, Carol Elder Bruce, while his other attorney, Anthony J. Pagano, accepted congratulations from some of the more than a dozen relatives and friends of Wright's who were in the courtroom.

The investigation by State Prosecutor Robert A. Rohrbaugh, in cooperation with the FBI and other law enforcement agencies, has resulted in the conviction of a former high-ranking county government official.

Robert L. Isom, former deputy director of the county Department of Environmental Services, pleaded guilty in September to conspiracy to commit bribery. He testified against Wright last week.

The alleged ringleader of the bribery scheme, Robert L. Thomas, former deputy director of the county's Office of Central Services, is scheduled to go on trial Aug. 14.

The scheme, as described by prosecutors and Isom, would have passed the costs of the bribe to taxpayers. Prosecutors and Isom said ISI, a subcontractor, was to recover the cost of the bribery payments through change orders that were to be approved by county staff after the contract was awarded.

According to trial testimony, the scheme came to the attention of law enforcement officials after Isom gave an ISI employee a note saying the contract was guaranteed to go to ISI in exchange for the bribe.

The ISI employee told his bosses, who in turn called authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0038982

"They did not have the goods," Bruce said of the case brought by the state prosecutor's office. "I'm delighted the jury responded to Mr. Wright and the truth. Prosecutorial overreaching."

Deputy State Prosecutor Thomas M. McDonough, who tried the case against Wright, said: "The jury did its job. That's why we have trials."

In her closing argument yesterday, Bruce said that Wright believed he was participating in a legitimate business deal and that he had no knowledge of any bribery scheme.

In his closing argument, McDonough said Wright knowingly participated in the bribery conspiracy.

During its brief deliberations, the jury sent a note to Circuit Court Judge Thomas P. Smith asking for the instructions -- which he had read to the jury before it started deliberating -- regarding the conspiracy to commit bribery and theft charges against Wright.

With the assent of attorneys on both sides, Smith had photocopies of those instructions made and sent to the jury. About five minutes after receiving the photocopies, the jury came back with its verdict.

The Growing Problem Of Fraud (NYT)

By Bob Tedeschi

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

WITH interest rates at historic lows in recent years, consumers have raced to get mortgages. So have criminals.

Industry executives and law-enforcement officials say mortgage fraud continues to climb, with lenders incurring more than $1 billion in fraud losses in the last fiscal year, twice the amount of the previous year. And while no organization has yet tracked how much consumers have lost to fraud, anecdotal evidence suggests that those levels, too, are rising sharply.

"The problem is definitely growing," said Tim Doyle, the senior director of government affairs at the Mortgage Bankers Association in Washington. "The F.B.I. has prioritized this, state attorneys general are looking at this, and more state laws are being passed about it."

About 80 percent of mortgage fraud involves professional thieves who are bilking lenders, the F.B.I. estimates, while in the remaining cases consumers are involved in one way or another.

This second category is known in law enforcement as "fraud for property." Typically, mortgage applicants falsify financial documents so they can qualify for an out-of-reach mortgage, or their lender or broker falsifies the documents on their behalf, looking for profit or a quick commission. Consumers frequently default on such loans, losing their homes and ruining their credit.

Fraud against a lender is known as "fraud for profit." In such cases a criminal group works with an unscrupulous appraiser, typically finding a house that has sat on the market for a while at a certain price. They offer the homeowner that price, with a stipulation: the homeowner must allow the criminals' appraiser to value the home at, say, 30 percent higher.

A criminal in the ring takes out a loan for the higher amount using stolen financial and personal information. When the criminals get the money, they pay the former homeowner the original asking price, then split the remainder among themselves.

Harry Dinham, the president of National Association of Mortgage Brokers in McLean, Va., said that although the authorities are trying to combat the problem, it is so widespread they have not yet caught up. "Criminals have figured out this is a way to make extra money and not get caught on a regular basis," he said.

Ira Rheingold, the executive director of the National Association of Consumer Advocates, a nonprofit legal group in Washington, said prospective homeowners should be wary of unwittingly involving themselves in fraud.

According to Mr. Rheingold, most consumers who engage in mortgage fraud are subprime borrowers. A predatory lender will push such cash-poor borrowers into loans they cannot afford by overstating their income and assets on the loan application. "Some applications created by brokers are the greatest pieces of fiction I ever read," he said.

These borrowers are either not sophisticated enough to catch falsifications on the loan's closing documents or simply don't want to lose the chance to live in a particular house.

To avoid such situations, Mr. Rheingold said, borrowers should know their credit scores and shop around to get a sense of what loan terms they can reasonably expect. Applicants should also demand closing documents early in the process, so they can catch inaccuracies or falsifications before they pack up for the move.

And although consumers cannot do much to thwart "fraud for profit," they should be aware that such crimes ultimately cost them money, Mr. Dinham said. "Companies aren't going to continue to lose money on this without charging more," he said. "Anytime you have a problem this broad, consumers end up paying a premium at some point."

Prisons, Jails Urged To Target TB (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038983

Tuberculosis is "particularly problematic" in U.S. correctional and detention facilities, say federal health officials, who have updated guidelines for preventing the spread of TB in jails and prisons.

"Effective TB prevention and control measures in correctional facilities are needed to reduce TB rates among inmates and the general U.S. population," say authors of a report published in the current issue of the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's (CDC) Morbidity & Mortality Weekly Report.

"Inmates with undiagnosed TB disease place other inmates and correctional staff at risk for TB, and when released, these persons also can infect persons living in surrounding communities," the researchers said.

In the report, G. Scott Earnest and other CDC epidemiologists point out that the number of U.S. prison inmates quadrupled from 500,000 in 1980 to about 2 million in 2003.

"A disproportionately high percentage of TB cases" occur among prison inmates, they said. In 2003, 0.7 percent of the total U.S. population was confined in jails and prisons, yet 3.2 percent of all TB cases nationwide that year "occurred among residents of correctional facilities."

The researchers said the TB rates of inmates in prisons in California and New York are 10 to 15 times greater than the general populations of those states. Studies show the prevalence of LTBI -- or latent TB infection, which is asymptomatic -- "to be as high as 25 percent" in prisons, they said. Like TB disease, LTBI can be detected by screening and can be treated.

The authors say the key reasons that prison inmates are at higher risk for the airborne infection are their diverse backgrounds, overcrowded facilities and poor ventilation.

In addition, they say, "disparate numbers of incarcerated persons are at high risk for TB," because they have HIV, use injection drugs and have "low socioeconomic status" so may not have had access to proper medical care.

In the United States, TB tends to be concentrated among immigrants. "Detained immigrants are arriving largely from countries with a high prevalence of TB" -- including Mexico, the Philippines and Vietnam -- "and therefore present unique challenges in the elimination of TB in the United States," the authors said.

They note that testing and treating undocumented aliens can be difficult and that these people sometimes are resistant to "first-line anti-TB drugs because of interrupted treatment received in their countries of origin."

The good news, the researchers said, is that illegals who wind up in American prisons "have an opportunity to receive TB screening and begin treatment for TB disease."

The CDC's recommendations for prevention and control of TB in jails and prisons is the first update since 1996.

SOS To Tim Kaine (WP)

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

THE SUPREME Court's decision in the case of Mario A. Bustillo was correct on the arcane but important point of law it addressed: What happens when American states fail to inform foreign governments of the arrest of one of their nationals, thus violating an international treaty? Mr. Bustillo is serving 30 years in prison in Virginia for a brutal murder; after his arrest, authorities did not inform him of his right under the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations to contact Honduran officials. The court held in his case, along with a companion case from Oregon, that violations of the treaty should not lead to suppression of evidence of guilt and that defendants must bring up any alleged violations of the treaty at the time of their trials or else lose the ability to raise them later. All of this is correct as a matter of law and should go a long way toward resolving a mess of litigation over consular notification that has sprung up in recent years.

But here's the problem: Mr. Bustillo may well be innocent. Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) ought to review his case.

On the strength of testimony by three eyewitnesses, a jury convicted Mr. Bustillo of bashing James Merry on the head with a baseball bat in 1997. At trial, Mr. Bustillo's defense claimed that a different man, identified only by his street name, "Sirena," was the guilty party. One witness claimed to have been with Sirena on a flight to Honduras just after Mr. Merry's death. But he could not be located, and prosecutors successfully ridiculed the defense. "This whole Sirena thing. I don't want to dwell on it too much. It's very convenient that Mr. Sirena apparently isn't available," a prosecutor argued to the jury.

Buried in a footnote of the opinion by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. are facts that -- at least from the point of view of justice -- are far more important to the case than any question of consular access: Mr. Bustillo "presented newly acquired evidence that tended to cast doubt on his conviction. Most notably, he produced a secretly recorded videotape in which Sirena admitted killing Merry and stated that Bustillo had been wrongly convicted." For it turns out that Sirena does exist. His name is Julio Osorto. What's more, police stopped him in the vicinity of the crime the night of the killing and -- according to police reports not given to the defense -- he had ketchup-like stains on his clothes at the time. Honduran immigration records confirm that he returned to Honduras the precise day the defense contended at trial.

None of this was relevant to the question before the court. But it's very relevant to the question of whether Mr. Bustillo should be sitting in prison. State authorities stand by the conviction, claiming Sirena's confession is a fabrication to help out a fellow gang member. Based on the record in the case, it's not clear why they're so confident. At a minimum, the record cries out for a serious review. That could take years in federal courts, where procedural bars may prevent it from happening at all. Mr. Kaine could short-circuit that process with a review of his own.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

An 'inquisition'

What's happening to Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, "can only be described as an inquisition," New York Times columnist David Brooks writes.

"Whether you agree with him or not, he is transparently the most kind-hearted and well-intentioned of men. But over the past few years he has been subjected to a vituperation campaign that only experts in moral manias and mob psychology are really fit to explain. I can't reproduce the typical assaults that have been directed at him over the Internet, because they are so laced with profanity and ugliness, but they are ginned up by ideological masseurs who salve their followers' psychic wounds by arousing their rage at objects of mutual hate," Mr. Brooks said.

"Next has come the effort to expel Lieberman from modern liberalism. In a dark parody of the old struggle between Eugene McCarthy and Hubert Humphrey, the highly educated, highly affluent, highly Caucasian wing of the Democratic Party has turned liberalism from a philosophy into a secular religion, and then sought to purge a battle-scarred warhorse on the grounds of insufficient moral purity.

"So these days, for example, one hears that Lieberman is a crypto-conservative, a Bible-Belter. In reality, of course, this is a man who has been endorsed by Planned Parenthood and the Human Rights Campaign. He has a Christian Coalition rating of 0.

"But a lifetime's record is deemed not to matter any longer. For in the midst of the inquisition all of American liberalism has been reduced to one issue, the war."

DeLay's plan

Tom DeLay is planning an aggressive campaign to retake the House seat he quit in June if an appeals court lets stand a ruling by a federal judge last week that his name must stay on the November ballot, a source close to the former congressman tells Time magazine.

Mr. DeLay says he has moved to Virginia, but the federal judge pointed out that he and his wife still own a house in the Texas district.

"If it isn't overturned, Katy, bar the door," says a Republican official. "Guess he'll have to fire up the engines on the campaign and let 'er rip."

But to run, Mr. DeLay would have to raise money fast: His campaign fund has less than $1 million left, Time said. At least he knows his would-be opponent well: former Rep. Nick Lampson's original district was eliminated in a redistricting engineered by Mr. DeLay.

Holiday tradition

"We seem to have a new national holiday tradition: No holiday is complete without front-page allegations of an atrocity committed by U.S. soldiers in Iraq," Wall Street Journal columnist Daniel Henninger writes.

"A month ago, Memorial Day arrived along with Haditha, a place in western Iraq where hundreds of Memorial-weekend news reports said a military investigation had concluded that Marines 'wantonly killed unarmed civilians,' among them 'women and children.' This past Fourth of July, along with the skyrockets' red glare came news that a former Army private had been charged in Charlotte, N.C., with committing rape and murder while he was in Iraq. Labor Day awaits," Mr. Henninger said.

"Rather than let the charges against the private run like a tape-loop over a long, news-dead weekend, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, appeared Fourth of July morning on both NBC and CBS. After CBS' Harry Smith professed himself perplexed at how all this atrocity stuff was happening now, Gen. Pace said that '99.9 percent' of the men and women in Iraq were serving with honor and promised he would 'get to the bottom' of the allegations.

"Military specialists will output case studies for years on how Iraq has altered the way war is waged by Americans -- on the battlefield and on the home front. Most interesting to know would be whether the war as perceived at home and the war as fought daily by our soldiers in Iraq became two separate realms of consciousness, the former barely related to the reality of the latter."

Bush's rise

"For the moment, the issue agenda has turned favorable for Bush and thus for Republicans," Fred Barnes writes in the Weekly Standard.

"His best issue is national security and the war on terror, and the Supreme Court pushed that issue front and center. While striking down the administration's plan for prosecuting terrorists held in Guantanamo, the court said Congress could authorize and set the rules for prosecutions. And that's what Congress will try to do this month, no doubt with extended debate on how to deal with terrorists," Mr. Barnes said.

"Meanwhile, the New York Times has legitimized White House press bashing by disclosing a secret program for tracking al Qaeda money transfers. When your enemies are liberals on the Supreme Court and in the media, even disgruntled conservatives tend to rally to your side.

"At worst, Bush has bottomed out. At best, he's on his way to renewed popularity. 'We've stopped our fall and begun to gain back ground,' a White House official says. 'But we need to make more progress between now and November 1.' For one thing, Bush needs to pick up another 5 percentage points or more in approval from likely voters and perhaps as many as 10 points among adults, the group normally sampled by media pollsters. Either way, that would put him in the high 40s, a lofty enough level to assure Republicans he won't be a drag in the election."

Hopeful Huckabee

Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee is optimistic the legislature quickly will reinstate a ban on same-sex couples serving as foster parents in his state.

"What we are talking about is whether the state should place a child in a relationship that is not recognized by the state as a marriage," the Republican governor, a potential presidential candidate in 2008, told the Associated Press on Saturday.

The Arkansas Supreme Court last month struck down regulations banning the placement of foster children with same-sex couples. The court said state officials went too far in imposing the ban, but the court did not rule on the merit of the ban.

Mr. Huckabee, an ordained Baptist minister who is leaving office next year because of term limits, has said that there is little doubt the legislature will reinstate the ban and that the courts eventually will uphold it.

"Our attorneys read into that that if it was legislation, it would likely stand, that we could in fact say that only married couples could be foster parents," Mr. Huckabee said. "We think that if we go back and codify that into law, that probably takes care of it."

Mr. Huckabee spoke as he opened a three-day campaign swing in Iowa, where precinct caucuses traditionally launch the presidential nominating season.

Gay-marriage Opponents Hold A Winning Hand (FT)

By Rebecca Knight

Financial Times, July 10, 2006

For US advocates of gay marriage, the losing streak continues. Their opponents won two important state court battles last week, and those defeats offered little optimism for approval of gay unions in the legal and electoral battles that lie ahead in 2006.

A California appeals court in San Francisco will hear on Monday arguments on whether the state constitution gives gay and lesbian couples the right to marry, while appeals against decisions upholding same-sex marriage bans are pending in Washington and New Jersey.

And in Massachusetts, currently the only state that permits the marriage of same-sex couples, Mitt Romney, the Republican governor, is urging the state legislature to go ahead this Wednesday with a scheduled vote on a proposed state constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage.

The amendment needs the support of 50 lawmakers during the current and next legislative sessions to reach the November 2008 ballot.

“The Supreme Court has changed dramatically with the addition of Justice Alito and Chief Justice Roberts, and so lesbian and gay advocates are compelled to try the state courts,” said Jonathan Turley, a professor at George Washington University Law School. “But the states for the most part are not going to give advocates the result they want.”

Last week, the New York Court of Appeals, the state’s highest court, ruled that denying marriage to same-sex couples did not violate the state constitution. In a 4-2 decision, the court found that the state’s definition of marriage as a union between a man and a woman could have a rational basis – one perhaps rooted in the interests of child-rearing – and that it was up to the state legislature to decide whether it should be changed.

“What strikes me is how articulate the court is getting,” said Maggie Gallagher, president of the Institute for Marriage and Public Policy and an opponent of gay marriage. “The social legitimacy of marriage is at the core of this debate, but that social judgment is not something that the courts can confer.”

In Georgia, where three-quarters of voters approved a ban on gay marriage when it was on the ballot in 2004, the state's supreme court reinstated the ban, ruling unanimously that it did not violate the state's single-subject rule for ballot measures. Lawyers for the plaintiffs had claimed the ballot language was confusing, asking voters to decide on both same-sex marriage and civil unions, two distinct issues about which many people had varying opinions.

Despite the twin rulings, legal experts cautioned against expecting similar outcomes in other states. "These are state-by-state decisions. New York was looking at its constitution, Georgia was looking at its constitution," said Martha Davis, an associate professor of law at Northeastern University. "Just because we've had two rulings that turned the decision back to the legislatures, it does not necessarily mean that other rulings will go that way."

Many states and the federal government have enacted "defence of marriage" laws that limit the benefits and rights of same-sex couples. President George W. Bush's push to amend the Constitution to define marriage as strictly between a man and woman was shot down last month by the Senate. Amending the Constitution requires a two-thirds majority of both halves of the legislature.

Prof Turley noted that attitudes toward gays and lesbians had grown increasingly tolerant over the past few decades. "The gay community has been enormously successful in changing the country's views on the issue of same-sex marriage on a social level. In the long run, it may be better for the movement to change minds and not legal doctrine."

Gay Democracy (WSJ)

The biggest problem with contemporary courts is their inclination to invent rights that legislators and our Constitution-writers never intended. So it's certainly noteworthy when they decline a politically fashionable invitation to do so. That's precisely what happened last week, when the highest courts in Georgia and New York decided that the state constitution does not guarantee a right to same-sex marriage.

"Plaintiffs have not persuaded us that this long-accepted restriction [in the state marriage law] is a wholly irrational one, based solely on ignorance and prejudice against homosexuals," Judge Robert S. Smith wrote for the 4-2 majority in New York, a liberal state where at least one mayor had simply decided to preside over gay marriages despite state law.

The Judge and his three colleagues may no longer be invited to certain Manhattan parties. But the upshot is that New Yorkers can still fight for gay marriage if they want. Advocates will simply have to achieve their goal the old-fashioned way: by changing the law through the democratic process. In fact, Judge Victoria Graffeo concurred with the majority but wrote a second opinion suggesting that maybe it is time for the state legislature to "address the needs of same-sex couples and their families." Policy victories achieved in this fashion, as opposed to judicial fiat, tend to be more durable since they are based on popular consent.

Three of the four majority justices were appointed by Republican Governor George Pataki, by the way, which shows that politicians sometimes do follow through on their pledges to appoint judges who believe in restraint. By contrast, Chief Justice Judith Kaye, appointed by Mario Cuomo, sounded as if she was auditioning for a Hillary Rodham Clinton Supreme Court nod as she high-mindedly warned of the disapproval of future generations in her dissent. Judicial nominees are arguably the main dividing line between Democrats and Republicans, even in New York.

Contrary to the willful Judge Kaye, we suspect future generations may view last week's ruling as a blessing in disguise for gay rights. The last thing advocates should want is to have gay marriage imposed on a skeptical public by a judicial order that would inspire a political backlash and make compromise impossible. This is precisely what happened with abortion after the U.S. Supreme Court peered into the Constitution's "emanations" and "penumbras" and overturned 50 state laws in Roe v. Wade.

Leaving the debate to legislatures will also mean politicians will have to come out of the closet themselves, so to speak. They will have to declare themselves on the issue rather than hiding behind the courts. Already in New York, Democratic candidate for Governor Eliot Spitzer has announced his support for gay marriage, while Senator Clinton has angered some activists by saying she favors civil unions for gays but not outright marriage.

If gay activists want to persuade New Yorkers and other fair-minded Americans to come around to their view, there is a traditional way to do that: hard work and commitment to the democratic process.

Setback For Marriage Justice (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 10, 2006

THE HIGHEST COURTS of New York and Georgia last week moved in the opposite direction of history and justice on same-sex marriage.

By a 4-2 vote, the New York Court of Appeals ruled Thursday that the state Legislature's limitation of marriage to heterosexual couples was a "long-accepted restriction" not based solely on "ignorance and prejudice against homosexuals."

Adding insult to injury, an opinion signed by three of the judges in the majority ruled that it was rational for the Legislature to ban same-sex marriage in the interests of protecting children. Noting that "an important function of marriage is to create more stability and permanence in the relationships that cause children to be born," Judge Robert S. Smith wrote that the state could "offer an inducement — in the form of marriage and its attendant benefits — to opposite-sex couples who make a solemn, long-term commitment to each other." Never mind that childless heterosexual couples also receive legal benefits from civil marriage — or that many gay couples are raising children.

The Georgia Supreme Court decision, also handed down Thursday, was narrower but still disappointing. The court rejected technical objections to a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage that was approved by state voters in 2004.

Neither of these decisions is binding on the courts of other states, any more than was the famous 2003 ruling by Massachusetts' high court that gay marriage couldn't be prohibited. So there's still hope that California's Supreme Court will take a more enlightened view of the issue when it next hears a challenge to heterosexual monopoly on civil marriage. Advocates of same-sex marriage have turned to the state courts since Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's ill-advised veto of a same-sex-marriage bill last year, but hopefully the Legislature will keep trying.

Gay-rights activists shouldn't underestimate the challenge ahead. In Georgia, the ban on same-sex marriages upheld last week passed with 76% of the vote. Meanwhile, even politicians who support gay rights consider it political suicide to mention the M-word. And conservatives continue to score points with the fallacious argument that legalizing same-sex marriage would make heterosexual marriage less attractive or, even more absurdly, damage the religious sacrament of matrimony.

It took the Supreme Court until 1967 — 1967! — to strike down odiously racist anti-miscegenation laws. Someday we'll look back on the anti-gay-marriage hysteria with the same revulsion. Until then, with a high court seemingly disinclined to address marriage, states such as California should take the lead.

Bringing The Church To The Courtroom (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. -- A 29-foot war memorial shaped like a cross should be allowed to remain on public land. A teacher should be able to emphasize references to God in the Declaration of Independence. Protesters should be permitted to approach women near the doors of an abortion clinic.

These courtroom fights and dozens of others pending across the country belong to the portfolio of the ambitious Alliance Defense Fund, a socially conservative legal consortium. It spends $20 million a year seeking to protect what it regards as the place of religion -- and especially Christianity -- in public life.

Considering itself the antithesis of the American Civil Liberties Union, the Scottsdale-based organization has used money and moxie to become the leading player in a movement to tug the nation to the right by challenging decades of legal precedent. By stepping into the nation's most impassioned debates about religion in the public sphere, the group aims to bring law and society into alignment with conservative Christianity.

The group successfully challenged the issuance of same-sex marriage licenses in California and Oregon, and worked on statewide ballot initiatives prohibiting such unions. Its attorneys helped the Boy Scouts win approval of a policy barring gay Scout leaders.

The group has been battling embryonic stem cell research in Missouri and won a Supreme Court stay preventing the removal of California's 29-foot Mount Soledad cross. In Florida, where saving the life of brain-damaged Terri Schiavo became a crusade, the group supported efforts to nourish her.

"What we are really trying to protect are the things this country was founded on," said D. James Kennedy, leader of Florida's Coral Ridge Ministries and one of the prominent Christian conservatives who fashioned the alliance in 1993 as a sharp stick in the national culture debate.

That is not how opponents see the organization. While crediting the ADF with training troops for battles once fought by a haphazard assortment of government lawyers and often ill-prepared volunteers, critics question the alliance's commitment to tolerance and the Constitution.

"They're not for some form of generic religious freedom. They're for Christian superiority, that Christians take over the courts," said Barry W. Lynn, executive director of Americans United for the Separation of Church and State. "They are living in this fantasy world where the majority religion, Christianity, is claimed to be literally under attack."

Gary S. McCaleb directs the ADF's litigation team from a file-filled office in a nondescript Scottsdale office park. He said the 16 staff lawyers are in such demand that the ADF created separate divisions for marriage issues and for university free-speech questions.

The ADF underwrites legal fights and increasingly handles litigation itself. Groups receiving significant funding include the American Center for Law & Justice, founded by evangelist Pat Robertson, and Liberty Counsel, backed by the Rev. Jerry Falwell.

"We're certainly stretched. I feel I could put a hundred attorneys to work tomorrow," said McCaleb, who said the ADF files one to two cases a week and is deeply involved in 80 to 100 open cases at any one time. He calls this a "pivotal time" in U.S. history.

"What we see is an overarching agenda from the left wing and the pro-homosexual groups," said McCaleb, who perceives "clear hostility to Christian thought." He described the stakes as "the fundamental ability of Christians to speak their minds on the issues of the day."

The day McCaleb said this, lawyers were preparing to intervene in the dispute over the Mount Soledad cross, a war memorial erected in 1954 in La Jolla, Calif., and challenged by an atheist veteran. Federal judges ordered the cross to be removed from government land, but Justice Anthony M. Kennedy granted a temporary stay on July 3.

"For private citizens to be told they can't memorialize their dead is an outrage," said McCaleb, noting similar cases elsewhere. "It's not a matter of these crosses radiating secret Christian rays that will convert people."

Federal courts have said in the Mount Soledad case and other disputes that private land, including church property, is the appropriate place for such religious displays. They cite the Establishment Clause in the Constitution, which prohibits the government from sanctioning or favoring one religion over another.

What motivated D. James Kennedy and other conservatives -- including James C. Dobson of Focus on the Family and William Bright of the Campus Crusade for Christ -- to form the ADF was the impression that Christians were losing too many such battles.

"It was just years of seeing the ACLU and its cronies attacking religious organizations or religious exercise," Kennedy said. "And, very frequently, there was nobody that even showed up to defend the Christian position."

To change the equation, the alliance hired Reagan-era prosecutor Alan Sears. He later brought in corporate lawyer Jeffery Ventrella. Mostly under Ventrella's watch, the ADF has schooled more than 800 outside lawyers, each promising to donate 450 hours to the cause.

Ventrella runs an annual summer seminar, which this year brought 100 law students to Scottsdale. The idea, according to ADF documents, is to train them in "a distinctly Christian worldview of law" before they head to clerkships and other influential posts, "perhaps even Supreme Court justices."

Some of them met recently at a training session in Chicago. Lawyers and preachers jotted tips as ADF speakers explained that prayer is not always enough: Protecting the faith sometimes demands lawsuits and clamor.

"I was looking for a way to reconcile my faith and my professional life. The ADF helped me be not a Christian and a lawyer but a Christian lawyer," said Chicago litigator Melanie Jo Triebel, who says that the "Christian side of the debate" has not been effective enough.

The ADF's rising profile in churches and the media attracts an average of 300 inquiries a month. One recent day, a call came from a government employee disappointed by a diversity training video because it did not portray homosexuality negatively. A graduating high school senior called to say he had been told not to use Jesus's name in a speech.

"It's definitely an affirmation of our fallen state as humans," Renee Bergmen said of her work evaluating such complaints. "But it's a blessing to provide an answer, and that answer being faith in Jesus Christ."

Every December, the ADF monitors the expression of Christmas, fearful that the encouragement of greetings such as "Happy Holidays" and other steps taken in the name of cultural sensitivity are costing the day its religious identity. Last year, the organization received 434 calls.

A recent case, now pending, focuses on a Pittsburgh ordinance that requires protesters to remain 15 feet from an abortion clinic door. ADF lawyer Elizabeth Murray sued, saying she represented "a compassionate, professional nurse who has devoted much of her life to kindly and gently counseling women during a difficult time in life."

The ADF took up the cause of Stephen Williams, a fifth-grade teacher in Cupertino, Calif. School authorities, wary of proselytizing, said he was overemphasizing religious excerpts from the Declaration of Independence and other documents.

When Williams sued in November 2004, asserting religious discrimination as a Christian, the alliance attracted enormous attention -- particularly from the religious right and conservative media outlets -- when it announced, "Declaration of Independence Banned From Classroom."

Authorities at Stevens Creek Elementary School said the Declaration continued to be taught. They pointed out textbook references and said it hung on school walls. Williams, they said, chose materials so narrow that they were forced to act. Williams agreed to withdraw his suit in August 2005.

Outsiders questioned the ADF's motives and legal reasoning.

"They know that a teacher who has a pattern of proselytizing has crossed the line," said Charles C. Haynes, a senior scholar at the Freedom Forum's First Amendment Center, asserting that the ADF went too far. "When they do that, it may raise money, it may raise their profile, but it undermines their credibility."

"They seem to have an ACLU-envy problem. They distort the position of the ACLU to justify themselves," said Jeremy Gunn, director of the ACLU's Program on Freedom of Religion and Belief. He said the ADF favors a "Walt Disney version of American history."

"There's no mugging of their free speech," Gunn said. "They talk about freedom and liberty. What they really want is the government to endorse their version."

Alliance executives say they are on solid ground when it comes to history and the law, and they insist that the pendulum is beginning to swing their way. Sears said the group, "by grace," expects to grow 20 percent a year.

"Over and over, there's a search-and-destroy mission for religious expression," Ventrella told the trainees in Chicago. "Do we want to forget our religious heritage? When we abandon God, we will forget man. So what's God got to do with it? Everything."

Yes On Bilingual Ballots (WP)

THE HOUSE of Representatives' smooth passage to renewal of the Voting Rights Act hit a bump last month when a group of conservative Republicans rebelled over, among other things, provisions to require bilingual ballots in many jurisdictions. The rebels were wrong. When the House takes up the measure, as it may do this week, it should reject any effort to strip the bilingual-ballot requirement or to allow objections over the rule to torpedo this important measure.

The disputed provisions were adopted as part of the 1975 Voting Rights Act. The requirements apply to political subdivisions where there is a significant population (more than 5 percent of eligible voters, or 10,000, whichever is fewer) of "language minority" voters (defined as those of Hispanic, Asian, Native American or Alaskan Native origins) and a higher than average illiteracy rate among that group. Currently, nearly 500 jurisdictions in 31 states must provide election information -- from registration requirements to instructions to ballots -- in more than one language; five states -- Alaska, Arizona, California, New Mexico and Texas -- must provide such help statewide.

The arguments against this provision have an air of reasonableness that dissipates upon closer study. Attaining proficiency in English is a requirement of naturalization, opponents note, so why should an English-only ballot be a problem for anyone who's attained citizenship? In addition, the critics contend, the law imposes costs on local jurisdictions and serves as a disincentive to assimilate and learn English.

But the level of English proficiency required for citizenship isn't the same as that which could be required to read a complicated ballot initiative -- or even a form whose instructions aren't completely clear. (Anybody remember butterfly ballots?) Nor do the English proficiency requirements apply to older residents seeking citizenship. And many native-born Americans whose English skills are limited -- Native Americans, Alaskan Natives and Latinos -- benefit from getting election information in their preferred languages. Puerto Rican citizens who move to the mainland ought to be able to read ballots in their native language.

The costs may not be negligible; in Los Angeles, the largest and most diverse local election jurisdiction in the country, election officials spend less than 10 percent of their budget to provide language assistance in Spanish, Chinese, Japanese, Korean, Tagalog and Vietnamese. But the benefits are clear: When bilingual assistance is provided, voting participation increases and members of the affected groups have a better shot at winning elections. Hispanic voter registration in Yakima County, Wash., went up 24 percent after the Justice Department sued the county for failing to comply with the law. After Justice reached an agreement with Harris County, Texas, turnout of Vietnamese American voters doubled, and the first Vietnamese American was elected to the state legislature.

We doubt there are many people who will decide to learn, or not to learn, English based on the availability of bilingual ballots. But we don't doubt that many more people will vote, and in an informed way, if they know what they're voting on. That is something to be welcomed, not feared.

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Scrambles To Meet EU Demands (SEAPI)

By Todd Bishop, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, July 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038990

Faced with a series of tough deadlines, one group on Microsoft Corp.'s Redmond campus has been working until all hours -- but not on anything so normal as the new Windows or Office.

The ad hoc team of 300 people is creating volumes of technical documents required by the European Commission's March 2004 antitrust decision. The project will be in the spotlight this week, with the commission poised to fine the company up to $2.5 million a day, dating back months, for what it calls Microsoft's failure to comply with the ruling.

Microsoft says the all-out push shows that it has been doing all it can. The company points to signs of devotion to the cause -- such as one of the project leaders, engineer Henry Sanders, deciding to swear off shaving until the effort is complete, like an athlete in the playoffs.

The team's work may help in the future, but it isn't expected to avert a major fine this week. European officials say the very fact that Microsoft is still working on the documents shows that it wasn't living up to its obligations in the first place.

"They're two years late," said Jonathan Todd, spokesman for European Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes, adding that Microsoft "had a very long time" to comply with the ruling.

The provision in dispute requires Microsoft to offer technical information to its competitors in the computer server market, to help the rival products work as smoothly with Windows as Microsoft's own server products would.

That reflects the central goal of the repeated antitrust actions against the company -- reducing the advantage Microsoft enjoys because of its dominant Windows operating system.

The trustee in the case called Microsoft's initial versions of the technical documents "fundamentally flawed" and "totally unfit" for the intended use.

But Microsoft says the commission itself wasn't originally clear enough about what it wanted, hampering the project.

"We are committed to complying with every part of this decision," Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith said last week. "We always have been."

Last year, the commission said Microsoft hadn't met a Dec. 15 deadline for supplying "complete and accurate" documentation. In March, the agency repeated its threat to fine Microsoft up to 2 million euros, or $2.5 million, for every day past the deadline that it didn't comply.

That maximum penalty would add up to more than $500 million, if counted until this week, although the precise time frame hasn't yet been disclosed.

Whether or not the threat of a fine played a role, the situation appeared to improve after the commission's March warning. Microsoft's Smith credits a meeting in late March where the trustee, computer science professor Neil Barrett, clarified the requirements for the documents.

After that, the company brought in veteran engineers to help meet an aggressive series of deadlines Barrett laid out. Microsoft says it also brought back retired employees and pulled people from products including Windows Vista, the new version of its flagship PC operating system, to work on the European Union initiative.

"The way we approached it was to kind of think of the commission -- and the trustee, in particular -- as a customer who we had some customer-satisfaction issues with," said Bill Laing, general manager in Microsoft's Server & Tools division and a leader of the European project.

In an office on the Microsoft campus last week, project leaders told stories of the team working extreme hours over the past three months. They recounted times such as the morning that work was interrupted after 3 a.m. by a campus fire alarm.

Sanders, general manager for Windows networking and collaboration, said the team making the European documents is focused on its work, not on the fine.

"It's out of our control," Sanders said. "I think we have done a lot of really good work in getting this stuff out the door, and that's all we can do."

Elements of their work can also be applied to the requirements of Microsoft's U.S. antitrust settlement. Although the next versions of Windows and Office have both been delayed, Microsoft says it doesn't believe diverting people to work on the EU or U.S. documentation has played a role.

The group says it has met all six deadlines to date under Barrett's revised schedule. It has named each of the milestones after a stop on the Circle Line of the London Underground, at the suggestion of Iain McDonald, director of program management for the Windows Server group and the project management leader of the EU initiative.

It will be difficult, but the group expects to meet the seventh and final deadline -- Paddington Station -- on July 18, said McDonald and Sanders.

"It is an effort that is quite massive," Smith said. "This is probably the most complex remedy that has ever been imposed in a competition law case."

DOJ_NMG_0038991

But the recent activity isn't expected to prevent the commission from imposing fines against Microsoft this week dating back to December. Kroes, the competition commissioner, told reporters in Europe last week that she saw no alternative but to impose daily fines for Microsoft's lack of compliance with the ruling.

"If that new technical documentation does finally bring them into compliance, all well and good. They would not, therefore, be subject to further penalty payments in the future," said Todd, the commission spokesman.

"But the decision on the agenda (this week) is whether or not to impose these penalty payments backdated to the 15th of December, because they have not been in compliance."

The situation shows that the commission isn't just "settling for issuing a decision," Kroes said during a Friday speech in Bonn, Germany, according to an Associated Press report. "It is just as important that this decision has the desired effect on the market."

A $500 million fine wouldn't be extraordinary compared with Microsoft's past antitrust settlements and penalties. Under the commission's ruling in March 2004, for example, Microsoft paid a $600 million fine.

Microsoft is appealing the EU's 2004 ruling but has been ordered to comply with its provisions pending the outcome of the appeal. The other main element required the company to offer a version of Windows without Windows Media Player, although that product has experienced limited market demand.

The new fines would deal solely with the separate aspect of the ruling, the technical documentation for computer servers.

Microsoft's Smith declined to say whether he, Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates or Chief Executive Steve Ballmer had been in touch with Kroes, the European competition commissioner, to try to prevent the imposition of fines.

Last week, the commission reportedly received consent from the antitrust representatives of European Union member states on the principle of imposing daily fines against Microsoft. Today, they are due to take up the issue of how much to impose.

Then, on Wednesday, the European Commission is expected make the final decision on the fine. Competition Commissioner Kroes is scheduled to hold a news conference that day.

In addition to the fines running back to Dec. 15, the commission may threaten further fines if Microsoft doesn't comply, according to news reports out of Europe last week.

Under a formula set out by competition law, the maximum daily fine against Microsoft from this point forward could be as much $5.5 million a day.

Venture To Buy Heritage Property (WSJ)

By Ryan Chittum And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

An Australian and American joint venture agreed to purchase strip-mall owner Heritage Property Investment Trust Inc. for about $1.83 billion in a deal that will more than double its U.S. presence in the sector.

Centro Watt, a partnership between Centro Properties Group, a publicly traded Australian company, and Watt Commercial Properties, a private Los Angeles-based concern, will pay $36.15 a share for the Boston-based real-estate investment trust. The price represents a 3.3% premium to Friday's close of $34.98 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Including debt, Centro is paying about $3.3 billion and getting what it says is a 7.3% capitalization rate -- the return on investment in the first year of ownership, a key real-estate measure.

Heritage owns 157 strip malls with 27 million square feet of space in 27 states. It has been sharply criticized by investors and analysts for its executive-compensation practices, which have led the industry while its share performance has lagged.

Last year Heritage Chief Executive Thomas C. Prendergast received $16.4 million in total compensation, including salary, restricted stock and retirement benefits. Heritage has significantly underperformed its peers in the four-plus years it has been public, with a total return to investors of 87.7% since it went public in April 2002, compared with 154.5% for strip-mall companies, according to SNL Financial. The company restated earnings last fall back to 2003 because of errors in its executive-compensation accounting.

Centro Watt came into the bidding process when it was under way for several months, around the time of the big annual shopping-center convention in Las Vegas in May. At the time, it appeared Heritage was taking itself off the block because it wasn't getting a high enough price from American bidders, including Equity One Inc. and Lightstone Group LLC. Centro Watt was able to pay more because the Australian cost of capital is much lower now than it is in the U.S.

Heritage shares reached a 52-week high of $40.24 in March on speculation it would be acquired.

Centro Watt plans to put most of the individual properties into various unlisted funds, while retaining sizable interests in them and collecting fee income.

The deal will help Centro Watt leverage its size with retailers who are looking for efficiencies in negotiating leases for large numbers of stores.

We Aren't All Pirates (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 10, 2006

THE INTERNET AND DIGITAL technology have been both a blessing and a curse for the entertainment industry, opening new opportunities for selling music and video but also fueling rampant global piracy.

To attack the latter problem, industry lobbyists are pressing Congress to adopt at least five different proposals that would give them more control over their works as they flow through new digital pipelines into living rooms and portable devices. But these measures, like the technologies they would affect, have a hard time distinguishing between illicit actions and legitimate ones.

The bills would pressure device makers and service providers to limit or eliminate features from some products, such as the ability to record individual songs off satellite radio. In essence, tech companies would have to alter what they are selling to safeguard the entertainment industry's wares.

Protecting intellectual property is a legitimate goal for Congress — after all, the Constitution called on Congress to give authors and inventors exclusive rights "to promote the progress of science and useful arts." The task has grown more urgent with the emergence of an Internet-fueled global information economy. But what the entertainment industry is seeking in this year's proposals isn't merely protection from piracy; it's after increased leverage to protect its business models.

That's why lawmakers must bear in mind the balance needed between copyright holders' interests and the public's, something Congress has not done well lately. In 1998, it gave copyright holders broad power to block legitimate uses of works, even those in the public domain, through the use of electronic locks that impede copying of digital products. And that same year, it prolonged the public domain's starvation diet by extending copyrights an additional 20 years, to 70 years beyond the death of the creator.

The movie and music industries have similar interests, but their agendas this year are distinct. The major studios want to alter digital TV receivers, recorders and home networks to stop shows from being redistributed indiscriminately online — a proposal that has won grudging support from some consumer-electronics and high-tech firms. They also want to redesign computers, set-top boxes and other products to ensure that the limits placed on digital videos are not removed when the data are converted from digital to analog. This approach could deter people from making a permanent copy of a pay-per-view movie, but it also could make it hard for digital movie buyers to create backup copies or transfer videos to portable players.

The music industry, meanwhile, is focusing its fire on satellite and digital radio services that make it easy for listeners to record and save individual songs. Those recorders don't fuel piracy, given that federal law already requires them to include a form of anti-piracy technology. Instead, a more immediate effect of the industry-backed proposals would be to give labels and music publishers more control over listeners' ability to record broadcasts, while helping them collect more money from XM, Sirius and other digital music businesses.

Clearly, the industry-backed proposals would do more than just defend copyrighted works from pirates. They also would impinge on devices that have legitimate uses and steer the development of technology, cutting off some innovation. As they weigh the entertainment industry's pleas, lawmakers shouldn't assume all consumers are bootleggers and every digital device is a hand grenade aimed at Hollywood.

Judge Tells NOAA To Stop Jet Flights Into Hurricanes (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

A federal administrative law judge has stopped the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration from flying its high-altitude jet into hurricanes until the agency negotiates with a union representing meteorologists, engineers and technicians.

Richard A. Pearson , an administrative law judge with the Federal Labor Relations Authority, found that the NOAA's Aircraft Operations Center in Tampa had wrongfully bypassed the National Weather Service Employees Organization in forming a team to study proposals for flying a Gulfstream IV-SP jet into and near the centers of hurricanes as safely as possible.

NOAA officials contended that they were not changing the conditions of employment for the jet's civilian crews, but Pearson said the high speed and altitude of the jet, the hazards of flying close to a storm's inner core, and the inability of flight instruments to detect all hazards were "quantitatively and qualitatively different from those the employees were accustomed to . . . and required them to face new and more complex safety hazards."

Jordan St. John , the NOAA director of public affairs, said the judge's ruling is under review. The ruling "won't change any hurricane observations" this year, he said.

The NOAA's propeller planes, the WP-3D Orions used since 1981 to fly into hurricanes and collect weather data, were not covered by the ruling.

In 1996, NOAA acquired the Gulfstream jet to also measure weather conditions around hurricanes, typically about 40,000 feet and 100 miles from the eyes of the storms. Last year, in a decision that prompted the union's protest, the Gulfstream pilots made three flights into the "central dense overcast," the heavy clouds that form in the upper altitudes above the center of hurricanes and tropical storms.

Those "test missions," Jordan said, were designed to help NOAA prepare for installing new radar in 2008 on the jet for observation and measurement of storm forces.

In statements filed in the case, NOAA officials acknowledged that they had changed the jet's flight pattern "but not the environment into which the flights are conducted."

Pearson, however, said that NOAA "seems to be denying the obvious." The agency, Pearson said, "fully understands the safety implications of venturing into this new area, both on the aircraft and on the crews, because it has spent literally years trying to find the best ways of flying into this new area."Layoffs at the Library

The Library of Congress has notified 29 employees at the Congressional Research Service that their jobs will be abolished on Sept. 29.

The layoffs are believed to be the first in the 92-year history of CRS, the division of the library that tracks legislative issues and collects data for members of Congress. The workers being eliminated perform clerical, technical and audio-visual duties.

Last year, CRS announced plans to cut 59 jobs. Charles V. Stanhope , acting director of communications for the Library of Congress, said that 23 CRS employees left after being offered $25,000 buyouts and early retirement packages and that seven others found jobs elsewhere in CRS, at the library or outside the library.

The 29 employees to be laid off "cannot find positions with comparable pay and benefits," according to a newsletter published by the Congressional Research Employees Association, a part of the International Federation of Professional and Technical Engineers union.

Nearly two-thirds of the employees have 16 or more years of service with the Library of Congress, the association said.

In a memo to employees, the library said the layoffs were necessary "to maintain a cost-effective organization dedicated to meeting its statutory mission." But Michael Waterhouse , vice president of the employee association, said the layoffs would reduce "what we believe are essential services."Postal Resignation

Azeezaly S. Jaffer , vice president for public affairs and communications at the U.S. Postal Service for the past six years, has left "to pursue other career opportunities," the agency said.

Jaffer, a 20-year postal veteran, led a public relations campaign during the 2001 anthrax attacks aimed at maintaining public confidence in the post office. He was a ready defender of the Postal Service, writing numerous letters "setting the record straight," as he put it, that challenged news media accounts of postal operations.

His last day was June 30. Postmaster General John E. Potter named postal manager Jon Leonard acting head the public affairs office. Jaffer could not be reached for comment.

Coming Soon: A Tale Of Whistle-Blowing At The EPA (WP)

By Darryl Fears

Marsha Coleman-Adebayo is ready for her close-up.

She sold the story of her battles with the Environmental Protection Agency to Hollywood, and actor Danny Glover is preparing a movie about how she blew the whistle against the agency and successfully sued for race and gender discrimination.

But Coleman-Adebayo is no star at the EPA, which has described her as a bad employee who refuses to work with others. She was allowed to work at home for five years because of a medical condition, but when she resisted coming back in April, the EPA took away her pay.

"They are really trying to break me, financially, emotionally and everything else," Coleman-Adebayo, 53, said in a recent interview.

The tense, stressful, dramatic and sometimes-ugly relationship between employer and employee is the stuff of movies. But the case involves larger issues about how the government treats employees who feel they are being retaliated against. Coleman-Adebayo and others say it amounts to corruption.

Her career at the EPA took a bad turn after she complained that the agency stood by in 1996 as a U.S. chemical company mined a deadly substance in South Africa. She won a $600,000 discrimination judgment against the agency in 2000.

"Adebayo's case is interesting because the issues of whistle-blowing and retaliation in federal government are larger than any one employee, particularly in the wake of Sept. 11," said Joslyn Barnes, a New York screenwriter who is working on the screenplay.

The EPA declined to discuss Coleman-Adebayo's complaints because a second lawsuit she filed against the agency is pending and because her case is a personnel matter.

"EPA will not comment on the specifics of the pending litigation except to deny that EPA has discriminated or retaliated against Dr. Coleman-Adebayo," EPA spokeswoman Jennifer Wood said in a prepared statement last month.

The agency's opinions of Coleman-Adebayo are revealed in court documents and recent e-mails that she provided. In one e-mail, a supervisor, Rafael DeLeon, dismissed her complaints of "hostile workplace events" and a "pattern and practice of harassment." They are not medical facts, he wrote. They "merely represent your self-serving and baseless version of events."

Court records show that the EPA includes one white supervisor who referred to Coleman-Adebayo, who is African American, as "an honorary white person," and another supervisor who allegedly referred to her as "uppity," a segregation-era word for black people who do not accept the notion that they are inferior. The supervisors were never reprimanded.

The federal workplace is rife with complaints by whistle-blowers of retaliation, often involving threats of job loss. Such complaints usually play out in an arcane equal-opportunity process, rarely seeing the light of day.

Coleman-Adebayo's case stands out because her crusade against what she calls "government corruption" won her powerful allies, such as President Bush and House Judiciary Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), who recently wrote a letter to the EPA on her behalf.Lodging Complaints

Sixteen years ago, Coleman-Adebayo was a promising hire, having graduated from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology with a doctorate in African studies. Her work was generally commended.

But when Coleman-Adebayo traveled to South Africa as part of a U.S. delegation focusing on the environment in 1996, her career took a turn for the worse.

She became a whistle-blower after discovering that a U.S. chemical company was mining a deadly substance in South Africa called vanadium pintoxide. Exposure often turns the tongue blue, causes nosebleeds, kidney and liver dysfunction, and sometimes cancer.

When the EPA did not react to her complaints, she took the issue to non-government interest groups. The EPA finally reacted -- against Coleman-Adebayo. Her evaluations worsened, and she said her requests for promotions were denied as white men with far less experience rose above her pay grade.

Coleman-Adebayo sued, and her court battle in 2000 played out like a war. EPA managers said they were upset over the South Africa incident.

"She disagreed with me and made criticisms of the way the agency, of which she was a part, was doing its job," William Nitze, an EPA supervisor who worked in South Africa, testified in 2000. "You have to understand that when we try and organize and manage a program at EPA, we tried to do it as a team."

The agency said the men who rose to positions above Coleman-Adebayo's did so because they were better fundraisers and got along better with others.

Coleman-Adebayo's lawyers said race was also a factor. Witnesses said a white assistant administrator, Alan Bruce Sielen, motioned Coleman-Adebayo into a meeting of mostly white people and said it was all right because she was "an honorary white person."

Sielen denied the claim, but one of the witnesses, a black man, said he confronted Sielen after he also called him an honorary white person. Later in testimony, Coleman-Adebayo said Sielen told her she was denied a promotion because another supervisor said she was too "uppity."

The supervisor, Alan Hecht, a deputy administrator, denied the claim. The EPA fought back, enlisting psychiatrist Christiane Tellefsen to assess Coleman-Adebayo's mental state. Tellefsen said in testimony that Coleman-Adebayo was a self-centered, narcissistic woman who "tended to speak in a dramatic way."

In explaining how Coleman-Adebayo was "passive-aggressive," Tellefsen said she was uncooperative, even when asked to provide her children's names. But in cross-examination, lawyers showed that Coleman-Adebayo did provide the children's names, but the doctor believed the African names were made up. Coleman-Adebayo's husband is Nigerian.

The testimony of Jon T. Grand, who had been an EPA manager, offered evidence that Coleman-Adebayo's discrimination claim had merit. Grand, who is white, recalled that a white manager privately told him that they called her "Rosa Parks of the EPA" behind her back.

Years later, Grand's career at the EPA would free-fall. The agency had him prosecuted, and he was sent to jail because he did not report the EPA's mistake of overpaying him when he worked for the agency in Denmark. Grand said that he did report the error, but a secretary failed to act. Facing a long prison sentence, he pleaded guilty and was sentenced to four months in jail.

"I do actually believe that had I not testified, this would never have happened," Grand said.Another Fight, Another Suit

Coleman-Adebayo won her case but was later found to have uncontrollable hypertension. The EPA asked her to resign, but she refused, saying the men who discriminated against her were allowed to stay.

The agency agreed to temporarily allow Coleman-Adebayo to work from home. But her telecommute lasted for four years as her illness worsened. During that time, she helped form the No Fear Coalition to protect whistle-blowers and worked with Congress to make the No Fear (Notification and Federal Employee Anti-Discrimination and Retaliation) Act into law in 2002.

Good Housekeeping magazine presented her in 2003 with its Women in Government award for courage. Later that year, Coleman-Adebayo filed a second lawsuit, alleging retaliation by the EPA.

A year later, she was reassigned from a specialist job to a lower analyst position, effective Dec. 1, 2004. Eight days later, the agency placed her in yet another post.

The EPA sent a letter saying the new job would be "done in an office setting." Coleman-Adebayo read it at the cluttered desk in her kitchen, surrounded by numerous bottles of medication prescribed for hypertension and glaucoma.

For a year, Coleman-Adebayo and the EPA traded letters like punches. She continued to telecommute until the agency ordered her into the office this April. After complaining of dizziness, she left in an ambulance. The EPA placed her on family leave, without pay.

Coleman-Adebayo's response seemed worthy of a line in the screenplay.

"They want me to make a choice between my life and my job," she said.

Vital Tool Of Last Resort (USAT)

By Donald J. Borut

USA Today, July 10, 2006

In all the noise that surrounded the decision by the Supreme Court one year ago to continue to allow cities to use eminent domain when considering the economic future of their communities, something vital was left out: the facts.

Without eminent domain to clear title on abandoned and vacant properties — the primary use of eminent domain in this country — rundown buildings and empty lots would attract trash, rodents and trouble. Blighted structures would sit abandoned. If owners didn't want to sell or were holding out for more money, the cities and their taxpayers could do nothing to get rid of them.

Despite what some might claim, this is how eminent domain has been and continues to be used in this country: to revitalize older parts of Philadelphia; to transform an area in Indianapolis once referred to as "Dodge City" into a beautiful, mixed-income neighborhood; to save a historic church in Fitzgerald, Ga.

Let's take a closer look at the facts:

Since the Supreme Court's Kelo ruling, 43 state legislatures reviewed eminent domain laws and made changes to meet the needs of their communities. In a few cases, after numerous public hearings, legislators determined that no change was needed.

According to a survey by the National League of Cities, 76% of municipalities had not used eminent domain in the past three years in connection with an economic development project. But where it was invoked, eminent domain was used only as a last resort after all other options were explored.

Of the 5,700-plus properties claimed by the Institute for Justice to involve eminent domain in the past year, many were part of 117 multiphased and publicly scrutinized economic development projects begun well before the Kelo decision to eradicate blight — a practice even dissenting Justice Sandra Day O'Connor found appropriate.

Ensuring that owners receive appropriate compensation for their properties is equally important. In cases such as Norwood, Ohio, which was cited by the Institute as an abuse, the majority of owners willingly received twice the assessed fair market value; the "hold-outs" three times their value.

The prudent use of eminent domain has brought hope and opportunity — through good jobs and better housing — to thousands of Americans. That story deserves to be told.

Donald J. Borut is executive director of the National League of Cities.

One Year Later, Power To Seize Property Ripe For Abuse (USAT)

USA Today, July 10, 2006

Remember Susette Kelo? The New London, Conn., nurse lost a landmark legal fight to save her pink cottage from being seized by city officials, who wanted to hand it over to developers. Just over a year ago, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled against her. It held 5-4 that local governments could condemn private property, not just for a public purpose such as a road or school, but also to give to developers if a locality's economic future is at issue.

As it turned out, that wasn't the end of the story. The house won't be bulldozed after all. Last month, officials agreed to move it to another location so that her land can round out a waterfront development site — a compromise Kelo suggested years ago to little avail.

Meanwhile, the ruling has ignited a nationwide fight between developers rushing to seize a fresh opportunity and an unlikely political coalition that sees the decision as an assault on America's "home-as-castle" mind-set.

Emboldened by the ruling, local governments have threatened or condemned 5,783 properties for private projects in the past year, according to the Institute for Justice, the libertarian law firm that defended Kelo. That's up from an annual average of 2,056 such threats and takings from 1998 to 2002, the Institute said.

Of 117 projects the Institute studied over the past year, most involved taking lower-income homes, apartments and mobile home parks to construct upscale condominiums or retail development, driving the working poor from their homes.

But the Kelo case also has inspired a political backlash unusual in the annals of Supreme Court rulings. It has united conservative defenders of property rights and liberals who say the seizures amount to corporate welfare at the expense of the powerless.

They've scored significant victories:

· Twenty-five states have enacted laws to curb eminent domain seizures — something the Supreme Court invited them to do in making its ruling.

· The U.S. House of Representatives voted 376-38 last year to bar federal economic development funds to state and local agencies that use eminent domain for private commercial development. A similar bill is stalled in the Senate.

· On June 23, one year after the Kelo decision, President Bush issued an executive order that federal agencies can seize private property only for public projects.

Those actions should help ensure that the growing movement to prevent unjustified seizures of private property will gain momentum. In the words of dissenting Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, "the government now has the license to transfer property from those with fewer resources to those with more" as long as there is some purported economic benefit. And that is wrong.

Supporters of seizures such as the one in New London argue that abuses are rare and that condemnation is needed to revitalize abandoned or blighted areas and encourage the growth of jobs. But the truth is that under the court's ruling almost no one's property is safe unless states impose limits.

Seizures of one person's property to benefit another should be rare and a last resort. The halfway happy ending to Susette Kelo's ordeal should encourage political leaders to do more to stop bulldozers from plowing through the American dream.

The President: Shades Of Green (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, July 17, 2006

Before moving into the White House, George W. Bush built the kind of vacation home that Al Gore might have designed. His Texas ranch captures rain and wastewater for landscaping. Solar panels line the roof and an underground geothermal system provides heating and air conditioning. There's even a protected forest that is home to the rare golden-cheeked warbler.

Unlike his caricature, Bush is not monochromatic when it comes to the environment. During the final weeks of the 2000 campaign. he lampooned Gore's plans to cut taxes for those living a green lifestyle. "How many of you own a hybrid electric-gasoline-engine vehicle?" he would ask at rallies. "How many of you have a rooftop photovoltaic system?"

But following his green-tinted State of the Union address in January, Bush now travels the country promoting both hybrid vehicles and solar power. Just last month he created a huge national monument around the remote northwestern islands of Hawaii.

Has Bush turned green in his six years in office? Both environmentalists and the White House say no—but for different reasons. To activists, Bush's record is unremittingly bad. They accuse him of relaxing clean-air standards on power plants and refineries, and of blocking Kyoto-style measures to halt global warming. They even question the sincerity of his plan to protect the Hawaiian Islands, given the Navy's nearby use of powerful sonar that can harm whales. "Whatever motivated him to build a green ranch before he was president hasn't been translated at all into policy," says Frances Beinecke of the Natural Resources Defense Council.

On the other side, Bush's aides say the president is unchanged—he has always been an ardent conservationist—and have their own take on his record. On the highways, Bush has set rules to improve the fuel consumption of light trucks and SUVs. In the air, he has proposed the first-ever cut in mercury emissions from power plants. And on global warming, the most controversial part of his green scorecard, Bush acknowledged back in June 2001 that the National Academy of Sciences believed climate change was "due in large part to human activity." The dispute is what to do about that warming. Bush thinks new technologies—not treaties—can save the day.

While the debate about Bush rages on, the political landscape is changing. Green proponents are looking to new GOP leaders like Sen. John McCain (the 2008 front runner), as well as Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who supports caps on greenhouse gases in California.

Some of Bush's underlings are struggling to keep up with the greener approach to energy. The day after Bush promoted renewables in his State of the Union, the Energy Department laid off 32 people at its renewable-energy lab in Colorado. They got their jobs back the day before a certain VIP toured the lab: one George W. Bush. Greening the government is sometimes harder than greening a ranch.

A Dated Carbon Approach (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

These days almost nobody asserts that global warming isn't happening. Instead, we are confronted with a new lie: that we can respond to climate change without taxing and regulating carbon.

The Bush administration -- and many Democrats, too -- promise technological salvation: hydrogen fuel cells, ethanol distilled from grass, solar power, windmills, whatever. It's more fun to call for whiz-bang technologies than regulations and taxes. But it's also dishonest.

We already have technologies to cut carbon. Hybrid cars have been around for years, but almost nobody drives them. Small cars have been on the market even more years, but they aren't consumer hits either. There are dozens of technologies to insulate buildings and design heating and cooling systems in efficient ways. The problem is we don't use them.

You can even cut carbon using no technology whatever. Mexico City has reduced its output of carbon dioxide by almost 55,000 tons a year by opening one efficient bus route; the key innovation here was the creation of two bus lanes. The new buses run on diesel -- not exactly a technological breakthrough. But because they are rapid and frequent, the buses have brought car use down and reduced emissions.

So what matters is not just the technologies we have but the incentives to deploy them. The average Western European uses half as much energy as the average American, and that's not because there's more technology in Europe. Rather, Europeans have embraced anti-carbon policies ranging from gas taxes to emissions caps, from an absence of extravagant mortgage subsidies that encourage super-size homes to congestion charges for drivers in London and Stockholm.

Because of Norway's carbon taxes, companies drilling for natural gas in the North Sea are starting to capture the carbon dioxide they release and inject it back under the sea floor. Because the United States lacks a carbon tax, natural gas drillers in this country have less incentive to do that. Meanwhile the Energy Department reports that there are plans to build 150 new coal-fired power plants in the United States, enough to generate power for 93 million homes. But because government hasn't created intelligent incentives, most of these new generators won't be fitted with technology to capture and store the carbon.

So incentives count. Technology frequently turns out to matter less than policy. But the technology salvationists are a determined bunch. Faced with clear evidence that we aren't deploying the technology we have, they insist that the solution is yet more technology. We need need need that next technological breakthrough, they scream. And until we get it, there's no point trying to do anything.

How do these fantasists suppose that we'll get the next breakthrough? Government spending on basic research is supposed to do the trick: "The Administration has dedicated $1.2 billion over five years to the research and development needed to get hydrogen cars into the showroom," declares a White House fact sheet. But that $240 million per year, or the $150 million a year that the administration wants to spend on advanced ethanol, is a laughably small sum. Private energy firms spend about $18 billion a year on researching new technology for extracting hydrocarbons.

If you want to get hydrogen cars into the showrooms, you can't put your faith in government alone; you need Exxon and Shell and Toyota and Ford to make hydrogen a priority. And what's going to drive these companies' choices? Obviously, taxes and regulatory incentives. If carbon is subject to taxes or caps, the energy companies and car companies will devote more of their vast research budgets to alternative fuels. But if carbon is not taxed, they will research new ways of using and extracting oil -- including getting it from sources that are awful for climate, such as tar sands .

Don't get me wrong. I'm not against government support for basic research into alternative fuels, just as I'm not against government funding of basic research into health sciences. But to convert the discoveries from the National Institutes of Health into usable medicines, you need a patent system that gives pharmaceutical companies incentives. And to convert government research on hydrogen into drivable cars, you need a carbon tax or carbon cap that creates the right incentives for the private sector.

It feels good to be for new technology rather than for nasty new taxes or regulations. But this is a false choice. If you want the new technology, you have to support the new tax or the new cap. Those who argue otherwise should ask themselves: Would we have rapid medical innovation if we didn't bother to protect intellectual property?

Drafting The Future Of The Parks (NYT)

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

Last Friday marked the end of the public comment period on the most recent draft of the National Park Service's management policy — the core document that governs the day-to-day operation of the national parks. It's a relief to see that the current draft appears to reaffirm the doctrine that preservation is the core historical mission of the parks. That had been the philosophy guiding the Park Service for years, until the Bush administration attempted to give recreation and commercial use a much higher priority.

Compared with the original draft, this one is a marvel of sanity and historical conscience. But it's been a rough road getting to this point, and there may well be a few bumps ahead.

Over the past few weeks, there has been a concerted effort by the so-called recreation community — a euphemism for the motorized vehicle industry and its lobbyists — to change the draft. In at least two conference calls with Interior Department officials, snowmobile and off-road vehicle lobbyists have expressed their opposition to the restored emphasis on preservation.

What's most worrying about this last-minute lobbying — besides the fact that recreation seems limited to activities involving an internal combustion engine — is the suggestion, put forward by the American Recreation Coalition, that the Park Service revise the management policy regularly. There is only one reason for a suggestion like that: to give "recreation leaders" a regular chance to pressure the park system for increased motorized vehicle access.

No one, of course, wants to limit the use of the parks to hardy hikers. Our understanding of what it means to preserve the parks "unimpaired for the enjoyment of future generations" has changed dramatically since the parks system was established in 1916. Millions of motorists have visited wilderness they could never have reached on foot, using roadways that were carefully constructed to balance the goals of access and conservation. But what we have been seeing under this administration is an attempt to redefine enjoyment for the benefit of a small minority who want to eliminate restrictions on the use of noisy jet skis and open up the parks to off-road vehicles and snowmobiles.

The parks should not be sacrificed to the internal combustion engine. The new interior secretary, Dirk Kempthorne, should listen to the claims of the motorized recreationists and weigh them for what they are worth against the many thousands of public comments supporting the historical mission of the parks — and act accordingly.

Deadly Heroin Has Likely Hit Area (TLPA)

Times Leader (NE PA), July 9, 2006

WILKES-BARRE – Fentanyl is the new rat poison for heroin addicts.

Spicing up heroin with rat poison, strychnine or other chemicals has long been a practice of dealers seeking to attract customers looking for an even greater high. But sometimes the mix can be deadly – especially if the cut is fentanyl.

Daniel Dominick, 27, died Friday at Wilkes-Barre General Hospital after taking what was likely a fentanyl-heroin mix, according to Luzerne County Coroner's Office. The Luzerne man's death placed Wilkes-Barre on a growing list of cities where the deadly heroin concoction has been circulating in recent months.

More than 70 people have died from fentanyl-laced heroin in the Philadelphia area since April, and it's the same in other major cities. Officials in Detroit have reported more than 80 fentanyl-related fatalities and Chicago has had 60, according to respective law enforcement agencies.

In Pittsburgh, fentanyl-laced heroin is being sold on the street under the name "get high or die tryin', " and an increasing number of users are doing just that.

Just 125 micrograms is enough fentanyl to kill an adult – that's the equivalent of five or six grains of salt. Law enforcement experts say lacing heroin with the painkiller has only come in vogue this year, especially in the past three months.

An undercover narcotics agent for the Philadelphia police said addicts will seek out brands of heroin reputed to be the most potent, and in recent months have been traveling to Philadelphia from all over the state to get heroin laced with fentanyl.

"If there's an extra kick in it, they look for that brand," said the agent, who declined to be identified for safety reasons. "They'll ask for 'Dracula' or 'Nike' or another brand. The dealers know when it's cut with fentanyl but they don't care; not all the customers know."

According to the agent, users from the Wilkes-Barre area have been getting fentanyl-laced heroin from Hispanic communities on the East side of Philadelphia. “They come from everywhere to get this stuff. They’ll get two or three bundles so they don’t have to make the trip again.”

Although heroin cut with fentanyl has been claiming lives in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh since April, law enforcement officials weren’t sure if it had hit the streets of Wilkes-Barre until a string of overdoses last week culminated in a death Friday. City police and medics responded to approximately 15 drug overdoses last week, including five Friday.

Luzerne County Coroner Dr. John Consalvo can’t prove it was fentanyl that killed Dominick until he gets back a toxicology test in a couple weeks, but he suspects it was.

Fentanyl, some strains of which are hundreds of times more potent than heroin, affects people differently when cut with other drugs. In Friday’s incident, Dominick shared a needle with another man, who took a hit from the same batch of heroin, police said. That man, whose name was not released, showed no signs of a negative reaction.

Millvale Man Possible Overdose Fatality (PPG)

Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, July 9, 2006

A Millvale man died yesterday afternoon of a possible drug overdose, the Allegheny County medical examiner reported.

The 31-year-old man, whose identity was not released last night, was the first of two suspected drug overdoses reported yesterday. The second one, just before 10 p.m., happened in Pittsburgh and it was not fatal.

It was unclear last night whether both victims overdosed on heroin or fentanyl-laced heroin. Fentanyl is 80 times more powerful than morphine and thought to be responsible for scores of deaths throughout the country.

As of June 9, police were investigating 48 overdoses -- including eight fatalities -- throughout Allegheny County to see if they are linked to fentanyl. Two samples of heroin police recovered from seven of those eight death scenes tested positive for fentanyl, the medical examiner's office has said.

Yesterday, county homicide detectives were called at 4:32 p.m. to a residence in the 500 block of North Avenue in Millvale.

The 31-year-old man, of McIntyre Road, was pronounced dead at the scene at 4:50 p.m., an investigator for the medical examiner said.

More Spiked Heroin In Delaware? (AP)

AP, July 9, 2006

NEWARK, Del. (AP) - July 9, 2006 - Five heroin overdoses in a 24-hour period are leading to suspicions that heroin laced with a powerful painkiller has resurfaced in Delaware.

State police spokesman Corporal Jeff Oldham says investigators are looking into whether the heroin involved was laced with fentanyl.

Police say there have been two single-vehicle crashes that appear to be the result of overdoses.

Last night, paramedics revived two men who overdosed on heroin outside a gas station on Christiana Road. The men were in cardiac arrest when paramedics arrived. They told police they bought heroin in Wilmington and passed out shortly after they used it.

Oldham says another person overdosed today. None of the overdoses have been fatal.

Heroin laced with fentanyl has been linked to dozens of deaths in the Northeast this year.

Drug-corner Epidemic: Overdose (PHI)

By Sam Wood, Dwight Ott And Troy Graham

The Philadelphia Inquirer, July 9, 2006

Neighbors saw the guy bolting from the back of a graffiti-stained, abandoned house as he shouted the word that soon would ring out on drug corners across the country.

"Overdose."

Mercedes Perez, who lives a few doors down on this North Camden block, went to investigate.

In a junk-strewn lot teeming with flies and covered in broken glass, she found Samantha Bender, a young suburban mother, lying dead on her back, surrounded by empty blue bags of heroin.

"She was a pretty girl. Looked very young," said Wanda Guzman, another neighbor. "I thought she was only about 16."

Bender was, in fact, 23, and the mother of a 3-year-old daughter. She grew up in Gibbstown, Gloucester County. She was an avid fan of the local music scene and the author of elegiac poetry. And she was a beloved friend and relative.

On that April day, Samantha Bender became something else: a victim of the drug corner.

Bender, an autopsy would show, had injected heroin laced with a lethal dose of fentanyl, a powerful narcotic painkiller that has caused hundreds of deaths across the country.

"We don't know why she was there," said Bender's mother, Mary Ann Lanzetta. "She was a smart girl and had so much potential. It doesn't make one ounce of sense."

Drug corners like the one where Bender likely copped her heroin have been claiming lives through addiction, violence, and the lure of easy money for decades.

But Bender's death in the 1600 block of State Street was a harbinger for a new epidemic.

Since spring, fentanyl-laced heroin has killed as many as 100 people in the Philadelphia region, and hundreds more in cities such as Chicago, Detroit and Pittsburgh.

Despite a huge law-enforcement collaboration, investigators have yet to unlock the mystery of the fentanyl: Where is it coming from? Why is it being mixed with heroin? How can they stop it?

"It's come as a bit of a surprise, in some respects, that it's popped up in so many places at the same time with such vigor," said Jerry Daley, the executive director of a Philadelphia-Camden drug task force known as HIDTA (High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area). "We know a lot less than we'd like to."

The true depth of the problem remains shrouded, as well. No single agency has been keeping track of victims spread across the country, so no one knows how many have died.

"If there were this number of cases of measles, people would be jumping up and screaming," said Steven Marcus, director of the New Jersey Poison Center and one of the first people to notice the fentanyl outbreak. "But it's affecting a population that people have cast off... . There doesn't seem to be anyone in public health making a concerted effort to get all the data together."

Still, with so many addicts falling, police and health workers have sounded repeated alarms in the news media, bringing attention, once again, to an illegal, multimillion-dollar business catering to suburban demand and conducted on decrepit, inner-city street corners.

Corners such as Philadelphia's Fifth and Indiana, and Philip and Ontario. Corners such as the notorious spot in North Camden where Samantha Bender bought the $10 bag marked "D-Block" that would kill her.

Fifth and Grant

The 400 block of Grant Street is a tiny, one-way street where crumbling, trash-filled vacant shells outnumber the occupied homes. The corner, where Grant opens up to Fifth Street, bustles like a Turkish rug market.

Someone has erected a portable basketball hoop on the sidewalk, presumably to replace the sagging rim bolted to a piece of plywood on the far wall. Below that, a graffiti artist, with an abundance of irony, has spray-painted the words "drug free" in huge block letters.

The knot of young dealers passes the time pitching quarters or playing games of basketball bare-chested. They tell reporters to leave, that no one will talk to them. One accepts a business card, then burns a Phillies Blunt cigar through it.

A man sitting on a nearby porch makes a halfhearted apology.

"They're just young boys," he says. "They don't know."

He says his name is Mark. He carries himself like a man in charge, like the conductor of this corner. Then, a car rolls down the narrow street.

"No! Park the car!" Mark shouts. "Park the car!"

With a largely suburban clientele arriving in vehicles, corner etiquette requires them to park somewhere else, then walk up for a less conspicuous transaction.

The money goes to one member of the crew. Then Mark directs the customers up an alley, where another crew member will dispense the heroin.

By now, this is an old game, perfected before many of today's players were even born.

"It's been here since I came here," said Camden Police Lt. Frank Cook, a 22-year veteran, as he sat in his patrol car recently. "It's pervasive; especially heroin."

Police have successfully squashed the drug trade on corners such as this. But, inevitably, it pops up somewhere else.

Camden Police Capt. Joe Richardson estimated that the city had about 4,000 dealers, baggers, cutters and lookouts making money off the drug trade.

"We're outnumbered 10-1," he said. "It's a multimillion-dollar-a-year business."

North Camden used to be controlled by the Sons of Malcolm X, a mostly black street gang. The gang's two leaders, Kevin Money and Jose Perez, now reside just a few blocks away, at Riverfront State Prison. Their territory has changed hands to a mostly Hispanic crew.

No matter who owns the corners, Fifth and Grant remains prime real estate, a short walk from Rutgers-Camden and the Tweeter Center, and an even shorter drive from the Ben Franklin Bridge and several of the region's major highways.

The advent of fentanyl and its inherent dangers hasn't hurt business. In fact, selling lethal heroin has proven a great strategy for attracting addicts looking for the strongest dope.

"It's remarkable to me, it's totally counterintuitive. You would think when bodies start to fall... it would scare users off. Instead, it draws people in," said Acting Camden County Prosecutor James P. Lynch. "We've done a fair amount of publicity to warn people off... . We're starting to rethink that strategy now because it seems to enhance traffic."

And, as addiction psychiatrist Ken Hoffman said, "The difference between death and euphoria is a really fine line."

Despite the appeal of fentanyl's high, the fear of crossing that line appears to have driven some addicts to try, at least, to get clean. Matthew Sabo, a 45-year-old recovering addict from Gloucester City, said the number of people attending his Broadway methadone clinic had gone up by one-third.

"We had a doctor telling us that fentanyl was 150 times more powerful than heroin... . People don't want to die," he said. "It's nothing but trouble. Every day, somebody ODs out there. The whole town is infested."

Some authorities think the fentanyl problem is far larger than reported. They say an untold number of people overdose but survive without medical attention.

In the medical profession, fentanyl is most commonly described as being 80 times as powerful as morphine. The experts say 125 micrograms - the equivalent of three grains of salt - can be lethal.

"It doesn't take much of this drug to get you into trouble," said Hoffman, who works at the federal Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. "It can paralyze your chest wall so that you still have a pulse, but you can't breathe."

That's what would have happened to Samantha Bender and the others who have died from the killer heroin.

Yameralis Sanchez, 16, lives a few houses from where Bender died. She saw Bender going into the vacant house and tried to warn her.

"She looked at us like, 'It's not your house.' "

The sight of a "pretty white girl" using an abandoned home as a shooting gallery wasn't out of place, either.

"They are always whites, every day. They still use it," Sanchez said. "I lose count... . I see about 30 to 40 a day. I don't know how many use it after I go to bed."

Mixed with heroin abroad

Daley's HIDTA task force has been coordinating fentanyl intelligence for the region, but most investigators believe that the painkiller is being made and mixed with heroin in foreign countries, at the upper levels of the supply chain. In fact, federal agents busted an illicit lab in Mexico last month, but the fentanyl deaths have continued.

There are at least a dozen home methods for synthesizing illicit fentanyl, including one posted on the Internet by someone claiming to be an organic chemist. One of the essential chemicals for making fentanyl remains unregulated - and can be legally purchased by anyone. The Drug Enforcement Administration is trying to have it listed as a controlled precursor chemical, Daley said.

As for why the fentanyl is being added to heroin, the theories abound "but we can't put any credence in any of them yet," Daley said.

That leaves local police with traditional tactics to fight the epidemic - busting dealers and scaring off users. After decades of the drug war, veteran investigators have reasonable expectations.

"There are some people you could lock up a thousand times... . As soon as they're released from processing, they go right back. You can't beat that," said Capt. Joe Bowen of the Camden County Prosecutor's Office. "You'll see everything: juveniles, mothers with children. If you stop 25 percent from coming back, that's the goal. You'd like to do 100 percent, but that's not realistic."

Still, police in Camden have been out on the streets, fighting hard to stem the fentanyl tide. In particular, they have targeted Fifth and Grant with three "reversals" - sting operations in which undercover officers pose as drug dealers to arrest addicts.

In the first sting, they netted 102 people in about five hours, many in the morning hours when addicts need a fix to stave off sickness from withdrawal. Then, on consecutive days last month, they arrested 91 more people at Fifth and Grant.

To begin one of the reversals, officers took control of the corner by arriving in huge numbers, clogging the intersection with their SUVs and allowing a K-9 dog to roam on a leash. They stood there chatting and joking, until there could be no mistake that the corner belonged to them for the day. Then, they disappeared.

Officers wearing baggy jeans and T-shirts, baseball caps sitting sideways on their heads, huge gold chains dangling from their necks, took positions at the corner. A few minutes later, about 9:30 a.m., a white man wandered up and asked for six bags.

Those arrested were taken to a garage at the Delaware River Port Authority building, at the foot of the Ben Franklin Bridge, where they were photographed and fingerprinted. In a matter of minutes, they left with a court summons. The process amounted to a minor, embarrassing inconvenience for the addicts, but it gave police a chance to discourage them from going back to the corners.

Bowen, a reflective 23-year veteran who helped lock up many of the Sons of Malcolm X, approached a jittery Tara Marrollo in the DRPA garage. Her arms and hands were covered in scars. She admitted to shooting up as a tear mingled with the sweat on her face.

"I just can't stop," she said desperately. At 42, she has been using for 10 years after getting addicted to pain pills. She said she used two to three bags a day, and said she was unconcerned about a lethal shot of fentanyl.

"At this point in my life, I don't care," she said. "If I go to sleep and don't wake up, it doesn't matter."

Bowen warned her not to go back to Fifth and Grant, knowing her plans for the rest of the day.

"I'm going to go back out there and try to get another bag," she said matter-of-factly. "You have to have it to make yourself well."

As Marrollo talked, officers processed two teenage girls. One had just finished high school. The girls arrived at Fifth and Grant in a car with soaped windows, trumpeting the graduation.

After Marrollo leaves, Bowen stops them.

"You know what she said?" he asks the girls, gesturing toward Marrollo. " 'I used to be just like them.' "

Bowen chats with them, asking questions about their lives, offering Marrollo's as a cautionary tale. But the girls remain defiant.

"I'm not going to end up like her," says Tara Baker, a 19-year-old from Salem County. "We're not stupid."

"I've been doing this for a long time, girls," Bowen says, finally. "And they don't get much older than that."

'Dealers have no mercy'

Samantha Bender's time came to an end on April 27, four days after her birthday. Her mother figures that she took the 402 bus, leaving Gibbstown at 10:20 a.m. She was pronounced dead at 1:45 p.m.

Lanzetta said her daughter had been taking painkillers after a car accident. She said Samantha hated needles, hated heroin, hated addicts. She blamed the guy she was with. She struggled to make sense of her daughter's death.

"Parents, pay attention to what your children are doing. Be aware. This is no joke. Drug dealers have no mercy... . That first and only time will kill you," she said. "I pray some good comes of this."

At Fifth and Grant, no good has come. Despite the fentanyl scare, the 200 arrests and the death of Samantha Bender, the corner thrives.

"I'm on my way to get some now," said Joseph D., a 29-year-old from Philadelphia, as he headed toward Fifth and Grant. He would not give his full name.

"Actually, people are trying to find it because it f-s you up. Dope ain't what it used to be. They know it's got fentanyl," he said. "I come to Camden because it's good, because the bags are bigger and better."

Meth Crackdown In Southwest Michigan Shows Results (AP)

AP, July 9, 2006

KALAMAZOO, Mich. (AP) — An effort to fight the production and use of methamphetamine in southwest Michigan has paid off, the U.S. attorney's office says, but officials are concerned that drug makers could relocate.

During the past seven months, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration has assisted Kalamazoo-area law enforcement in the crackdown.

Thirty-five people were arrested, seven methamphetamine labs were seized and marijuana, cocaine, heroin and meth were confiscated. In one seizure last week, police confiscated more than 50 firearms.

Meth — a highly addictive drug — can be made with common household products, including cold medicine that has pseudoephedrine. It's a growing problem in many parts of Michigan and in several other states.

Kalamazoo County's meth lab seizures dropped to 30 this year from 115 in 2005. Barry County had one seizure, down from 11 last year, the Kalamazoo Gazette reported. Calhoun County also had fewer meth cases, prosecutor John Hallacy told the Battle Creek Enquirer.

But Margaret Chiara, U.S. attorney for the Western District of Michigan, said she is worried that the manufacture of the drug might move to other areas following the crackdown in the Kalamazoo area.

"I have enormous concern for the rest of Michigan," Chiara said.

The special operation involved the Michigan State Police as well as local prosecutors and law enforcement. Police declined to provide specifics about those arrested and the locations of the labs.

Local law enforcement officials said they also have made an effort to increase education outreach to teachers, day-care centers and residents so others can recognize production in their communities.

DEA, Local Police Complete Seventh-month Probe (SJ)

By Corky Emrick

Sturgis Journal, July 8, 2006

KALAMAZOO — A seven-month investigation spearheaded by the Drug Enforcement Administration, United States Attorney General's Office and many local police agencies was the focus of a special press conference held Friday in Kalamazoo.

"Law enforcement has a tradition of working collaboratively to more effectively protect those who live and work in western Michigan," said United States Attorney Margaret Chiara.

Last week, special agents from the DEA and members of the St. Joseph Area Narcotics Unit and Three Rivers Police Department spent one day following up on leads and tips for suspected methampthetamine dealers and users.

"The cooperation that we had in our county was something that I've never seen before," said Dave Alli of SCAN. "We basically quadrupled the size of our unit. It put the meth community on notice, those making meth, those selling meth were shocked that we're able to bring in federal agents, state and local police together at an hour's notice."

The seven-month investigation covered most of southwest Michigan and included the counties of St. Joseph, Cass, Barry, Kalamazoo, Allegan and Van Buren.

The DEA from its Detroit office mobilized a seven-person mobile enforcement team, or MET, to help with the cooperative effort.

"The MET deployments are designed to have an immediate and positive impact on the quality of life for our local residents plagued by these drug organizations blatant disregard for public safety," said Robert Corso, a DEA Detroit special agent.

MET is designed to help state and local authorities to combat drug problems.

"We come in and take them out, it's as simple as that," Corso said. "We're kind of like exterminators that target a specific type of pest."

Corso said the DEA has been monitoring the meth activity in southwest Michigan for some time.

"The negative impact that meth has had on this community along with communities around the country is devastating," Corso said. "Meth dealers set up shop in residential buildings, motels and agricultural-rural areas. Most often, the innocent victims are children."

Corso said he wanted to send a clear message to those who manufacture meth.

"We will not tolerate that habit brought to our communities and we will not stop until you are personally unable to enjoy the freedom and beauty these communities have to offer," Corso said. "The drug war is not over. We are out there every day doing what we do best."

Will the DEA return in another joint effort?

"Absolutely we'll come back," he said. "I just won't tell you when."

In the seven-month operation, there were 31 arrests, 16 federal indictments and five meth labs uncovered, officials said.

Last week, two more labs were found. Six people were arrested and officers seized 50 guns.

Police also closed down a major cocaine operation in Albion that resulted in six arrests, they said.

Corso said there has been a decrease in meth labs, but that they are now seeing more meth imported from south of the border using existing marijuana and cocaine trails.

"Most of the labs we are seeing now are Beavis and Butt-Head labs," Corso said.

Meth Labs Seized During Seven-month Probe (BCE)

Battle Creek Enquirer, July 8, 2006

KALAMAZOO — Thirty-five people were arrested and seven methamphetamine labs seized during a seven-month undercover investigation in South Central Michigan, officials announced Friday.

"We haven't stopped it, but at least (we) put a temporary halt on the spreading menace of methamphetamine," Margaret Chiara, United States attorney for the western district of Michigan, told reporters.

Chiara and several federal, state and local law enforcement officials said the undercover operation was run by the Detroit-based Drug Enforcement Agency Mobile Enforcement Team.

The operation also involved the Michigan State Police and local prosecutors and law enforcement from the counties of Calhoun, Kalamazoo, Barry, Cass, Van Buren and St. Joseph. Officials praised the cooperative effort.

The investigation included the arrest of six people in Albion on charges of distribution of cocaine after officers from the Albion Department of Public Safety developed information on a distribution system of that drug. They were aided by agents from the DEA, according to ADPS Lt. Scott Kipp.

"We have had several raids in the last three or four months," Kipp said. Police still are looking for JonTaj Rolann Wallace, 30, described as a supplier of cocaine in the Albion area.

While the same people don't use and distribute meth and cocaine, DEA targeted those allegedly involved in the Albion cocaine trade and agreed to help police as part of the bigger investigation, said Andrew Eiseman, group supervisor of the DEA Mobile Enforcement Team that conducted the investigation.

The concept of the DEA MET, organized more than 10 years ago, is to send federal officers to areas of the country to help combat drug trafficking, officials said.

They said the investigations are continuing and did not provide specific details of those arrested or the locations of the meth labs. But Lt. Wayne Edington of the Michigan State Police Southwest Enforcement Team said one of the meth labs seized last week was in Athens. He said arrests are pending in that case.

Calhoun County Prosecutor John Hallacy said there remain fewer numbers of meth cases in the county than in several counties like Kalamazoo and Van Buren.

"We have just not seen that huge tidal wave," Hallacy said.

The most recent numbers show Hallacy's office issued 42 counts in 2005 in meth-related cases, compared with 48 in 2004.

Several officials from other counties said their numbers have dropped in 2006. They pointed to a Michigan law enacted this year requiring that all cold medicine containing ephedrine or pseudoephedrine — ingredients used to make meth — only be sold to people 18 years of age or older with a photo identification.

Edington also pointed to a strong education effort by county law enforcement and the Substance Abuse Council as helping curtail the spread of the drug.

Robert L. Corso, special agent in charge of the DEA's Detroit office, said most of the meth labs are small and the drugs are for personal use or distributed to a small group of people. But he said the toxic waste produced during the manufacture of the drug is especially harmful to people and the environment.

"It's dangerous for all living things," Chiara added, "including Mother Nature."

Eiseman said he and six DEA agents worked on the cases and estimated the cost to the agency at $200,000.

METH Inc.: The Route To Minnesota (ST)

By Paul McEnroe

Star Tribune, July 10, 2006

In the eyes of the federal agents who secretly watched him, Alberto Zatarain was a drug dealer who made all the right moves.In the eyes of the federal agents who secretly watched him, Alberto Zatarain was a drug dealer who made all the right moves.

He had at least three aliases. He switched cell phones every month and drove ugly old cars to avoid notice. After dark, he holed up and watched TV inside a rented matchbox house in Richfield that rattled from low-flying jets. No clubs, no parties, no women.

And every few months, when another runner came up from Mexico, Zatarain handed off suitcases of cash -- profits from a booming business that stretched from metro suburbs to farm towns in the Red River Valley to Fargo.

He was selling methamphetamine, and demand never let up.

Operating a network of stash houses from Richfield to Brooklyn Park, and often delivering meth hidden inside jars of instant coffee to customers, Zatarain and his band of couriers at times in recent years reeled in $250,000 a month.

"He controlled Minnesota and North Dakota," a federal drug-enforcement agent said.

Zatarain, 23, wasn't an independent operator. He was a point man for a shadowy, cunning cartel in Mexico that federal authorities say now dominates the illicit meth trade besieging Minnesota and the Midwest.

The cartel, rooted in Mexico's Sinaloa region, is producing a highly addictive form of the drug in large clandestine labs south of the border, then shipping stockpiles of it here to dealers such as Zatarain through a cross-country smuggling system.

But his success made him careless. Today, Zatarain is in the Sherburne County jail, convicted on federal drug-conspiracy charges, sentenced to 15 years, and awaiting transfer to federal prison. He is one of only a few large-scale meth dealers in Minnesota with ties to the Sinaloa cartel to get caught in recent years.

Court documents obtained by the Star Tribune, along with interviews with federal agents and attorneys involved in Zatarain's case, illustrate in detail how he operated before his organization unraveled. Zatarain also pleaded guilty last month to a second set of drug charges, from deals he allegedly tried to make in the past year while behind bars.

The cartel, meanwhile, is still flourishing, undeterred by his arrest and apparently capitalizing on a new state law that's wiping out the small-time meth producers once prevalent in Minnesota. The law restricts the sale of cold medicines that contain a chemical commonly used to process the drug.

Federal authorities say Mexican cartels now control at least 80 percent of the meth sold in Minnesota and are filling the supply void being created by the demise of mom-and-pop dealers. The cartels are ever more responsible for a drug scourge costing the state several hundred million dollars a year.

Federal agents say that Zatarain's case, in which nearly a dozen others with ties to the cartel also were prosecuted, has shed new light on how the Sinaloa cartel works. But not enough to shut it down.

Midway through this year, a Drug Enforcement Administration task force fighting the meth trade in Minnesota is on a pace to confiscate more cartel shipments here than ever. Last year, the task force seized nearly 50 kilos (1 kilo is 2.2 pounds) of the drug. Already this year, nearly 40 kilos have been seized.

Tom Kelly, the head of the DEA's office in Minneapolis, said the cartel's reach is enormous. "You can't stop it at the border of Minnesota," he said. "It's a constant uphill battle."

El Grande kept calling. His real name was Emilio Flores, and he was a cartel connection in Denver, a regional hub for heroin and meth on its way to Minnesota from Mexico. He wanted Zatarain, nicknamed Beto, to stay in the Twin Cities for the winter.

Normally, to keep a low profile, the cartel rotated its distributors in and out of the metro area every few months. But business was too good for Zatarain to return home to Tepic, a city in western Mexico where the cartel has roots.

El Grande and Zatarain, federal agents listening in on wiretaps soon would learn, spent a lot of time on the phone, often talking in code about selling meth -- which is also known on the street as crystal, glass or ice.

Since 2002, Zatarain had worked throughout the Twin Cities for the cartel. Initially, he sold heroin. But it was impossible to ignore the shift in consumer demand for meth -- especially in the suburbs, where authorities say it now ranks alongside cocaine and marijuana as a drug of choice.

For every sale of heroin, DEA agents estimated, Zatarain could make 10 sales of meth. The difference could mean thousands of dollars. By mid-2004, meth, selling sometimes at $12,000 a pound, had become the focus of Zatarain's operation for the cartel.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Andrew Dunne, the head of the Minnesota office's narcotics section, said that the meth pouring into the state from Mexico has become the focus of law enforcement officials, too.

"It is the number one drug threat facing federal drug prosecutors and agents in the Midwest," Dunne said.

The cartel to which Zatarain reported, law enforcement officials say, studied the exploding demand for meth in Minnesota and the Midwest and created a sophisticated business plan to capitalize on it. In many ways, authorities say, the cartel's tactics resemble how a corporation enters an international market.

"The cartel is run like a regular business and set up like a Fortune 500 company," Kelly said. "It has people who work on the transportation side, the finance side, the communications side, and they all work in concert to move a product to where the demand is very high."

Far from the reach of the DEA, the cartel first built labs in Mexico capable of large-scale production. To get great quantities of the drug made quickly, federal investigators say, the cartel also illegally began importing tons of ephedrine, a key ingredient in meth, from India and China. One lab in Mexico soon could produce as much as 50 pounds of meth a week.

By contrast, homemade meth labs in Minnesota -- whose numbers have plummeted since the state restricted the sale of cold medicines last year -- produce only a small fraction of that amount in a week.

To get meth to the Midwest, the cartel began using underground distribution networks that had been set up to smuggle Colombian cocaine, Mexican heroin and marijuana across the border, federal investigators say. Los Angeles, San Diego and Phoenix became major distribution hubs for cartel-made meth.

Shipments of the drug usually reach Minnesota from the Southwest via interstate highways, in cars or trucks with secret storage compartments that cartel couriers constantly change to try to stay one step ahead of state troopers who are getting intensive new training on their smuggling tactics.

Kelly, who spent time working for the DEA in the Southwest, said it has been nearly impossible to stop smuggling along the border there.

"They send five cars through at one time, and if one gets caught it doesn't matter because the rest got through, and they're on the way north," he said.

In May, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced a partnership with Mexico to fight meth trafficking. The DEA and Mexico plan to form special investigative teams along the border and compile a most-wanted list of meth traffickers.

Dunne said federal prosecutions of meth cases in Minnesota are soaring. In the past five years, those cases have more than doubled -- from 43 to 104.

But, he said, "We are only catching the tip of the iceberg of the methamphetamine that is coming into Minnesota from Mexico."

Catching Zatarain took three years.

In 2002, the DEA's task force in Minneapolis heard of a heroin dealer in Minneapolis whose name had been mentioned on a federal wiretap in Denver. The dealer was called "Beto," and he was being supplied in part from Denver by Flores, the guy nicknamed El Grande, who was also later convicted on drug charges.

But the DEA didn't figure out who "Beto" was until the spring of 2004. Through an informant, federal agents learned that Zatarain had gone home to Mexico, but was expected to return soon to the Twin Cities.

"We found that Beto was taking his turn in the rotation," a former task force member on the investigation said. "They came up in teams and stayed for a few months. Everybody was expected to do their time. If you wanted the good life back in Mexico, you had to come north and take your turn."

Federal investigators say Zatarain was making so much money that even as he was sending his receipts to the cartel he was also wiring cash home to his family -- never under his name -- and was planning to buy a ranch in Mexico.

In the fall of 2004, after reviewing the DEA's emerging investigation into drug cartels, U.S. District Judge James Rosenbaum authorized the agency's request to use wiretaps in the hope of penetrating Zatarain's organization. The DEA task force soon realized it was not just pursuing a heroin case. It was on to what would become one of its most far-reaching meth probes.

By eavesdropping on Zatarain's calls, federal agents began learning his codes. When he talked about women, he was really talking about drugs. When he spoke of his "black girl," that meant he was moving black-tar heroin. Talk of "white girls" meant meth. References to the hassle of a broken window was another way of talking about "glass," slang for meth.

Heeding tips from traffickers who had come to the Twin Cities before him, Zatarain changed his cell phone every month and switched used cars about as often. He seldom moved drugs at night, reasoning that there were more police on the streets.

Once, when Zatarain's runners sensed they were being tailed -- and they were -- they simply drove off the freeway, got a hotel room along the Bloomington strip, and holed up for a few days.

On wiretapped phone lines, federal investigators say, Zatarain bragged about the vehicles he used for trafficking. They were outfitted with secret compartments that he said could get anything across the border unnoticed.

But he worried, too. Fearing detection from drug-detecting dogs that police often use on roadside stops of suspicious vehicles, Zatarain and his collaborators went so far as to put anti-freeze inside the plastic bolt that holds spare tires in the trunks of cars -- because they knew the odor throws off a dog's scent.

After spending thousands of hours listening to wiretapped conversations and conducting surveillance all the way from Lake Street in Minneapolis to the Red River Valley, the DEA was eager to learn whether Zatarain could, on short notice, deliver a large quantity of meth.

In January 2005, a Hennepin County Sheriff's deputy, working undercover, rang Zatarain's cell phone and placed an order. It was a call the DEA hoped would lead them to Mexico -- and his drug bosses.

According to court documents, Zatarain took the undercover officer's call and promised to deliver in two hours.

Then Zatarain called one of his meth couriers in Brooklyn Park. DEA surveillance teams tailed the courier to Zatarain's new apartment at 630 Quincy Avenue in northeast Minneapolis. There, other agents watched the apartment.

Close to noon, Zatarain left and drove to sell a half-pound of meth, as promised, to the undercover officer. He delivered it inside a jar of instant coffee, but he was not immediately arrested.

DEA agents soon learned Zatarain could deal almost 20 pounds of meth a month. But they heard nothing about his bosses.

By that time, as his business was peaking, Zatarain had begun breaking most of his own rules -- and his operation began to fall apart. He started working deals at night. Instead of buying a new cell every month, he would wait two.

"It became self-defeating," one investigator on the case said. "While he bought a new cell to avoid detection, he gave his old phones to his associates rather than rotating everybody's phones."

Agents simply listened in on the old phones to get Zatarain's new number.

Once, thinking he was on a secure line, he told someone not to call him Beto. Instead, he said, call him "Johnny." Agents wrote down his new street name.

T hree days after buying a half-pound of crystal meth from Zatarain, federal agents broke down his apartment door. It was dawn, and he and two other men were there sleeping. They acted bewildered, as if the agents had targeted the wrong men.

"They had their game faces on," one of the agents on the task force said. "They weren't going to concede anything."

Agents wanted Zatarain to identify his bosses in Mexico. They offered the standard deal -- less prison time if he gave them names.

They met with Zatarain three times as he sat with his federal public defender, Kevin O'Brien. Finally, Zatarain gave information to the DEA and the U.S. Attorney's office in Minneapolis about cartel operatives in Denver and Indianapolis, O'Brien said. Zatarain provided names, methods of operation, routes, and information about how the cartel recruited distributors.

And there his disclosures stopped. He would not identify the bosses who directed the operations. To do so would mean his family could be killed in retribution, Zatarain told DEA agents.

"My argument was that he was being manipulated by much bigger forces back in Mexico," O'Brien said. "He was very engaging, very bright, good-looking. He'd be successful in any business. He was a drug dealer for a reason: he was very organized, kept track of customers and he delivered. But he was just one of these kids who is used as cannon fodder."

Federal investigators say Zatarain was an example of what they call a "cell-head" -- someone who has a family relationship within the cartel's organization back in Mexico. That way, they say, the cartel has more control over keeping its far-flung operatives from cooperating with authorities.

"You could tell he wanted to talk," an investigator said, "but the last line of defense the cartel in Mexico has over them is that if you do talk, some of your family is going to end up dead. And he still has family back there in Mexico."

Zatarain, protecting his widowed mother and siblings in Tepic, stayed silent and pleaded guilty to drug-conspiracy charges.

While in jail waiting to be sent to prison for 15 years, Zatarain talked on the phone to his brother, Julio. In recorded conversations, they spoke about trying to sell encyclopedias and other books.

But it became clear to federal agents that they were trying to sell more meth. A second investigation began.

In January, a year after his arrest, Zatarain was indicted along with Julio and two others for allegedly trying to sell 500 grams of meth. He pleaded guilty last month and is scheduled to be sentenced in August. Under federal law, he could serve as many as 10 more years.

Federal agents say shutting down Zatarain's operation was a big victory. But they also know the cartel for which he worked is still in business in Minnesota.

"In the DEA, we always ask ourselves if we dismantled or if we only disrupted an organization," an agent who worked on the Zatarain case said. "Did we dismantle this operation? No."

State Troopers Trained To Stop Different Kind Of Speed (AP)

AP, July 9, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS - A large contingent of Minnesota state troopers are leading the state's battle to stop the flow of methamphetamine into the state from the popular vacation state of Sinaloa in western Mexico.

Capt. David Graham, head of the State Patrol's investigative unit, says smugglers working for Mexican drug cartels are delivering millions of dollars worth of meth to Minnesota.

Drug Enforcement Administration and state authorities estimate that more than 100 pounds of meth produced and packaged by Mexican cartels arrives in Minnesota every month.

In the past six months, troopers have seized 25 pounds of meth - an illegal drug many users call "speed" - hidden in three vehicles.

"I shudder to think what we're missing," Graham said.

Trooper Jeff Sharpe and his colleagues recently went through a federally funded course dubbed Desert Snow, learning how to identify suspicious vehicles, conduct detailed roadside interviews, and detect signs that a vehicle has been altered with hidden storage compartments.

They learned that meth smugglers prefer nondescript compact cars that blend into highway traffic that's filled with giant semis and SUVs.

Now, Sharpe watches out for that kind of blandness.

In February, he stopped a tan Ford Contour after the driver cut off a semitrailer truck while changing lanes. According to police reports, the driver let Sharpe search the car and he noticed the molding above the glove compartment and dashboard appeared to have been cut from the trim.

He called for a patrol dog and the dog locked its nose on the dash area, where Sharpe found a hidden compartment containing about 10 pounds of packaged meth, with a street value of more than $1 million, police reports showed.

It was the largest single seizure of Mexican meth by authorities in Minnesota.

A trial date for the driver, Merced Guadalupe Bejar-Orta, is pending. His attorney is arguing that the search was illegal.

Nearly 90 of Minnesota's 425 troopers have gone through the program since last fall, along with 12 local officers who work for communities bordering the state's interstates.

They face a big job.

DOJ_NMG_0039008

Federal authorities say Mexican cartels now control at least 80 percent of the meth sold in Minnesota and are filling the void created as small dealers are forced out of business by the new state law restricting the sale of cold medicines that contain pseudoephedrine or ephedrine, commonly used to process meth.

Authorities say the cartels have smuggled tons of pseudoephedrine and ephedrine into Mexico from China, India and eastern Europe to feed their super labs.

A DEA task force fighting the meth trade in Minnesota seized nearly 110 pounds of the drug last year. This year, the task force has already seized 88 pounds, officials told the Star Tribune.

Tom Kelly, head of the DEA's office in Minneapolis, said the reach of one large Sinaloa cartel, which is based in the city of Tepic, is huge.

"You can't stop it at the border of Minnesota," Kelly said. "It's a constant uphill battle."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Andrew Dunne, head of the Minnesota office's narcotics section, said meth is the number one drug threat facing federal drug prosecutors and agents in the Midwest.

In the past five years, federal prosecutions of meth cases in Minnesota have more than doubled, from 43 to 104, Dunne said.

But that's only a small percentage compared to the meth that comes in undetected, he said.

"We are only catching the tip of the iceberg of the methamphetamine that is coming into Minnesota from Mexico," Dunne said.

Mississippi Prison Meth Ring Busted (AP)

AP, July 8, 2006

MAGEE - Federal prosecutors say five men, identified as members of the Aryan Brotherhood, have been charged with operating a methamphetamine ring that was directed from a Simpson County community work center in Magee.

The investigation started in 2004 when correctional officers heard through telephone monitoring and confidential informants about the ring, Mississippi Department of Corrections Commissioner Chris Epps said Thursday.

The scheme lasted about a year, authorities said.

Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent in Charge Stephen Luzinski said several imprisoned members of the white-supremacist gang allegedly enlisted the assistance of former inmates and criminal co-conspirators outside of the prison to produce and distribute the drug.

Those arrested were Grady Brown, 36, incarcerated at the Central Mississippi Correctional facility in Pearl; Melanie Minton, 27, of Rankin County; Donald Harris, 28, of Meridian; Eric Pendergrass, 24, of Pearl; and Jessica Wade, 22, of Rankin County.

The U.S. Attorney's Office said they face federal charges of conspiracy to manufacture and distribute meth and possession with intent to manufacture meth.

Brown would arrange for hypophosphorous acid, which can be used to make meth, to be delivered to the work center, where Brown and Harris were assigned, officials said.

Local Officials Ask For Federal Help In Fight Against Meth (DRH)

By Pamela Dickman

DOJ_NMG_0039009

Daily Reporter Herald, July 8, 2006

Every day, area prosecutors and law enforcement officers battle a "perfect storm" ravaging the community environmentally, socially, emotionally and criminally.

On Friday, a panel of local officials asked the federal government for help combating methamphetamine. One suggestion: Close the borders, cut off the source.

The highly addictive drug is taking over communities, tearing apart families, monopolizing law enforcement efforts, contributing to violent and property crimes and affecting employers, the said.

People involved in the battle — three district attorneys from Northern Colorado, a sheriff, a local drug task force commander, a county commissioner and the wife of a user who started support groups — acknowledged at a U.S. congressional hearing in Loveland on Friday that the problem and solution are complex.

Communities need treatment, prevention, intervention and more money to battle the drug, they said.

But communities also need help cutting off the source.

In Colorado, the largest source is Mexico, said Lt. Craig Dodd, commander of the Larimer County Drug Task Force, Denver Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Jeffrey Sweetin and 13th Judicial District Attorney Bob Watson.

About 80 percent of the drug consumed in the state comes from Mexico, traveling up Interstate 25 then east and west on interstates 70 and 76. The statistic is based on a drop in small clandestine labs as well as information gleaned in specific investigations, the officials said.

Five witnesses — officers and prosecutors — all suggested that tighter border security is a necessary weapon in the battle.

However, Indiana Congressman Mark Souder — a Republican who attended the hearing with Colorado Congresswoman Marilyn Musgrave and who described the drug and its ripple effect as "a perfect storm" — questioned that assertion.

After visiting a southern Border Patrol post and seeing confiscated heroin and marijuana, he said he isn't sure.

"They're not getting any meth at the border," Souder said. "Why not?"

Is it, instead, coming from Canada? he asked. Are illegal immigrants carrying it to the United States as passage fare?

All local investigation, said Dodd, Sweetin and Weld County Sheriff John Cooke, points to it coming north from Mexico into Larimer and Weld counties. They could not say how it is getting past patrols, just that it is, and federal help is needed.

"We have to have border enforcement with all the drugs coming into our country," Musgrave agreed.

"I daresay we have to focus on our northern borders as well."

By the Numbers

Larimer County

· 85 percent of adult drug court offenders listed methamphetamine as their drug of choice in 2004.

· 28 percent of juvenile drug court offenders listed meth as their drug of choice in 2005.

· 0 — the number of juveniles who listed meth five years earlier.

· 52 children were placed out of their homes because of their parents' meth use in the first nine months of 2005.

· 256 meth-related child protection investigations occurred in the same period.

· 12.9 pounds of methamphetamine were seized by drug officers in 2005— almost double the amount in the two prior years.

Weld County

· 4 of the past five murders were meth-related.

· 50 percent of property crimes are linked to meth.

· 90 percent of forgeries are linked to meth.

· 183 children have mothers who, as inmates, participated in a Weld County Jail survey about meth.

Mesa County

· $3 million was saved by the building of a drug treatment facility instead of a new jail.

· $500,000 — the amount that will be saved each year in operations costs for the treatment facility as opposed to a jail.

Federal Funds Save Drug Task Force (JA)

Journal Advocate, July 8, 2006

LOVELAND - The heart of war on illegal drugs in the eastern Colorado plains was in danger because of to lack of funding. That all ended Friday with an announcement late in a congressional hearing held here.

Late in the Congressional Field Hearing on Meth Abuse in Northern Colorado, Rep. Marilyn Musgrave, R-Colo., said she has secured a direct appropriation funding for the Eastern Colorado Plains Drug Task Force for 2007.

The Amount, Musgrave said could be as much as $250,000 - similar to the amount awarded to local law enforcement from Weld and Larimer counties last year.

"We have a responsibility to our communities to work toward a solution to this serious problem. The meth epidemic deserves our full attention because of the drug's destructive nature," Musgrave said.

Rep. Mark Souder, R-Ind., chairman of the House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, Drug Policy and Human Resources said he has heard moving testimony on how methamphetamine has wreaked havoc on people and their families as he addressed the chambers in the Loveland Municipal Building.

"I have also learned about the many positive ways that communities have fought back, targeting the meth cooks and dealers, trying to get addicts into treatment and working to educate young people about the risk of meth abuse," Souder said.

Thirteenth Judicial District Attorney Bob Watson testified on the capabilities and limitations of law enforcement in his district - which is comprised of seven counties.

"We have 24 law enforcement agencies in the 13th judicial district. Some of those agencies are small and some do not have a 24-hour duty," Watson told the subcommittee.

Watson placed an emphasis on the district's drug task force and their accomplishments in the fight against drugs.

"We have put a lot of people behind bars and if we keep cutting the funding, the task force will cease to exist. It's a surrender on the war on drugs," Watson said.

Watson told the committee that his district has seen a decrease on local "mom and pop" meth labs because of the effort and cooperation from the seven counties through the drug task force.

"We have to stop this epidemic and people need to come together," Watson said, adding that one of the goals is to be ready for the next drug craze.

"This is a fine showing that federal, state and local governments came together to fight a problem," ECPDTF Commander Jeff Annis said shortly after the announcement.

"I personally thank Bob Watson for testifying in front of the committee in an effort to secure the money for us," Annis added.

"A great deal of credit goes to Watson, Musgrave and her staff who all went out to bat for us to get us funding," Logan County Sheriff's Office Lt. Walt Page said. "Without the funding, I foresaw the task force gone, which is a terrible shame."

Drug Enforcement Administration Denver Field Division Special Agent in Charge Jeffrey Sweetin testified that 80 percent of the methamphetamine used in the U.S. comes from larger labs - the agency calls super labs - which are increasingly found in Mexico.

"Most methamphetamine is produced by Mexico-based and California-based drug trafficking organizations," Sweetin said, citing that the increase of outside meth was mainly due to law enforcement's aggressive attack on small labs, which are found mostly in rural areas.

Congressional witnesses like Larimer County Drug Task Force Commander Craig Todd described to the committee the impact of the drug in his jurisdiction with increases in violent crime, property crime and identity theft.

"Meth is the primary drug threat to this state and it is readily available in most population centers. Most methamphetamine available in Colorado is produced by Mexican cartels and criminal groups in California and Arizona," 8th Judicial District Attorney Larry Abrahamsom said.

From a non-law enforcement side, the committee heard testimony from Donita Davenport who described how her life was touched dealing with her husband's addiction and his journey to rehabilitation.

Davenport said that her husband's addiction cost them two homes as well as their hard-earned money.

She asked the committee to focus on education the public on the effects of the drug to families and communities.

With the support of each jurisdiction, the ECPDTF are able to cross jurisdictional lines in pursuit of the fight against methamphetamine and other illegal drugs.

"This funding is extremely helpful to us. I have worked with Rep. Musgrave regarding the funding from the time I went to meet with her last February in Washington DC. She has tremendously supported law enforcement," Watson said.

Plans for a regional treatment facility were also laid out which Watson said would happen in the near future.

A board of directors is already in place and is awaiting Gov. Bill Owens appointment for Watson to be the district attorney to represent the facility.

"It's cheaper in the long run to send people to treatment in comparison to incarceration," Watson said.

Cranberry Couple Enters Guilty Plea In Meth Case (PPG)

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, July 8, 2006

A husband and wife from Cranberry pleaded guilty in federal court yesterday to conspiring to make methamphetamine.

Brian and Christy McKenzie were charged after agents with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration rummaged through their trash at the Forest Park Trailer Court where they lived in July 2005.

According to Assistant U.S. Attorney Gregory J. Nescott, the agents got a tip that the McKenzies were making methamphetamine in their Laurel Drive home.

A search warrant revealed other chemicals used in the manufacturing process and an Internet printout that gave directions, Mr. Nescott said.

Mr. McKenzie, 38, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to make less than 5 grams of methamphetamine and one count of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. Mrs. McKenzie, 30, also pleaded guilty to conspiracy and to one count of possession of acetone, a chemical used to make the drug.

Sentencing is set for Nov. 17.

Man gets prison in attack on witness

A case of retaliation against a witness has ended with a New Brighton, Beaver County, man being sentenced to more than eight years in prison.

Virgil Wolfe, 25, of Circle Street, was found guilty April 12 of attacking a Beaver County man who provided information in a federal narcotics investigation, the U.S. Attorney's office in Pittsburgh said.

The federal Drug Enforcement Administration and state, Beaver County and New Brighton police investigated the case, in which another man, John Wolfe, was also convicted. Virgil Wolfe faces three years of supervised release following his 100-month prison term, according to U.S. District Court Judge Alan N. Bloch's sentence.

Defendant To Go Before Federal Judge (REP)

Reporter, July 8, 2006

Described as a regional drug kingpin by the Drug Enforcement Administration, a Fairfield man will return to federal court in Sacramento on July 18.

Defendant Eduardo Nunez Pichardo of Fairfield - also known as Eddie Nunez - is scheduled to appear for a status conference at 9:30 a.m. July 18 in the courtroom of federal magistrate Lawrence K. Karlton.

Pichardo, 32, was arrested by DEA agents - assisted by Fairfield and Vacaville police - June 21 on suspicion of distribution and conspiracy to distribute cocaine and methamphetamine. According to the DEA, the arrest culminated a seven-year investigation into drug trafficking that stretched from Northern California to Arizona and Alabama.

Pichardo tentatively had been approved for release June 29 on $1 million bond secured by real property. The order, however, later was taken under submission by the court and Pichardo remains in federal custody pending the bond.

Ex-prosecutor Faces New Ethics Probe (TC)

By A.J. FLICK

Tucson Citizen, July 7, 2006

A former Pima County prosecutor is accused of lying to federal agents and violating terms of a plea agreement involving her ex-fiance, a former eye surgeon recently convicted of ordering the death of a colleague.

The accusations are made in an amended complaint filed last week by the State Bar of Arizona against Lourdes Lopez. The complaint is the basis for possible disciplinary action, up to disbarment.

According to the complaint, Lopez committed ethical violations by lying to federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents in October 2001 about illegal prescriptions she obtained for Dr. Bradley Alan Schwartz and continuing to have contact with him despite a court order.

Lopez, who is now in private practice, resigned from the Pima County Attorney's Office shortly before she was indicted for the drug allegations in 2002.

A federal charge against Lopez was dismissed with prejudice, meaning it can never be refiled, after her attorney, Rafael Gallego, told the court she had complied with all terms of her plea agreement, the complaint says.

The allegations of lying will not result in any new federal charges against Lopez, said Ann Harwood, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Phoenix.

Schwartz also entered into a plea deal that would have wiped away his federal charge in December 2004. His October 2004 arrest and his conviction in May for the murder of Dr. Brian Stidham violate terms of the plea, Harwood said, but prosecutors will not pursue the matter because Schwartz was sentenced to life in prison for conspiracy to commit murder.

Lopez's Bar complaint will be forwarded to an internal panelist to decide whether she committed the violations and whether sanctions, which range from censure to disbarment, are warranted.

Lopez did not return a call seeking comment. Gallego said he would consult with Lopez before commenting.

Leaders Of Marijuana-friendly Church Face Charges (AP)

S. Arizona Couple Face Prison For What They Say Is Religious Use Of Marijuana (ADS)

Arizona Daily Star, July 9, 2006

PIMA — The Church of Cognizance, which has quietly operated here since 1991, has an unusual tenet — its worshippers deify and use marijuana as part of their faith.

Until federal authorities charged them with possessing 172 pounds of their leafy green sacrament earlier this year, church founders Dan and Mary Quaintance say they smoked, ate or drank marijuana daily as a way of becoming more spiritually enlightened.

But now, with added conspiracy charges, the Quaintances face up to 40 years each in prison in a case they call religious persecution.

Federal prosecutors say religious freedom does not exempt the use of illegal drugs. The Quaintances say it does. They also say a recent U.S. Supreme Court decision allowing a religious group's use of a hallucinogenic tea containing a federally banned substance should nullify the charges against them.

The couple is scheduled to go on trial in Las Cruces, N.M., on July 18, though defense lawyers are asking for a delay.

"They have a bona fide religion and the only marijuana they utilize is for the practice of their religion," said Mary Quaintance's attorney, Mario A. Esparza. "Our Constitution in the United States guarantees that freedom of religion, and the Quaintances are being punished for the very thing the Constitu- tion stands for.

"They did not distribute to anyone outside of the church and they never profited from it," Esparza said.

The Church of Cognizance, which leaders say has 72 monasteries located in members' homes nationwide, has a simple motto: "With good thoughts, good words and good deeds, we honor marijuana; as the teacher, the provider, the protector."

Dan Quaintance, 54, says the church has 40 to 50 members in Arizona, but cannot estimate how many there are nationwide. Leaders say members must be 18 to join, and he says the average age of worshippers in Arizona is 35. Dan, who preaches at weddings and funerals of church members, says the church does not sell its sacrament or proselytize.

"Laws exist to protect people from injury and we've injured nobody," said Dan Quaintance, an Iowa native, Vietnam veteran and retired welder who identifies himself as his church's "chief cognoscente."

"Marijuana is the averter of death," he said. "The energy and spirit that is in marijuana is God. You consume the plant and you consume God. You are sacrificing your body to the deity."

The Quaintances were arrested Feb. 22 in Lordsburg, N.M., just seven days before the U.S. Supreme Court ruled unanimously that a small religious group based in Santa Fe that combines Christianity and American Indian practices could use hallucinogenic tea in its ceremonies. The tea, called hoasca, contains dimethyltryptamine, or DMT, known for its hallucinogenic properties.

A variety of religious groups representing millions of members filed briefs supporting O Centro Espirita Beneficiente Uniao Do Vegetal, or UDV, and its use of hoasca — among them the Arizona Civil Liberties Union, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, the National Association of Evangelicals and the Union for Reform Judaism. Some supporters likened banning the tea to a federal ban on sacramental wine.

Graham County Sheriff Frank Hughes says that in his 10 years on the job, he's never had a complaint about the Quaintances, who live in a small rectangular home in the sparsely populated rural community of Pima, about 90 miles northeast of Tucson.

Their home sits on a four-acre property that's dotted with old vehicles. Alongside their house is a wall made out of tires, which the Quaintances say eventually will form the boundary of an outdoor chapel.

The couple's 31-year-old daughter, Zina; her husband, Tim; and their three children have a home on the property, as do the Quaintances' 28-year-old son, Dennis, and his wife, Vanessa, and their son.

Their home bears no resemblance to a traditional church, inside or out. Yet the Quaintances call it a monastery and are adamant that the church they founded together is a sincere, legitimate faith — on par with any mainstream religious denomination.

A tapestry of Bob Marley smoking a large joint decorates the front hallway, and inside, the couple has a few handmade pipes, some of which have won ribbons in the glazing division of the Graham County Fair. Most of their pipes and other sacramental accessories were seized when authorities searched their home March 3, they say.

The Quaintances do not grow their sacrament but, rather, say they rely on donations of it, which they pick up from church "couriers." That's what they say they were about to do when they were arrested.

They smoke the marijuana or sometimes blend it into a milk-like drink, saying it helps them to become more enlightened and in tune with the universe. Until they were arrested, the Quaintances say they'd smoked or ingested the plant every day of their 33-year marriage, even before they formed their church. Both were marijuana users when they met, and they credit the plant to helping their marriage survive.

"It makes you better at what you do, enhances who you are. It is the most beautiful plant on Earth," said Mary Quaintance, 51, a homemaker from Northern California who married Dan in 1973, when she was 18. They met while Mary worked as nurse's aide in Chico, Calif., and rented a room from Dan's parents.

Dan Quaintance, who grew up in the United Methodist faith and once was president of his church youth group, says finding marijuana helped him finish high school, later kick a heroin addiction and get through acute pancreatitis.

It was during his illness that he began researching marijuana's use among ancient cultures, and he started to think about forming his own church. As he reread the Bible, he believed many passages that referred to a leaf, tree or plant were talking about marijuana.

"Religion is basically putting your faith in what you rely on," he said. "Jesus started his church because of what he believed and learned."

He filed a "declaration of religious sentiment" on behalf of the Church of Cognizance with the Graham County Recorder's Office in 1994, though Dan, his family and other members say the church dates to 1991.

Services at the Church of Cognizance aren't scheduled. According to the Quaintances, members call the monasteries and arrange a worship time, which typically includes using marijuana and listening to sermons by fellow cognoscenti that talk about peaceful existence.

"Dan and Mary are two of the most beautiful, wholesome people," said Daniel Jeffrey, an enlightened cognoscente in Puna, Hawaii. "We're not involved with herb for any kind of profit gain. If you tell people that, their mind just can't grasp it."

Still, Charles Haynes, a senior scholar at the Virginia-based First Amendment Center, says any group seeking an exemption to the nation's drug laws, even for religious purposes, has a "hill to climb."

And he says the federal government is likely in a better position to win against the religious use of marijuana than it was for the hallucinogenic tea case, given the prevalence of marijuana and the federal government's concern about a drug problem in the country.

The hallucinogenic tea is difficult to find and reportedly doesn't taste very good, Haynes said, noting the same is true for peyote, which also is a federally banned substance.

A federal exemption for peyote exists when it's used for religious practices by members of the Native American Church. In Arizona, people using peyote who aren't members of the Native American Church also are exempt as long as the peyote is used for a "bona fide religious purpose" in a manner that doesn't threaten the public. But there are no such exceptions for marijuana.

"Marijuana is difficult, even if they have a sincere religious belief," Haynes said. "The federal government has already successfully fought efforts to get a medical exemption."

The U.S. Constitution contains no legally recognizable definition of religion, but courts still can apply a test of sincerity, said Jeremy Gunn, director of the Freedom of Religion and Belief program for the American Civil Liberties Union, which supported the UDV church.

If, for example, a group of prisoners calling themselves the Church of Cabernet and Filet Mignon argued religious belief as a reason to be served wine and better food, the government would have a right to question the sincerity of their theological belief, he said.

"The UDV case did not open the floodgate," he said. "The government needs to show why it makes sense to apply the drug laws in that circumstance. In the UDV case, the hallucinogenic tea is honestly a traditional part of the religious practice."

The office of the U.S. attorney for New Mexico, David C. Iglesias, prosecuted the UDV case, and also is prosecuting the Quaintances. His office declined to comment on a pending case.

The Quaintances have no history of criminal convictions in Arizona, where they've lived since 1986, but both have prior convictions for marijuana possession in Washington state, records show. Dan Quaintance says he also has a 1974 conviction from California for driving under the influence and spent 30 days in jail for that offense.

The Quaintances spent two weeks in a New Mexico jail after their arrest this year and, as part of their court-ordered release, must have regular urine tests to ensure they aren't using any marijuana. Both say that living without their deity for the first time in more than three decades is extremely difficult.

The complaint against the couple, which was amended, includes two other defendants — Timothy Jason Kripner, 23, of Tucson and Joseph Allen Butts, 48, of California.

The revised complaint raised the stakes in the case, adding conspiracy charges and more than 220 pounds of marijuana. Dan Quaintance says Kripner and Butts are both certified couriers for the church. Kripner was traveling with the Quaintances when they were arrested, and authorities say Butts was involved in a conspiracy with them to distribute marijuana.

"They may take Dan and Mary down but they will never take the church down," Mary Quaintance said.

IMMIGRATION:

States Try To Block Illegal Workers (USAT)

By Charisse Jones

USA Today, July 10, 2006

At least 30 states have passed laws or taken other steps this year to crack down on illegal immigrants, often making it harder for undocumented workers to find jobs or receive public services.

Acting while Congress struggles to set policy regarding the nation's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants, states have enacted at least 57 laws, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures and a USA TODAY analysis. Among major themes of the state legislation: fining businesses that hire undocumented workers and denying such companies public contracts if they don't verify the legal status of employees.

“The trends … have leaned toward the punitive side,” says Ann Morse, an immigration expert at the National Conference of State Legislatures. “The No. 1 topic has been employment in terms of deterring employers and employees.”

Examples:

·A Colorado law enacted in June prohibits awarding state contracts to businesses that knowingly employ illegal immigrants.

·A Louisiana law approved in June subjects businesses that have state contracts and more than 10 employees to fines if they don't fire workers known to be undocumented.

·A Georgia bill enacted in April has a phased-in requirement that public employers and government contractors and subcontractors verify information on newly hired workers through a federal program.

The U.S. Senate and House have passed widely divergent immigration bills. The Senate's legislation would put most undocumented immigrants on a path to citizenship. The House bill would make illegal immigrants felons and increase penalties for hiring them.

Some lawmakers and advocates of stricter immigration enforcement say the flurry of legislation reflects states' mounting frustration with federal officials.

“State and local politicians and the grass-roots in those states are up in arms over Washington's conspicuous lack of leadership,” says John Keeley, spokesman for the Center for Immigration Studies, which favors tighter controls on immigration. “Immigration … is a driving factor for the three biggest budget items states face: education, health care and criminal justice.”

Under federal law, states must provide some services to illegal immigrants, including public education and emergency medical care. States do not have to provide commercial licenses, food assistance, health care, unemployment benefits or other services.

DOJ_NMG_0039015

States' focus on workers' documentation is unfair, says Brent Wilkes, national executive director of the League of United Latin American Citizens, a civil rights group. “It feels like we're back to the days when it's OK to discriminate against minorities,” he says.

A Florida Mayor Turns To An Immigration Curb To Fix A Fading City (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

AVON PARK, Fla., July 6 — Tom Macklin, the mayor of this faded city deep in Florida's citrus belt, heard the idea on talk radio and latched on with relish.

A city up north, Hazleton, Pa., planned to root out and punish landlords who rented to illegal immigrants, fining them $1,000 for every such tenant. Mr. Macklin, whose own small city has swelled with immigrants from Mexico, Haiti and Jamaica over the past decade, swiftly proposed the same for Avon Park.

"It was almost as if I was sitting in church at a revival and he was preaching to me," Mr. Macklin said of Mayor Lou Barletta of Hazleton, whom he heard promoting that city's Illegal Immigration Relief Act on the radio show last month. "If we address the housing issue — make it as difficult as possible for illegals to find safe haven in Avon Park — then they are going to have to find someplace else to go."

Like Hazleton's proposal, Avon Park's would deny business permits to companies that knowingly hired illegal immigrants. The ordinance, which states that illegal immigration "destroys our neighborhoods and diminishes our overall quality of life," would also make English the official language of Avon Park, removing Spanish from all city documents, signs and automated phone messages.

The proposal has some of Avon Park's roughly 8,800 residents exalting, others fuming and still others — including those who rent rooms or apartments in the scruffy Golden Age Villas, west of the abandoned train tracks — plain scared. The City Council passed it 3 to 2 on the first reading and is likely to adopt it July 24.

"We just wouldn't be able to stay here," said Armando Garcia Cortes, 45, who said he came to Avon Park, about 80 miles southeast of Orlando, from Veracruz, Mexico, to pick oranges and fix roofs. "They're going to see the farmworker population here drop. We would all be leaving."

John Koch, who sells glassware and model cars at the Broken Spoke Flea Market on Main Street, said that would be fine.

"I think it's long overdue," Mr. Koch said of the proposal. "If you don't put a cap on it, it just gets out of hand."

Both Mr. Macklin and Mr. Barletta said they were forced into drastic measures by the federal government's failure to crack down on illegal immigration. Both said that tightening the nation's borders would be the best solution, but that with Congress still divided on immigration policy, they had to take action.

"When you have people begging you to do something, there comes a breaking point," said Mr. Barletta, whose family settled in Hazleton when it was a thriving coal center in the early 1900's. "I feel very confident that what we're doing is not only legal, but the right thing to do. I can't sit back and watch my city being destroyed."

Both mayors, white baby boomers who grew up in the 1960's and 70's, speak wistfully of the days when nuclear families were the only occupants of single-family homes in their towns, every resident paid taxes and English was the only language heard on the streets. Mr. Macklin said the City of Charm, as Avon Park has long called itself, no longer met that description, despite the gazebo and shuffleboard courts on Main Street, several dainty lakes and ubiquitous live oaks.

"When people come to our area," he said, "they see degrading neighborhoods, homes falling down among themselves, four or five vehicles parked in yards. There's a perception for those that come to this area — looking to perhaps expand a business, move here — that it might not necessarily be where they want to be."

Mr. Macklin, a Republican whose City Council is nonpartisan, said he had been bombarded with positive feedback since proposing the ordinance in late June, even getting e-mail messages from California and Illinois. But some residents have called him racist, and others, like Joe Wright, a dairy farmer who said two-thirds of his work force was Hispanic, said the ordinance would be unenforceable and unconstitutional.

"It's going to be impossible to police," said Mr. Wright, whose dairy, outside the city, has many employees who live in Avon Park. "Are they actually going to have their zoning people and policemen racially profile every Hispanic-looking person? I mean, this just has a very chilling effect."

Mr. Macklin said he expected opposition from citrus growers and cattle farmers, many of whom say that they hire only workers with Social Security cards, but that they cannot be sure the cards are authentic. The law would punish only those who knowingly hired or rented to illegal immigrants, he said.

But Mary Bauer, director of the Immigrant Justice Project at the Southern Poverty Law Center, said the proposal violated several laws, including the Fair Housing Act and Title VI of the Civil Rights Act.

"The real problem is that it's obvious the effect of this will be to discriminate against immigrants and Latinos generally," Ms. Bauer said, adding that the center might sue if the ordinance passed. "Any thinking landlord reading this would likely decide that renting to immigrants or Latinos is a risky proposition."

Cesar A. Perales, president of the Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund, said he had sent two lawyers to meet with Hispanic groups in Hazleton recently and might sue to stop its ordinance.

"The Latino community is just about as angry as any I've ever seen," Mr. Perales said. "They've come to Hazleton to be part of that community, and they certainly improved the economic conditions of what by most accounts was a dying town, and helped revitalize it. And they now feel they are being blamed for every ill in the city."

Mr. Barletta said his proposal, up for a final vote July 13, was modeled on a similar one in San Bernardino, Calif., which stalled because its proponents failed to gather enough signatures to get it on the ballot. He wrote it, he said, after illegal immigrants committed several rattling crimes in Hazleton, a city of 31,000, this year.

Both proposals have led to false rumors that have fanned fears in recent weeks. At the Golden Age Villas in Avon Park, Ashley Neff, 20, whose boyfriend is an illegal immigrant from Mexico, said she had heard that speaking Spanish would not be allowed in shops and restaurants.

"They're saying they're not even going to let people in grocery stores," Ms. Neff said. "How is that fair? Even a lot of the people who are legal citizens prefer to speak Spanish because it comes easier to them."

Down the street, Patrick Graham, a Jamaican immigrant who said he was here legally, said it was foolish to force out illegal immigrants because nobody else would work in the fields and groves.

"I sure ain't going out there to pick any oranges," said Mr. Graham, who owns a window-cleaning business. "All the hard work, the Mexicans are doing it."

Melva Santana, a shopkeeper who was among a crowd of whites, blacks and Hispanics eating at Taqueria Merlo on Thursday, said she feared the ordinance would encourage people who had kept their prejudices quiet to begin harassing immigrants.

This week, Ms. Santana said, a sales clerk refused to sell her sister beer because she had a Puerto Rico driver's license, and the clerk said, "I can't read it."

At the flamingo-pink Avon Motel, which has operated here for 52 years, Dale Graham, the manager, said he suspected that the proposal had come about because illegal immigrants were not only picking citrus these days but also getting construction and other higher-paying jobs.

"I think they're just a scapegoat," Mr. Graham said. "What it comes down to is the city is resistant to any kind of change or growth."

Outside the motel, a sign read: American Family Owned. Drive Safely.

Mexican Illegals Sent To Hometowns (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

The U.S. and Mexican governments have resumed a repatriation program to return Mexican nationals caught illegally in the United States to their hometowns in Mexico's interior, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) officials said.

ICE spokeswoman Kadia Koroma said the Interior Repatriation Program, which resumed with the departure of a flight Friday from Tucson International Airport with 67 Mexicans who volunteered to be repatriated, will "ensure the safe, effective and humanitarian return of Mexican nationals illegally in the United States."

A 2004 memorandum of understanding between the Department of Homeland Security and the Mexican government established the framework for the two nations to work cooperatively in repatriating Mexican nationals who volunteer to be returned home.

The program returns detained illegal aliens to Mexico's interior rather than to towns along the U.S.-Mexico border as part of an effort to both control the Southwest border and to save the lives of those who might try again to cross the desert areas of the Southwest to regain entry to the United States.

Many detained illegal aliens who are returned to various border communities after their capture often find it easier and more economical to re-enter the United States than return home to Mexico's interior, authorities have said.

Of the 1.15 million illegal aliens apprehended last year by the U.S. Border Patrol, the vast majority were Mexican nationals and more than half of them were detained along the Arizona-Mexico border -- particularly a 260-mile section of Arizona's southeast known as the Tucson sector.

For the past two summers, Ms. Koroma said, U.S. and Mexican officials have developed and jointly administered the repatriation program to return nearly 35,000 Mexican nationals to the interior of Mexico. The program initially was funded and managed by U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP).

Under the program, which is scheduled to continue until Sept. 30, Mexican nationals apprehended in Arizona will be processed at centers in Nogales and Yuma, where they will be interviewed by Mexican and U.S. officials for inclusion in the repatriation program. Ms. Koroma said those who volunteer will then be flown to Mexico City and provided bus transportation to their places of origin.

"By quickly returning aliens to the interior of Mexico rather than to the Mexican border, both nations seek so save lives and discourage additional illegal border crossings through hostile, desert terrain," she said.

Former CBP Commissioner Robert C. Bonner, who helped create the program, has called it "a crucial, integral component" of Homeland Security's Arizona Border Control Initiative to gain greater operational control and to save lives in dangerous traffic areas along the border with Mexico.

"Returning illegal aliens to the interior of Mexico allows us to disrupt the inhumane and often callous human-smuggling organizations that operate along the border area," he said when the program first began.

Conservatives And Immigration (WSJ)

No issue more deeply divides American conservatives today than immigration. It's the subject on which we get the most critical mail by far, no doubt reflecting this split on the right. So with Congress holding hearings on the issue around the country, perhaps it's a good moment to step back and explain the roots of our own, longstanding position favoring open immigration.

A position, by the way, on which we hardly stand alone. There is also President Bush, and before him the Gipper. (See our May 16 editorial, "Reagan on Immigration1.") In the context of the current debate, we also print on the opposite page an open letter supporting comprehensive immigration reform from 33 prominent conservatives, including former Secretary of State George Shultz and GOP Vice Presidential nominee Jack Kemp.

The most frequent criticism we hear is that a newspaper called "The Wall Street Journal" simply wants "cheap labor" for business. This is an odd charge coming from conservatives who profess to believe in the free market, since it echoes the AFL-CIO and liberals who'd just as soon have government dictate wages.

Our own view is that a philosophy of "free markets and free people" includes flexible labor markets. At a fundamental level, this is a matter of freedom and human dignity. These migrants are freely contracting for their labor, which is a basic human right. Far from selling their labor "cheap," they are traveling to the U.S. to sell it more dearly and improve their lives. Like millions of Americans before them, they and certainly their children climb the economic ladder as their skills and education increase.

We realize that critics are not inventing the manifold problems that can arise from illegal immigration: Trespassing, violent crime, overcrowded hospital emergency rooms, document counterfeiting, human smuggling, corpses in the Arizona desert, and a sense that the government has lost control of the border. But all of these result, ultimately, from too many immigrants chasing too few U.S. visas.

Those migrating here to make a better life for themselves and their families would much prefer to come legally. Give them more legal ways to enter the country, and we are likely to reduce illegal immigration far more effectively than any physical barrier along the Rio Grande ever could. This is not about rewarding bad behavior. It's about bringing immigration policy in line with economic and human reality. And the reality is that the U.S. has a growing demand for workers, while Mexico has both a large supply of such workers and too few jobs at home.

Some conservatives concede this point in theory but then insist that liberal immigration is no longer possible in a modern welfare state, which breeds dependency in a way that the America of a century ago did not. But the immigrants who arrive here come to work, not sit on the dole. And thanks to welfare reform, the welfare rolls have declined despite a surge in illegal immigration in the past decade.

The real claims that illegals make on public services are education, which can't be withheld because of a 1982 Supreme Court ruling (Plyer v. Doe), and health care, especially emergency rooms. Since denying urgent medical treatment is immoral, the answer again is to legalize cross-border labor flows and remove government obstacles to affordable health insurance. As for education, even illegals pay for public schools through the indirect property taxes they pay in rent. Overall, immigrants contribute far more to our economy than they extract in public benefits.

By far the largest concern we hear on the right concerns culture, especially the worry that the current Hispanic influx is so large it can resist the American genius for assimilation. Hispanics now comprise nearly a third of the population in California and Texas, the country's two biggest states, and cultural assimilation does matter.

This is where the political left does the cause of immigration no good in pursuing a separatist agenda. When such groups as La Raza and the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund push for multiculturalism, bilingual education, foreign language ballots, racial quotas and the like, they undermine support for immigration among even the most open-minded Americans. Most Americans don't want to replicate the Bosnia model; nor are they pining for a U.S. version of the Quebec sovereignty movement. President Bush has been right to assert that immigrants must adopt U.S. norms, and we only wish more figures on the political left would say the same.

But the good news is that these newcomers by and large aren't listening to the left-wingers pushing identity politics. Mexican immigrants, like their European predecessors, are assimilating. Their children learn English and by the end of high school prefer it to their parents' native tongue. They also marry people they meet here. Second-generation Latinos earn less than white Americans but more than blacks and 50% more than first-generation Latinos. According to Tamar Jacoby's "Reinventing the Melting Pot," the most common last names among new homeowners in California include Garcia, Lee, Martinez, Nguyen, Rodriguez and Wong.

Which brings us to the politics. Contrary to what you hear on talk radio and cable news, polls continue to show that the conservative silent majority is pro-immigration, and that it supports a guest-worker program as the only practical and humane way to moderate the foreign labor flow.

According to the most recent Tarrance Group survey, 75% of likely GOP voters support immigration reform that combines increased border and workplace enforcement with a guest-worker system for newcomers and a multiyear path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already here -- provided that they meet certain requirements like living crime free, learning English and paying taxes. "Support for this plan," the poll found, "is strong even among base Republican voter demographics like strong Republicans (77%), very conservative Republicans (72%), white conservative Christians (76%), and those who listen to news talk radio on a daily basis (72%)." * * *

House Republican leaders, who passed an immigration bill last year focusing only on enforcement, want to frame this debate as a choice between more border security or "amnesty" for the 11 or 12 million illegals already here. But that's a false choice. A guest-worker program that lets market forces rather than prevailing political winds determine how many economic migrants can enter the country actually enhances security. How? By reducing pressure on the border, just as the Bracero guest-worker program in the 1950s and early 1960s did.

When border patrol agents don't have to chase down people coming here to work, they can concentrate on genuine threats, like gang members and terrorists. The real choice is between throwing more resources at an enforcement-only policy that has failed, or a larger reform that's had some past success in reducing illegal border crossings and meeting the demands of our economy and of human dignity.

A Conservative Statement For Immigration Reform (WSJ)

At this critical moment in the immigration debate, conservatives need to examine the role we are playing in this great national issue. In many respects, the way we position ourselves on immigration will determine whether we retain the mantle of majority leadership. What side of history do conservatives want to be on? Will we remain a movement that governs -- that offers practical solutions to the problems facing the country?

Conservatives have always prided themselves on acknowledging, in the words of John Adams, that "Facts are stubborn things." Well, immigration -- both the robust annual flow required to keep our economy growing and the 12 million illegal immigrants already in the country -- is a fact of life in the U.S. today. And the only practical way to deal with these stubborn realities is with a comprehensive solution, one that includes border security, interior enforcement, a guest worker program and status for the illegal immigrants already here.

Some counsel that Congress should start with tougher enforcement and border security, but wait to create a guest worker program or address the illegal population. Only that way, it is said, can we avoid the mistakes of the failed 1986 immigration reform.

But in fact, the lesson of 1986 is that only a comprehensive solution will fix our broken immigration system.

The 1986 legislation combined amnesty for three million illegal immigrants with a promise of tougher enforcement, particularly in the workplace. But the law did not recognize the need for future immigration to meet the demands of a growing economy, and the new enforcement never materialized. The result? Twenty years later, illegal immigration is unabated. Why? Because while immigrants continue to be drawn to the jobs created by our economy, they have no legal way to enter the country.

What this history teaches is that the only way to control immigration is with a combination package -- securing the border, enforcing the law in the workplace and creating legal channels for workers to enter the country.

Our past experience with guest worker programs bears this out. Illegal immigration reached a peak in the mid-'50s, and more than a million people were apprehended trying to cross the border in 1954. Then Congress expanded the Bracero work-visa program, creating a way for 300,000 immigrants to enter the U.S. legally each year.

The result? This new legal flow replaced the old illegal influx, and by 1964, INS apprehensions had dropped to fewer than 100,000. As the Congressional Research Service noted in 1980, "Without question, the Bracero program was . . . instrumental in ending the illegal alien problem of the mid-1940s and 1950s." The Bracero program and the 1986 failure point in the same direction: A comprehensive solution is the only real and lasting way to address immigration.

The American people intuitively understand this, which is why, in poll after poll, they choose a comprehensive approach over one that relies on enforcement alone. A recent NBC/Wall Street Journal poll found that Americans prefer a comprehensive plan to an enforcement-only proposal by 50% to 33%.

Of course, there are things in the Senate bill that need fixing -- and conservatives must stand strong in favor of assimilation. New immigrants need to learn English, U.S. history and the values that have made this country great.

But let us remember the counsel of the great conservative standard-bearer, Ronald Reagan, who was in favor of strong borders -- he once remarked that "a nation without borders is not really a nation" -- but also constantly reminded us that America must remain a "beacon" and a "shining city on a hill" for immigrants who continually renew our great country with their energy and add to the nation's economic growth and prosperity. Reagan was right. We need to do both things -- secure the borders and allow for sensible levels of safe, open, lawful immigration.

Americans and immigrants share the same values of work and opportunity. There is no reason to fear the newcomers arriving on our shores today -- if anything, they will energize what is best about our country.

The best way -- the only way -- to realize President Reagan's vision is through comprehensive immigration reform legislation. We urge the House and Senate to work out their differences and meet the demand of the American people that we act on this critical issue in a comprehensive way.

Day Laborers, Silent And Despised, Find Their Voice (NYT)

By Lawrence Downes

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

Illegal immigrants are a diverse bunch. There are about 12 million in this country, working in all industries and living in a range from middle class to working poor to something well below that. They are mostly Latino, but are Asian, African and Eastern European, too. The illegal Irish get a lot of press, but are just one tiny subset, a green sprig of parsley in the melting pot.

Of all these ethnic and economic subgroups, the one I find most compelling is the quiet one at the bottom: the Latino day laborers, the street-corner guys.

They are not the largest group, but they are the most visible, most vulnerable and most hated. They are also the least likely to get anything good out of the immigration bills now festering in Congress.

It takes nothing from the punishing toil of farm workers, hotel maids, wilderness firefighters and chicken processors to say that day laborers occupy a position of particular risk and hardship in these times of immigration panic.

They are silent and anonymous, but painfully exposed. They are jeered by suburbanites, harassed by Minuteman vigilantes and hounded by communities with police crackdowns, anti-loitering statutes and mass evictions. Contractors cheat them. People beat them up and firebomb their homes.

The possibility of being victimized without sympathy or a safety net is, of course, the risk one takes when entering this country illegally.

Day laborers are acutely aware of this and have set out to improve things on their own. In a development that may surprise those who see day laborers as immigration at its chaotic worst, this ad hoc phenomenon is shaping itself up.

Through a growing national network of job centers and hiring halls, day laborers are organizing, finding allies and pressing for better treatment.

They are energized by a sense that hard work and suffering are antidotes to shame, and that even the shunned and excluded can push back.

A coalition of worker groups around the country founded the National Day Laborer Organizing Network in 2000 to press for its members' rights. At a national conference last year at Hofstra University on Long Island, delegates from 12 states met to share strategies.

In many areas, laborers have formed de facto unions, refusing to work for less than $10 an hour. In places that have tried to force them out, like Redondo Beach, Calif., and Mamaroneck, N.Y., workers and their allies have filed federal lawsuits on First Amendment grounds.

The National Day Laborer Organizing Network is forging alliances with organized labor, like the Laborers' International Union of North America, which represents 700,000 construction workers, to fight for hiring sites and safer working conditions.

The immigration bills languishing in Congress offer very little promise for day laborers. Even the most generous legislation denies a path to legal status for the newest immigrants and those who can't prove steady employment, which leaves many day laborers out of luck.

The day laborers' group held a forum in a Manhattan church basement recently to discuss the bills, and the general mood was pessimistic. Members spoke of a disconnect between grass-roots organizations like theirs and the large immigrant-advocacy groups in Washington. They had little good to say about the Senate bill, which has been held up by many immigrant advocates as the best deal obtainable.

Such resentment may sound out of place for people who broke the law to get here. But while day laborers may be the most loathed illegal immigrants, you could also call them the least illegal. They don't misrepresent their identities as they contract independently for jobs off the books. They don't steal Social Security numbers or submit false work papers. They just work.

Members of the day laborers' network talk about ways their organization and other grass-roots groups would make their case to a public that isn't buying it. They have begun a hearts-and-minds campaign, seeking to win friends by cleaning up parks and highways while building up political clout with lobbying and protests.

But even if they can pull it off, the odds are against the strategy working. It's been hard enough getting the country behind even limited immigration reform.

If and when Congress ever gets around to fixing immigration, the illegal immigrants who benefit — if any — will be the ones seen as the worthiest, most promising and least threatening.

There will be no room for those at the margins, and that, practically by definition, is where the day laborers are — waiting, and working.

One Race, and Cheney Is Hooked

He's been to only one NASCAR race--the July 1 Pepsi 400 at Daytona--but already we hear that Vice President Dick Cheney is digging the noise and grime. So did it make him a fan? "He is now," says spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride. Before helping start the race, Cheney visited with the teams sponsored by the Army, National Guard, and Air Force. But the veep hasn't slapped a driver's number on his limo yet. "It may take a few more races before he has a favorite," says McBride. He left the race early but caught Tony Stewart's win on Air Force 2's TV.

TAX:

Concealed Sums Part Of Charges Against Attorney Yagman (LAW)

By Amanda Bronstad, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, July 10, 2006

While recent tax evasion charges brought against civil rights attorney Stephen Yagman are based largely on expenditures related to his personal lifestyle, federal prosecutors have accused him of concealing money he received as a principal of his Venice, Calif.-based law firm, now called Yagman & Yagman & Reichmann.

On June 23, prosecutors unsealed an indictment that charged Yagman with one count of tax evasion, one count of bankruptcy fraud and 17 counts of money laundering. Prosecutors allege that Yagman failed to pay more than $158,000 in federal income taxes to the Internal Revenue Service and hid assets from trustees overseeing bankruptcies filed on behalf of himself and his former law firm, Yagman & Yagman.

Yagman is best known for filing numerous lawsuits against the top officials of various law enforcement agencies, particularly in Los Angeles. In recent years, Yagman has sought to bring disciplinary action against U.S. District Judge Manuel Real of the Central District of California in a case closely watched by judges nationwide.

Yagman alleges that Real, who was handling a loan fraud case involving a woman under probation, made improper rulings as part of her separate bankruptcy case. After dismissing Yagman's case twice, Mary Schroeder, chief judge of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, recently appointed a special committee to investigate the charges.

In a prepared statement issued the day of the indictment, Yagman's lawyer, Barry Tarlow, a partner at Tarlow & Berk in Los Angeles, said that Yagman is targeted because of the numerous cases he has successfully brought against government agencies, including one of the first federal suits filed on behalf of a detainee at the prison camp in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. He did not return calls seeking further comment.

"Stephen's zealous and effective advocacy for poor and unpopular clients and against the government has earned him either praise or scorn, depending upon whether or not one believes that the government and police never can do wrong," said former U.S. Magistrate Judge Joseph Reichmann, who works with Yagman at his law firm. He added in a statement that Yagman "would not intentionally commit a crime."

The indictment alleges that Yagman "made numerous material misrepresentations and omissions to the personal and corporate bankruptcy trustees concerning the cases his law corporation and law partnership were handling, the status of those cases, and the receipt of settlement funds in those cases."

In 1999, Yagman filed for Chapter 7 personal bankruptcy protection.

At that time, he had just filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy protection on behalf of Yagman & Yagman and formed his current firm, which includes his ex-wife Marion Yagman and Reichmann.

He also had just completed a year's suspension from the practice of law for collecting exorbitant fees, the second time since being admitted by the State Bar of California in 1976. Now, legal fees, and other income he received for his work as a lawyer, are significant subjects in the government's indictment.

$1.4M ALLEGEDLY UNDISCLOSED

Specifically, Yagman failed to disclose as part of his law firm's bankruptcy about $1.4 million in attorney fees, including his personal share of $500,000, from the settlements of cases pending at the time, the indictment says.

In 1998, he allegedly opened a corporate bank account in order to hide about $581,000 in assets from the Internal Revenue Service, including three settlement checks from the city of Los Angeles totaling more than $175,000. He also used a brokerage account under his girlfriend's name to pay legal bills and make loans to his law firm, the indictment alleges.

Prosecutors also allege that he received a $125,000 bank check in 1999 from a client a few weeks after his law firm filed for bankruptcy protection. He failed to disclose the check, or his $50,000 share of the fees, as part of his personal bankruptcy.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Portman Expects Decrease In Deficit (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

The economy and federal revenues are growing at such a rapid rate that the deficit will shrink in the short term, President Bush's chief budget official says, while adding that keeping the deficit in control will depend in the long run on reform of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid.

Rob Portman, a former congressman and U.S. trade representative whom Mr. Bush tapped two months ago to be director of the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), said the president's economic policies have led to exceptional economic growth, which has in turn led to bulging federal receipts.

Mr. Portman will deliver the annual mid-session budget review this week, detailing progress on spending and revenues, and he told The Washington Times in a recent interview that tax revenues are expected to show at least double-digit growth in the year to date compared with fiscal year 2005.

The Congressional Budget Office on Friday said federal revenue is running 12.8 percent ahead of the figures at the same time last year. The double-digit increase is the second-highest growth rate in the last 25 years, following only 2005's increase of 15 percent.

With federal spending up 8.6 percent to date compared with 2005, the deficit should be at least $50 billion less than last year, though Mr. Portman said that depends on keeping the spending side under control.

Mr. Bush has set a goal of halving the deficit by 2009 compared with 2004, which finished with a $412 billion deficit. He and congressional Republicans have made the nation's recent economic growth one of the twin pillars, along with the war on terror, of their election-year campaign.

Mr. Portman said the revenue is so strong that if it were to continue, it could play a major role in helping ease the budget deficit.

"You can grow out of it short-term; it's theoretically possible," Mr. Portman said, though he cautioned that he's not predicting that will happen, particularly with long-term challenges of Social Security and Medicare still looming.

As the administration's new OMB director, Mr. Portman, who served 13 years as a congressman from Ohio, said Republicans deserve more credit than they are getting among voters for restraining spending.

"It's amazing. For the first time since 1997, last year Congress actually reduced the growth of entitlement spending," he said.

Mr. Portman also said the deficit as a percentage of total economic output, or the gross domestic product, is falling, both because of spending restraint and economic growth, and said Republicans are not getting enough credit for controlling spending.

"If you take out defense, if you take out homeland security, which increased just above inflation, last year you actually had a slight cut and a little bit of progress on entitlements," he said. "We're actually making some progress on spending."

He blamed high-profile spending projects such as the "bridge to nowhere" for making the public so pessimistic about spending, and said that's one reason the president is pushing so hard for a legislative line-item veto.

"It encourages people to focus early on in the process on whether this particular project or tax relief or spending is appropriate," Mr. Portman said.

The House passed a version of the line-item veto last month, and the Senate may debate it later this month.

Unlike the 1996 version, which the Supreme Court ruled unconstitutional, this version would not be an actual veto. Instead, after signing a spending or tax bill, the president would send another bill back to Congress that calls for specific items to be cut, and Congress would have a set period of time to vote on the bill.

As a former congressman, Mr. Portman knows the key legislators and said he has had some success convincing them the administration would use the line-item veto carefully, and not as a club to bash Congress.

He also said some of the chairmen on the spending subcommittees realize the line-item veto would help steel them against some spending requests.

"Instead of the chairman saying, 'I don't like your idea,' he can say, 'Look, if you put it in my bill it's going to get held up to public scrutiny and The Washington Times is going to be writing about it. Do you want it on the front page of The Washington Times?'" Mr. Portman said. "It's a tool that some of them, I think, understand they can use to better legislate."

GOP 'Values' Agenda Stumbles (WT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

Could a Republican-controlled Congress pass a bill to protect the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance from court challenges?

No problem, especially if proposed during the patriotic season leading up to the Fourth of July, Republican leaders thought.

No way, it turned out.

The bill, the first item on the Republican Party's trumpeted election-year "American Values Agenda," could not make it past a House committee.

Even worse for the Republicans was that they could not blame Democrats. One of the party's very own, Rep. Bob Inglis of South Carolina, voted no. Seven other Republicans skipped the Judiciary Committee meeting entirely.

So it goes this year for House Republicans, their majority in jeopardy for the first time in more than a decade.

"We're not having trouble," House Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio said. "This is your typical legislative meat grinder."

DOJ_NMG_0039023

But privately, many are frustrated. Democrats have pounced on the lack of progress with a "we can do better" election theme.

"I wish the election were today," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California said last week.

An election-year session of Congress with little major legislation turned into laws is nothing new. Lawmakers traditionally are loath to vote on contentious legislation so close to the start of campaigning.

For some, debating proposals that have little chance of passage is a legitimate process.

"Passing bills isn't the end-all and be-all of Congress," said Brian Darling of the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank. "There's also some value in debating these issues and using Congress to air out issues that are important to the American people."

Democrats ridicule as political ploys Republican decisions to bring up legislation doomed to fail, such as the constitutional amendments to ban flag desecration.

Republicans say Democrats are not above bringing up proposals just for political gain. They note that Democrats have insisted on bringing up a proposal to raise the minimum wage, which has failed for nine years.

With two-thirds of the 2006 legislative calendar over, Congress has passed and sent President Bush only two major pieces of legislation. One renewed the terrorist-fighting USA Patriot Act; the other extended $70 billion in tax cuts, roughly divided evenly between investors and middle-income families.

The legislative year is littered with failed or stalled Republican priorities. Some -- such as overhauling immigration, repealing estate taxes and changing rules on lobbying in response to several ethics scandals -- are disappointments for many in the Republican Party and for Mr. Bush.

The overhaul of immigration laws has become an implacable dispute about whether to give most of the nation's 10 million to 12 million illegal immigrants a chance at citizenship.

Rather than spend the summer resolving differences between the House and Senate versions, their chief patrons scheduled new hearings to shore up their arguments, with no resolution in sight.

Space Shuttle Declared Safe For Return (WP)

By Guy Gugliotta

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

HOUSTON, July 9 -- Space shuttle Discovery cleared a major safety hurdle Sunday for reentry, but the attention both aloft and on the ground appeared at times to focus more on the World Cup soccer final than on space travel.

NASA engineers completed their exhaustive analysis of three remaining "areas of concern" on Discovery's heat shielding and "cleared" all of them, said John Shannon, chairman of the mission management team.

"I'm pleased and proud," added Steve Poulos, chief of the shield review and manager of the Orbiter Project Office. "Not only did my team pound these issues flat, we put a dimple in the board."

By clearing the heat shield, NASA essentially gave Discovery a green light for reentry next Monday.

The inspection system was put in place after space shuttle Columbia disintegrated on reentry in 2003 because its heat shield was fatally damaged on launch.

The crews of Discovery and the international space station spent most of Sunday unloading equipment and supplies, and preparing for a spacewalk Monday to finish repairs on the station's mobile tramway.

But even with a full schedule, mission Commander Steven W. Lindsey conceded during a news conference early in the day that, after a "hectic" beginning to the mission, the shuttle astronauts and space station crew members might take something of a breather Sunday.

In response to a question from the news service Agence France-Presse, space station crewman Thomas Reiter, a German national, acknowledged that "we are very interested" in the day's soccer match between France and Italy to decide the World Cup.

"Piers Sellers and I will definitely want to know what the result is," Reiter said, adding enigmatically, "We're backing different teams."

The English-born Sellers, Discovery's lead spacewalker, then betrayed his support for France by shouting out, "To Zinedine Zidane, Thierry [Henry] and Patrick [Vieira]! Good luck!"

Asked later by German journalists to pick a favorite, Reiter ducked the question, hoping diplomatically for "a good game."

At halftime, Canadian astronaut Julie Payette, on duty at Mission Control in Houston as space shuttle communicator, told the astronauts that the score was tied 1-1, incurring the wrath of flight control team members around her who were taping the game to view later.

Payette later delivered an update. No change, she said, "but I have to be careful when I read up the score."

DOJ_NMG_0039024

Ten minutes later, Russian Mission Control radioed space station Commander Pavel Vinogradov that "everybody is waiting for prime time to be over and overtime to start."

When the match ended, with Italy the victor, the new shuttle communicator, astronaut Lee Archambault, sent the result to Lindsey.

Archambault told the astronauts that "you guys are rock stars" in Berlin, where part of the morning news conference played on Olympic Stadium's big screen before the match.

"It was probably Thomas," Lindsey deadpanned. "We try to keep Piers off the downlink."

Space Shuttle Cleared To Return Home (AP)

By Seth Borenstein

AP, July 10, 2006

Space shuttle Discovery's astronauts got some happy news Sunday: It's safe to fly home. Mission Control informed the crew of six that the ship's thermal shielding is "100 percent cleared for entry" in another week.

"Boy, that is great news, that's fantastic," shuttle commander Steve Lindsey said. "And to get all that done by the day of flight day six ... is just amazing."

"Everyone here around the room, as you can imagine, is most happy," Mission Control replied.

Only one heat shield issue remained going into the late afternoon mission management meeting — a 2-inch-long piece of fabric filler sticking out about an inch from thermal tiles on Discovery's belly. Engineers determined it wasn't necessary to have an astronaut pluck the strip out during a spacewalk and that it posed no concern for the spaceship's return to Earth on July 17. So managers gave the heat shield an official bill of health.

Officials had already decided that several other nicks and spots — ranging from bird droppings to frayed fabric — were no big deal.

Deputy shuttle program manager John Shannon, chairman of the mission management team, said the healthy shuttle — and the crew's accomplishments in orbit so far — pave the way for the next mission in just over 1 1/2 months. That's when assembly will resume at the international space station; construction was halted by the 2003 Columbia disaster.

Sandwiched between a daring spacewalk Saturday and a crucial but more routine spacewalk Monday, Discovery's crew had an easy day Sunday, said pilot Mark Kelly. They were scheduled to work only 15 hours, instead of 16 hours.

"Today has been a relatively light day compared to the others," Kelly said in the news conference. Those first five days of the mission were so busy "we had to take our meals on the run," Lindsey said.

Saturday's spacewalk, during which astronauts Piers Sellers and Michael Fossum stood on the end of 100 feet of sometimes-oscillating shuttle robotic arm and extension boom, proved that emergency shuttle repair work can be done from that unusual vantage point, the astronauts said. But they said the feeling of being out there at the end of the boom was a little unusual.

"You find yourself lying sideways when you think you're standing up," Sellers said. "It's an unnatural feeling, but not really very unpleasant."

The second spacewalk, which begins at 8:13 a.m. EDT Monday, is much like past international space station repair spacewalks. The bulk of the scheduled 6 1/2-hour spacewalk will concentrate on finishing repairs on the station's railcar-like mobile transporter. This is a crucial piece of the station that slides back and forth, helping in the expansion of the outpost.

"We need that thing to be working to move big pieces around during assembly," Sellers said Sunday. "It was dead on one side, kind of limping on just two wheels."

Sellers and Fossum will replace part of the transporter's umbilical reel, which weighs about 330 pounds on the ground. In what may be an awkward maneuver, Sellers will be holding the old umbilical in one hand and the new one in the other, Fossum said.

"The most challenging thing tomorrow is going to be just the choreography, going back and forth in the payload bay," Fossum said. "It's quite a ballet."

NASA planned to post on its Web site Sunday first-of-its-kind video of Discovery's launch as seen from the reusable solid rocket boosters. The video, recovered last week with the boosters, mesmerized engineers in Houston on Saturday.

Research Shifts At Space Station (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

When the international space station was initially proposed by President Ronald Reagan, its central mission was conceived as providing the most innovative and unusual research center that mankind had ever created. Orbiting 250 miles above Earth, the station would be a laboratory for developing medicines, for learning how single cells, plants and animals adapt to life in space, and for discovering technologies for processing metals and other materials in a gravity-free environment.

Twenty-two years later, the space station is half-built and can carry out some experiments, but the U.S. view of its science mission has greatly changed. The primary U.S. goal is no longer basic research, but to support President Bush's initiative of manned missions to the moon and to Mars by learning about how astronauts can live for long periods in space.

The morphing of the space station's role has not been without controversy. Some scientists fret that critical research in medicine and on atmospheric change is being de-emphasized in favor of splashy projects that will have little earthly benefit.

Much of U.S. research is focused on the rigors of living long term in zero gravity and with constant bombardment from solar radiation -- among the greatest hazards faced by crews traveling in deeper space.

"As it was originally planned, the space station would be a facility for all users," said Donald A. Thomas, NASA's space station program scientist. "Any scientist with an interesting experiment to do -- combustion and fluid scientists, plant and cell scientists, crystal growers -- they could all come to NASA, and we would try to accommodate them. But our cutbacks and refocusing have changed that."

So instead of learning how a particular gas or cell behaves in space, NASA's scientific effort is directed toward such problems as how to keep kidney stones from developing in astronauts and how to use long-distance ultrasound technology to diagnose stones if they develop. Avoiding bone and muscle loss is also a high priority, as are learning why immune systems of astronauts tend to deteriorate and how to stop that.

This refocusing does not mean basic science on the space station has ended or that planning for more elaborate and dramatic research is over. Rather, NASA's partners in the space station -- most notably Japan, 11 European nations and Canada -- will do substantial research of their own.

By the end of next year, the Japanese-developed science module Kibo and the European-built Columbus module are scheduled to be in place at the station, and both will be filled with basic research experiments. "They've gone ahead with their programs pretty much unchanged, so they'll be doing what we initially planned to do," Thomas said.

The Japanese program will focus on collecting information about trace chemicals in the atmosphere that might be associated with ozone depletion or global warming, and on the effects of weightlessness on a broad range of living things. It will also send up the world's largest wide-angle X-ray camera for use in examining very deep space.

The Columbus module, developed and manufactured by the European Space Agency, will also focus on basic biological and earth sciences research -- with experiments such as assessing the ability of bacteria to survive on an artificial meteorite and looking at volcanic activity far below Earth's surface.

Because U.S. space shuttles will carry much of the big equipment to the station, American researchers in return get room on the research modules and some access to the experiments of other nations. But to many scientists in this country, the shift in emphasis from research to furthering space travel is misguided.

A 2005 report from the National Academy of Sciences reflected that concern, with the panel worried that U.S. objectives "no longer include the fundamental biological and physical research that had been a major focus of [space station] planning since its inception. In addition to increasing fundamental scientific understanding, much of that research was intended to have eventual terrestrial applications in medicine and industry."

Without greater support, the panel concluded, the scientists who came together to work on space station experiments will soon be lost.

Even if U.S. science policy had not changed, however, it would be difficult to maintain an active research program on the station. It has housed only two or three crew members since the demise of the shuttle Columbia in 2003, and experts say it takes two people just to keep the space station operative. One of the astronauts who just arrived on space shuttle Discovery, Thomas Reiter of Germany, will remain at the station in the hope that a three-person crew can do more scientific work.

Despite the cutbacks and disappointments, NASA's Thomas said more than 100 journal articles have been published based on space station data. He said researchers have made important discoveries by growing protein crystals in space that could not be grown on Earth -- research that could lead to new drugs. Research into the nature of vibrations only possible in space, he said, could have implications for better understanding earthquakes and for protecting buildings against them.

He also said he was excited by the presence of bowling-ball-size satellites at the space station -- battery- and gas-powered units that astronauts are learning to control and perhaps will someday use on missions. Thomas said that a second mini-satellite was ferried up by Discovery and that crew members will work on synchronizing its movement in tandem with the other. A third satellite is expected up soon.

Thomas said that the satellites are largely sponsored by the Defense Department, but that NASA has some use of them and is excited about the possibilities. If the three can be controlled, he said, they could be the prototype for a free-flying space telescope.

"To be able to test them in the space station, where there's zero gravity but where they can't fly away, is an enormous plus," he said.

USO Volunteer Gets Salute From Commander In Chief (CHIT)

By Andrew L. Wang

Chicago Tribune, July 7, 2006

Dave Kruger is used to welcoming raw military recruits and career soldiers at the United Service Organizations center at O'Hare International Airport.

On Thursday evening, he was there to greet someone slightly higher up the ladder: the commander in chief of the United States, President Bush, who presented Kruger with the President's Volunteer Service Award.

When he heard earlier this week that he would meet Bush as the president arrived for a two-day visit to Chicago, "[I] choked up. My eyes started watering," Kruger said. "I just thought being put in for [the award] was an honor."

At their brief meeting, Kruger wished the president, who turned 60 on Thursday, a happy birthday and asked after his father. Bush thanked him for his service, Kruger said.

Kruger, of north suburban Lindenhurst, first volunteered about two years ago. A veteran who saw Bob Hope perform on a 1966 tour in Vietnam, he knew the effect the USO could have on military morale.

And though he was a longtime donor to the group, he wanted to do more. Not sure how he could help, he called the USO center at O'Hare. "I told the manager the only thing is, I can't sing or dance," he said, chuckling. "That's what I thought they were looking for in volunteers."

He was assured that the responsibilities entailed serving food and drinks at the center and guiding military personnel around O'Hare's labyrinthine terminals.

He started out working one Sunday a month, but soon he was also heading to the USO at Great Lakes Naval Station in North Chicago, where he asked the manager, Beth Piccolo, if she needed any help.

Being the only paid staffer there, she did.

Now Kruger volunteers about 27 hours a week, Friday through Sunday, and sometimes stops by to help after he gets off work as a shipping scheduler at a Wheeling manufacturing plant.

He delivers food from the grocery, does odd jobs around the office for Piccolo and serves food when naval recruits at the base come in. In two years Kruger has volunteered more than 1,300 hours, Piccolo said.

"Dave is like my right arm," she said. "I need him."

But more than dishing out pizza, sandwiches, cookies and hot dogs, Kruger cherishes being a part of the lives of his "extended family," the servicemen and women he meets.

A few months ago, one Friday night at O'Hare, a naval recruit walked into Kruger's post.

The tears in his eyes foretold the story: He had just flown in from a far-flung corner of Montana, where he had spent several days on emergency leave.

His mother had died, he told Kruger.

"I went around the counter and hugged him, and he said he was just so happy to have someone to talk to about it," Kruger said.

On Monday, Kruger got an e-mail from a ship in the Atlantic. It was Shane, the sailor he had comforted, writing that he had just visited Spain and asked his sweetheart to marry him.

The wedding is slated for next year. Kruger hopes to be there.

Losing And Not Knowing It (TH)

By Robert D. Novak

WASHINGTON, D.C. -- Lindsey Graham is no less independent and outspoken as a first-term senator from South Carolina than he was during eight tempestuous years in the House. He also is a golfer, and uses a metaphor from the links to describe his political discomfort. His fellow Republicans remind him of a tournament golfer who ignores the leader board and thinks he is ahead going into the 17th and 18th holes, when he really is trailing.

"It's like we think we'll get by with pars on the last two holes when we really need birdies," Graham told me. He referred to the 2006 midterm election, where he sees a real danger of Republicans losing control of both houses in Congress for the first time since the 1992 elections. Such foreboding reflects Graham's fear that demographic changes in America will extend beyond this year's elections and return the Republican Party to minority status.

It is not merely lack of enthusiasm for Graham's agenda. Since talking to the senator, I have tested his theories with a dozen prominent Republicans. All feel the tide has turned for them over the last month. Each of them claims that the American voter will stick with the Republicans after taking a good look at Democrats, a mindset that often is a precursor of defeat. To follow Graham's metaphor, perhaps they are not reading the real leader board of American politics.

Republicans surely seem to need some birdies to keep Senate seats in 2006. Rick Santorum remains far behind in Pennsylvania. Conrad Burns is in trouble in Montana. Jim Talent trails in Missouri. Mike DeWine is threatened by a noxious Republican atmosphere in Ohio. Lincoln Chafee is endangered in Democratic Rhode Island. Jon Kyl faces a surprisingly tough race in Arizona. Despite excellent candidates in Minnesota and Washington state, no Republican challenging for a Democratic-held Senate seat is in the lead. Thus, a six-seat takeover capturing the Senate is possible.

This is of special concern for Republicans because the third of Senate seats contested in 2006 is more favorable to their party than what will follow. The long-term outlook troubles Graham, who sees a bleak Republican future north of the Mason-Dixon Line. Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins in Maine and Arlen Specter in Pennsylvania may be the last Republican senators from their states. The rising Hispanic-American population not only has transformed California into a Democratic state; freshman Democratic Sen. Ken Salazar looks like the new political face of Colorado, and Arizona is no longer safe for Kyl conservatives.

These demographic changes suggest an end to the gradual political realignment that began in the late '60s and produced consistent electoral success for Republicans. As a South Carolinian, Graham must worry about his party suffering the fate of Democrats in the '20s. Democrats elected only 20 House members and won no presidential electoral votes outside Southern and border states in 1920.

Accordingly, Graham is one conservative Republican who supports President Bush on immigration. He and Bush advisers agree that the immigration hard line may alienate the Hispanic vote with disastrous consequences. But Graham has little backing at the White House for a softened party line on global warming and entitlement reform that includes greater contributions by upper-income Americans.

Graham sees the highest Republican priority as controlling federal spending. He proposes renewing the campaign for a constitutional amendment mandating a balanced budget, backed up by self-restraint on earmarks. That agenda evokes limited applause in party circles. Sophisticates in Washington roll their eyes over constitutional limits on spending. Sens. John McCain and Tom Coburn have not made friends by fighting earmarks. After all, why should Republicans clap if they think they are ahead going into the last two holes?

OTHER NEWS:

Commercial Real Estate Maintains Its Strength Despite A Cooling Housing Market (WSJ)

By Jennifer S. Forsyth

With America's housing market clearly cooling, will commercial real estate start to swoon?

Hardly. The national office market, which cratered after the tech bust in 2000, has recovered and is the strongest it has been in five years. The shopping-mall market has stayed strong because consumer spending held up better than expected. And hotels had their most profitable year ever in 2005, partly because of strong business travel.

In fact, the commercial markets benefited from the former froth in the residential-property market because the boom in residential construction limited the amount of land that could be used for other purposes. In some markets, the conversion of apartments, hotels and, to a lesser extent, office buildings, into condominiums reduced the risk of oversupply -- one of the biggest hazards in commercial real estate and one that contributed to the sector's crash in the late 1980s.

Despite the widely varying types of commercial properties -- and the fact they are partly driven by different factors -- it isn't uncommon for people to assume if houses aren't selling, commercial markets must be at risk, too. So common that the faulty assumption itself could be self-fulfilling, says Robert White Jr., president of Real Capital Analytics, a New York-based real-estate information firm. "I so worry...that if they get burned on their condo in Miami, they are going to stay away from any other commercial real-estate investments for the next decade. Those markets are completely different."

Home-ownership trends are tied directly to income and interest rates, says Glenn Mueller, an investment strategist for Dividend Capital Group, a Denver-based real-estate investment-management firm. And home buying was made unusually affordable in the past few years by low interest rates and the popularity of mortgage-financing options such as interest-only loans. This led to high demand, much speculation and lots of new building. But as interest rates began to rise, it became more difficult for people to afford or even to qualify for loans. That has produced a glut of homes and condos in some markets.

Of course, interest rates affect commercial mortgages as well. Cheap debt has been one reason why there have been so many bidders on the commercial buildings sold over the past few years, pushing prices to record levels and yields to unprecedented lows.

Unlike the residential market, in which investors are most often private individuals, commercial investors are more diverse and not nearly as tied to mortgage rates. Dr. Mueller also points out that some of these investors include institutional buyers such as pension funds that pay cash instead of borrowing money. There's also still strong demand for commercial real estate, particularly among foreign investors. "We just don't see any slowing of investor interest, particularly in retail and hotels," says Deborah Jackson, executive managing director of New York-based Weiser Realty Advisors LLC.

In addition to condo conversions helping to reduce the supply of office space outright, residential construction has contributed to the high cost of land and materials in many U.S. markets. In many cases, because of high construction costs, it was cheaper to buy an office building -- even at high prices -- than to build a new one. Without much new speculative development, vacancy rates have dropped in almost every major market and landlords have been able to get more for rents.

In Miami, for example, residential units in the central business district increased 55% since 2000, while the office increase was 9.5%, according to Jones Lang LaSalle, a real-estate services firm. Even if developers contemplated a new office building, the construction companies were likely tied up with residential jobs until recently, says Jubeen Vaghefi, a Miami-based managing director for Jones Lang LaSalle. All the while, the South Florida economy has been steadily improving. Those forces combined to boost the office market there.

To be sure, the office recovery is uneven. Longtime struggling office markets such as Dallas, while improving, still have high vacancy rates from previous overbuilding, as do areas such as Cleveland and Detroit, where job growth has been limited.

Real estate also remains a cyclical industry, and it is early in the office sector's recovery. Investors who paid sky-high prices for commercial buildings, especially those who financed using floating-rate debt or interest-only loans in the early years, are dependent on their optimistic growth projections to deliver.

Yet, with generally improving fundamentals such as reduced vacancy and higher rents and few worries about overbuilding in most markets, the office sector should continue to improve in the near term, if job growth doesn't take a dive. "We're still in that race between increasing interest rates and increasing fundamentals," Stephen Blank, senior resident fellow of finance with the Urban Land Institute, says of the commercial market. "It appears to me that we are going to skate through this."

$2 Million Payment To Former Lobbyist Raises Eyebrows (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

You've probably never heard of Jeffrey S. Shockey. So, for simplicity's sake, think of him as the Two Million Dollar Man.

The 40-year-old congressional staffer last year collected nearly $2 million in severance payments from his former employer, a lobbying firm that specializes in winning benefits from the committee he now serves. Many longtime Washingtonians are shaking their heads in disbelief over the payout's enormous size, its ad hoc method of calculation and the fact that Shockey received it while working as a senior congressional aide.

No wonder Americans hate the nation's capital. Federal employees are prohibited from supplementing their incomes with money from private sources, especially from lobbyists who have business before the government. Shockey says his payment was justified and within the rules. But experienced lobbyists around town question both its economics and its propriety.

The situation is an example of a common occurrence -- the spinning of the "revolving door" between the public and private sectors. Shockey is deputy chief of staff of the powerful House Appropriations Committee. Before that he was a partner for five years in a lobbying firm that made its living extracting goodies from the same committee. And before that he worked for Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), who was then a member of the committee and is now its chairman.

Along the way, Shockey made millions. As a lobbyist in 2004 he earned $2 million, which is double what the city's top lobbyists were said to earn just a few years ago. Shockey, in fact, was on track to make $3 million in 2005, the year he returned to government as the No. 2 staffer for the Appropriations Committee.

Lobby shops often give parting gifts to colleagues who go into public service as a way to maintain strong relations. But the amount tends to be nominal and strictly tied to past performance to avoid even the appearance of paying a federal official in exchange for favorable treatment -- an exchange that would be illegal.

Why, then, would Shockey's former firm pay him so much? The reason, several seasoned lobbyists speculated, must have been the firm's desire to keep its communications with Shockey and the appropriations panel absolutely seamless. "There would be no need to pay out that amount of money unless you needed to maintain a superlative relationship with that person after he leaves," one veteran lobbyist said.

Spokesmen for Shockey's old firm say the company already had deep connections with Lewis and didn't need any more. Still, who can blame skeptics for thinking that $2 million might buy more than merely goodwill?

Congressional appropriators like Lewis were once hesitant to explicitly fund pet projects for fear of being accused of playing favorites and of micromanaging the government. But that was a long time ago. The Republican Revolution of 1994 ushered in a new congressional majority that professed to be distrustful of government but also worked overtime to maintain its control by directing federal aid into popular programs that would help reelect GOP members.

Lawmakers were encouraged to earmark billions of dollars for thousands of home-state projects every year as a way to court their constituents. To take advantage of those giveaways, lobbyists increasingly specialized in appropriations work. Shockey and his firm were leaders in the field.

Lobbyists were hired in droves and dozens of them made fortunes, including Shockey. Inundated by requests for earmarks, some congressmen began to rely on their lobbyist friends to help them select which projects to back and to monitor them as they moved through the legislative process. In turn, the lobbyists supplied the congressmen with campaign contributions and other amenities.

Critics decry such mutual back-scratching as incestuous, undemocratic and potentially corrupting. Lobbyists (and their grateful clients) say it's just the way things work in the complicated world of Washington. In any case, it surely was no coincidence that many of Shockey's four dozen clients -- including the city of Redlands and the county of San Bernardino -- were in the southern California district of Shockey's once and current boss.

Shockey's former lobbying firm, now called Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White, assisted lots of California-based organizations and municipalities. One of its partners is a former California congressman, Bill Lowery (R), who, like Shockey, is close to Lewis -- so close that federal authorities in Los Angeles have subpoenaed many of the firm's clients to learn more about the relationship of the firm, Lewis and Lowery.

Publicity over the investigation has broken up the partnership. The firm's two Democratic partners, James M. Copeland and Lynnette R. Jacquez, told their Republican colleagues last month that they were leaving. The reason, they said, was that ethical and legal questions threatened to destroy their professional reputations and ruin their commercial prospects. Lewis has denied any wrongdoing, and the firm has said it has complied with all the rules.

Shockey has not received a subpoena. He has been careful to disclose his severance package and has removed himself from dealings with the firm and his former clients.

But several of Washington's prominent lobbyists question the deal. I spent a few days talking to owners and managers of lobbying firms about Shockey's $1.96 million payment. None wanted to be quoted by name for fear of angering Lewis, and many might benefit if Copeland Lowery fails. But they all agreed that the payout was far larger than was common in similar cases.

They also said a transaction that pricey might look like a conflict of interest even if it isn't. And that's a major danger in a political town.

Here's how it came to be:

After Lewis became chairman of the appropriations panel in early 2005, Shockey surprised his partners by announcing that he wanted to return to Capitol Hill. The question then became how much they would pay him for his ownership in the firm.

One answer could have been nothing. Copeland Lowery had no written partnership agreement and functioned under an "eat what you kill" arrangement. That meant its partners kept the revenue they collected from their clients less overhead costs, which were divided among them based on the percentage of total firm revenue that each of them brought in.

In other words, Shockey had already taken out of the firm everything he brought into it. Once the company got current with its receivables and gave Shockey his share, it could well have said goodbye to him and that would have been that.

But Shockey was one of the firm's main breadwinners. According to the firm's lawyers, he presented his partners with an implicit choice. He would recommend that his clients stay with Copeland Lowery in exchange for a severance or he would sell his "book of business" to a competing lobby shop.

So the partners cut him a deal at what they felt was fair market value. They agreed to give him six times the amount that his clients were producing per month at the time of his departure. They removed from their calculation the few clients that Shockey thought would not continue with the firm after he left and came up with roughly $1.5 million. Adding in revenue he was entitled to receive from bills that were still being paid, his severance package totaled $1.96 million, which was paid in installments in 2005.

Outsiders have several concerns about this transaction. One is that lobbying is very personal. When a key lobbyist leaves, his or her clients often bolt. That's why turnovers of business like Shockey's generally produce for the departing lobbyist nothing more than a "finder's fee," if that. Ten top lobbyists I spoke to said that departing partners rarely get more than two or three months' worth of retainers-on-the-books because there isn't any guarantee that their clients will continue with the firm.

Shockey's threat that he would park his clients elsewhere was probably empty because he was not going to go with them.

These lobbyists also could not understand why Copeland Lowery would shoulder so massive a financial burden. Shockey's payout ate up 26 percent of the firm's 2005 lobbying revenue of $7.4 million, based on the firm's public disclosures. Even if the firm had a 50 percent profit margin (which is possible in lobbying), that would mean that half the partners' earnings went to someone who was no longer there.

I guess keeping appropriators happy is worth an awful lot.

Running Hard, Senate Power Seeks A New Image (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

PITTSBURGH, July 6 — The conservative glory days of 1994, when Rick Santorum roared into the Senate at the age of 36, seem a long time ago as he fights for his political life this year, trying to convince Pennsylvania voters that he has not gone Washington.

Not become part of the establishment he used to rail against.

Not forgotten the kitchen table issues that matter here.

Mr. Santorum, the third-ranking Republican leader in the Senate, distributed a brochure this week as he worked a sweltering round of town hall meetings and Fourth of July parades: "Fifty Things You May Not Know About Rick Santorum." It is filled with what he called meat and potatoes, like his work to expand colon cancer screenings for Medicare beneficiaries (No. 3), or to secure money for "America's first ever coal to ultra-clean fuel plant" (No. 2).

"I can't tell you the number of people who, after having read it, said, 'Gee, I didn't know any of this stuff,' " Mr. Santorum said in an interview in a firehouse in Monroeville, after his 10th event in two days.

Mr. Santorum was a symbol of the conservative movement in its brash youth; now, in many ways, he embodies the movement in middle age, 12 years after taking control of the House and Senate, no longer so confident that the political winds are with it, especially in an anti-incumbent year.

He needs to reintroduce himself over the next four months, he said, to get beyond the stereotypes. "I have to fight against five and a half years of the mainstream media, particularly local press, telling their side of the story," he said.

He said he wanted Pennsylvanians to think of him as a political heir to Alfonse M. D'Amato of New York, who was known as Senator Pothole for being acutely attuned to constituent needs. (Perhaps not the most auspicious role model, since Mr. D'Amato was unseated by an ambitious Democrat, Charles E. Schumer.)

It is a different image from the high-profile conservatism for which Mr. Santorum is so widely known: his impassioned opposition to abortion and same-sex marriage, and his advocacy of private investment accounts in Social Security.

A kinder, gentler Rick Santorum? "People already know about the other stuff," he said. "You guys remind them every day about the other stuff. Let's tell the rest of the story."

The most recent round of independent polls shows that Mr. Santorum is arguably the most endangered senator in the country. Polls show that Robert P. Casey Jr., the state treasurer, holds a comfortable lead over Mr. Santorum — in a Quinnipiac University poll, Mr. Casey is in the lead by 18 points.

Mr. Santorum has insisted that voters do not really know much about Mr. Casey, that some Pennsylvanians actually believe the Democratic candidate is his father, former Gov. Robert P. Casey, who died six years ago.

"This is a guy recruited by the Democrats because he has a good name," Mr. Santorum said, after shaking hands at a Fourth of July fireworks display in Radnor.

Mr. Casey, in an interview, noted that he had run three statewide general election campaigns in recent years and served as state auditor general and treasurer. Moreover, he said, it is "really insulting to the people of Pennsylvania" to suggest that some voters still think he is his father.

Leading pollsters agree on this: The race, so far, is mostly about Mr. Santorum. The Quinnipiac poll found that more than 40 percent of those who said they would vote for Mr. Casey said it was primarily a vote against Mr. Santorum. The senator "appears to be his own worst enemy in his battle for re-election," said Clay F. Richards, assistant director of the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute, which conducted its survey June 13-19 with 1,076 Pennsylvania voters and a margin of sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points.

In the end, Mr. Santorum said, he needs to make this race not a referendum but a choice between "a record of accomplishment and leadership" (Mr. Santorum) and "a guy who's coasted along," is "focused on ambition for the sake of ambition," and is "running for one office after another" (Mr. Casey).

Many here are steeling for an intensely negative campaign, based on this rough calculus: to win, some analysts have said, a polarizing candidate like Mr. Santorum must make his opponent seem an unacceptable choice. And Mr. Santorum has a much bigger war chest to make that case this fall.

It has not been an easy few months for Mr. Santorum. He found himself mired in controversy over his residency in recent weeks, with his detractors highlighting the fact that while he maintains a modest residence in suburban Pittsburgh, his family lives in the Virginia suburbs when the Senate is in session, which is the majority of the year. Critics argued it was not unlike the living arrangements he denounced in his 1990 House race against Representative Doug Walgren, the Democrat he defeated.

Mr. Santorum, then 32 and a quintessential grass-roots insurgent, accused Mr. Walgren of being out of touch with his Pittsburgh-area district, symbolized by his home in the Virginia suburbs.

"He's clearly paying a price for it now in western Pennsylvania," Mr. Walgren said, "because there's a lot of people who remember he was so critical of my having my children in Washington."

Mr. Santorum said the Senate was different from the House, adding that "we just decided I had to have my family here, or I'd never get to see them." He and his wife have six children.

In general, Mr. Santorum dismisses the notion that he has become what he once campaigned against — the Washington establishment.

"I think I've tried to keep my edge," he said. "I get to every county, every year. I work really hard to stay in touch with the people of this state. I don't do a lot of frilly stuff as a member of Congress. I try to be pretty meat and potatoes."

But the Casey campaign has said, relentlessly, that Mr. Santorum has voted with President Bush "98 percent of the time," and that he is a "rubber stamp" for an administration that is decidedly unpopular here. The Casey campaign has portrayed Mr. Santorum as far too close to the K Street lobbying community and far too devoted to a national conservative agenda.

"At some point, he began to spend a lot more time on Washington politics and Republican Party politics and ideology than on Pennsylvania's priorities," Mr. Casey said. "In a nutshell, he's gone Washington."

Veterans of Pennsylvania politics have said Mr. Santorum should not be underestimated. Gov. Edward G. Rendell, a Democrat who campaigned for his own re-election in a parade this week in suburban Glenside, said that while many were "writing Senator Santorum off," inside the state the view was different. Mr. Rendell said, "It's going to be a battle for us, and we know that."

But G. Terry Madonna, who heads the Keystone Poll at Franklin & Marshall College, said Mr. Santorum had been struggling to find political traction, something to move voters. Two of the classic wedge issues — abortion and the rights of gun owners — have been largely neutralized, because Mr. Casey has taken conservative stands on both.

In recent days, Mr. Santorum has been campaigning hard on the immigration issue, denouncing the Senate-passed bill, which has the support of the state's popular senior senator, Arlen Specter, also a Republican. Mr. Santorum's campaign is running television and radio spots on the issue, and made 400,000 phone calls on immigration recently, said his media consultant, John Brabender.

Mr. Santorum argues that the Senate legislation amounts to giving amnesty to illegal immigrants; advocates say it offers only a pathway to citizenship, with many requirements, for those here longest. Mr. Casey said that he would support that bill, if that was his only option, but added that Mr. Santorum "is trying to make it a one-issue campaign on an issue he's done nothing about."

Given his voting record — Congressional Quarterly ratings show he voted with his party 92 percent of the time in 2005 and with Mr. Bush 95 percent of the time — Mr. Santorum's ultimate challenge may come in the Philadelphia suburbs in southeastern Pennsylvania, home to many socially moderate Republicans and independents.

The "50 Things You May Not Know About Rick Santorum" brochure was recently distributed heavily to that area, with its decidedly moderate spin on Mr. Santorum's record — noting, for example, his work to "battle world AIDS and to help eliminate world poverty, working closely with Bono" (No. 4).

Mr. Santorum walked the entire Fourth of July parade route in wilting heat in one such suburb, Lower Southampton Township, this week.

He was greeted politely, sometimes enthusiastically, while James F. Cawley, a Bucks County commissioner and a Republican, looked on approvingly.

"Rick Santorum never went to Washington and caught Potomac fever," Mr. Cawley insisted. Twelve years after the Republican revolution of 1994, the argument is the same — Mr. Santorum's role is different.

Hillary Clinton Seeks To Woo Wall St (FT)

By Ben White

Financial Times, July 10, 2006

Hillary Clinton has been cosying up to Wall Street in recent weeks with a series of meetings with top executives that could help her follow the path blazed by her husband ahead of his first presidential run.

People familiar with the meetings said they appeared intended to help Wall Street figures get to know the New York senator better as she coasts through an easy 2006 re-election campaign and paves the way for a possible Democratic presidential run in 2008. Bill Clinton's early forays to Wall Street helped advance his bid for the Democratic nomination in 1992.

Some events, such as a recent gathering at Morgan Stanley that included chief executive John Mack, a big Republican donor, have been fundraisers for the Senate campaign. Others, including a chat with executives at Lehman Brothers, are more policy-oriented. Mrs Clinton is said to be planning meetings at Merrill Lynch and Credit Suisse, among others.

Ann Lewis, a senior adviser to Mrs Clinton, said the meetings were focused on 2006.

"She is proud to represent a state as diverse as New York with farmers upstate and bankers on Wall Street," she said.

However, political observers noted that Mrs Clinton faces little significant opposition in 2006. They said the the Wall Street meetings could pay dividends in 2008 by helping reassure bankers that Mrs Clinton is a free-market centrist, not the tax-and-spend, protectionist liberal some Republicans paint her to be.

"She wants to reassure them that she is really OK," said Maurice Carroll, a pollster and political analyst.

Analysts said the meetings also gave Mrs Clinton, viewed as a favourite for the Democratic presidential nomination, an opportunity to argue that she would improve the standing of the US abroad and demonstrate her commitment to free trade. This has been called into question by her vocal opposition to DP World of Dubai's attempted purchase of a company controlling certain US ports.

The lack of an obvious Republican frontrunner also means more Wall Street money and support could flow to Mrs Clinton and other Democrats in 2008.

Many on Wall Street are already familiar with Mrs Clinton through her work in the Senate. She often visits big New York employers such as JP Morgan Chase for public and private events. She has raised $4.7m (€3.6m, £2.5m) from individuals in the financial services, real estate and insurance sectors this year, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

Wake Up, Democrats: Ideas And Vision Do Matter (LAT)

By Kenneth S. Baer And Andrei Cherny

The Los Angeles Times, July 10, 2006

SOMETHING HAPPENS to a political party when it is not just out of power but has had to play on the home field of its opponents for a generation: It loses faith in itself and becomes scared.

Like the 98-pound weakling who lives in fear of the school bully, it will say anything to avoid being stuffed into a gym locker: I don't really believe in anything! I don't stand for anything! Please just leave me alone!

That this has become true in the Democratic Party is clear in listening to the worried words of pundits and political professionals who counsel Democrats to avoid offering any vision or direction for the country — to instead simply wait for voters to so tire of Republican mismanagement that they will turn to more "competent" Democrats to administer a conservative state.

Maureen Dowd, for instance, argued recently that "big ideas" don't matter — "what matters," she wrote, "is the bearer of an idea." James Carville — the architect of Bill Clinton's 1992 victory — told Newsweek that "the American people are going to be ready for an era of realism. They've seen the consequences of having too many 'big ideas.' "

And in these pages, Jonathan Chait cynically dismissed any talk of "vision" or "ideas" and instead argued that Democrats should not formulate a coherent worldview because, for progressives, "everything works on a case-by-case basis." This ad hoc approach to politics misunderstands the basics of American history and underestimates the power of ideas in shaping it. It may win an odd election here or there in spite of itself, but ultimately, it is a losing strategy for any political party.

Ideas have driven American politics since the founding of the republic. The U.S. was established on grand notions of democracy and freedom that were radical breaks with the entire history of the world to that point. In the 19th century, Jacksonian ideas about opportunity for all, not just the few, were brought to life through the Homestead Act, the transcontinental railroad and the land grant colleges. When industrialization came to remake the face of American life at the turn of the last century, the Progressives rethought how government and society should work to adapt to the new Machine Age and its urban centers. Eventually, these ideas were realized in Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal and came to define and delimit the debate over government for the rest of the 20th century.

The leaders who brought about these changes did not approach their work on a case-by-case basis, nor did they simply see their jobs as conscientiously administering the machinery of government so that it ran smoothly. Instead, they had ambition and a vision of how the world should work. Although their innovations may seem commonplace now, these visions often represented a radical break from the prevalent dogma of the moment, emerging from outside the accepted bounds of debate.

Ideas have both shaped America's history as well as transformed its politics. If elections were only about competence, then right about now we'd be dedicating the Michael Dukakis Presidential Library. The fact is that the parties that have won elections over the long term and have been able to build governing majorities are those that have put forward a vision that both inspires the American people and responds to the concerns they face at the time. Certainly, this was true during the New Deal era, when Americans repeatedly chose the often chaotic and unorganized administration of Roosevelt's Democrats because they responded to the ideas about government and the economy that FDR was offering.

In response, Eisenhower-type Republicans argued that what was needed was a "Modern Republicanism" that promised to administer the New Deal more effectively. Other conservatives argued that unless they offered an alternative vision that would rally Americans to their banner, the Republicans would always be the moon to the Democratic sun: reflecting its light but shining none of its own.

So the bravest conservative thinkers took on the GOP establishment and its most plodding, popular voices. They developed a series of ideas — supply-side economics, Social Security privatization, faith-based social policy and so on — that reshaped the American political landscape. It took decades for their ideas to make it into the mainstream, but — for better or worse — American politics today is played out on the terrain laid down by these thinkers.

Now, it is progressives that have a choice. Most of the voices inside Washington believe that conservative errors and overreaching — along with more effective voter targeting and door-knocking by Democrats, more compelling TV ads and new "frames" for old policies — will yield enough votes so that in a closely divided nation, Democrats might eke out a victory and regain power.

We disagree. Having seen the failure of a generation of conservative ideas on fiscal and foreign policy, Americans are ready to listen to an alternative. Now is the moment for Democrats to offer a set of breakthrough ideas that will create a governing majority for a generation. But this will happen only if they are willing to be more than the railroad conductor making sure the trains run on time, and instead put America on a new and different track.

Delay Redux? (TIME)

By Mike Allen And Hilary Hylton

Time, July 10, 2006

Could Tom DeLay be headed back to the House? A source close to the ex-Congressman tells TIME that DeLay is planning an aggressive campaign to retake the House seat he quit in June if an appeals court lets stand a ruling by a federal judge last week that his name must stay on November's ballot--even though he has moved to Virginia. "If it isn't overturned, Katy bar the door!" says a G.O.P. official. "Guess he'll have to fire up the engines on the campaign and let 'er rip." DeLay, awaiting trial for money laundering, never intended to fade away. He plans to give paid speeches and has signed a deal to have his bio penned by best-selling author Stephen Mansfield. But to run, DeLay would have to raise money fast: his campaign fund has well under $1 million left. At least he knows his would-be opponent well: ex-Congressman Nick Lampson's original district was eliminated in a redistricting engineered by DeLay.

Wage-ing Battle (TIME)

Ever sinceÂ 2004, when theÂ G.O.P. fired up its conservativeÂ core by getting gay-marriage bans on the ballot in 11 states on Election Day, Democrats have sought their own rally-the-base issue. What could motivate liberals to turn out for November's midterms? They think they have an answer: the minimum wage.

The federal minimum wage has been stuck at $5.15 an hour since 1997. Polls show that more than 80% of Americans favor an increase, but most Republican politicians--who traditionally side with the business lobby on the issue--do not. So Democrats are sharpening their attacks on the G.O.P. for seeming out of step with public opinion. Senator Hillary Clinton of New York has led a Democratic effort to block a scheduled $3,300 increase in congressional pay--the typical lawmaker's salary would rise to $168,500 a year--unless Republicans agree to hike the minimum wage to $7.25. The Dems are also emulating the Republican gay-marriage strategy by backing ballot measures in six states to boost the minimum wage. They hope voters will go to the polls for this cause, then support Democrats in races that could help the party take back Congress. Clinton and ex-Senator John Edwards will head to Ohio this week to stump for that state's measure. Edwards then plans to go to Arizona to rally for an initiative there.

The potential political cost of not supporting an increase is beginning to have an impact in the G.O.P. While Republican leaders in the House have so far blocked efforts to get a vote on the issue this year, some vulnerable, moderate G.O.P. members of Congress are speaking out for a higher minimum wage--and pushing their leadership to relent. Christopher Shays, a nine-term Connecticut Republican embroiled in a tight fight for re-election, says he backs the Dems' push. "I just think it's an embarrassment," he says of his party's stance on the issue.

Not enough Republicans have sided with Shays to get a House vote, which means any action this year will depend on voters in the six states with ballot initiatives. All would increase the minimum wage to at least $6.15, and all are good bets to pass. It's less clear whether the Democrats can convert that support into backing for the party. If the minimum wage doesn't generate maximum anger against the Republicans, low-income workers may find themselves with bigger paychecks, but congressional Democrats may be right back where they began--in the minority.

One Hug At A Time (NSWK)

By Jonathan Darman

Newsweek, July 10, 2006

It's Friday night in Iowa and an old politician is trying some new tricks. John Edwards is back—back, with the familiar deep drawl, dark tan and honeyed hair. Gone, though, are the old catchphrases—"two Americas" and "hope is on the way." In their place: a long meditation on America's moral obligation to confront the plight of its poor. "Thirty-seven million of our people, worried about feeding and clothing their children," he said to his audience. "Aren't we better than that?" It's not the stuff of great sound bites, but it's part of Edwards's new political plan: a presidential campaign with fighting poverty as a central plank. It's a risky strategy in today's Democratic Party—Edwards may be the most viable national candidate since Bobby Kennedy to tie his destiny to a fight for the destitute. "Yeah, I heard all that stuff: 'Who cares?' or 'It's a dead end'," Edwards tells NEWSWEEK. "Well, it's what I want to do."

Rebel outsider is an odd role for the Democratic Party's most recent vice presidential candidate to play. Yet Edwards's 2008 presidential campaign—still hypothetical but proceeding at high speed—is all about breaking with the established script. He's largely opted out of the buzz primary—leaving candidates like former Virginia governor Mark Warner and Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh to convince Beltway insiders and media types that they're the best alternatives to front runner Hillary Clinton. Instead, he's using the name recognition he built up in '04 and hitting the campaign trail early and often—quietly raising $6.5 million in 105 appearances for Democrats running in 2006.

His under-the-radar strategy is paying off, in Iowa at least. A June Des Moines Register poll of likely Democratic caucusgoers had Edwards leading a pack of potential presidential candidates that included other widely known names like Clinton, 2004 ticketmate John Kerry and even Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack. Edwards is certainly not the only candidate hustling in corn-country—Warner and Bayh visited within days of his most recent visit—but with 10 trips to the state since the beginning of 2005, he's logged more time there than any candidate in either party. This time, they're counting on Iowa, which brought John Kerry's candidacy back from the dead in 2004, to propel them into New Hampshire, and beyond. To win, Edwards must leverage his 2004 visibility, shake off the disappointment many Democrats felt at the campaign and emerge from Kerry's shadow as a worthy candidate in his own right.

Edwards talks about 2004 like it was a lifetime ago. His wife, Elizabeth, was diagnosed with breast cancer the day after the election. "We just threw ourselves into it," he recalls. "I went with Elizabeth to every chemo test." The twin traumas—losing a national election and watching a spouse suffer—were an enormous emotional load. But Elizabeth's illness helped Edwards keep the election loss in perspective. "The adjustment wasn't that hard," he says, "because I was so focused on getting her well."

Edwards's old running mate, John Kerry, has had a harder time moving on. Relations between the two men were always more functional than friendly, and the two Johns are now eying each other as potential opponents. There is history here: before inviting him to join his ticket, Kerry asked Edwards if he would run against him in 2008 in the event they lost the election the first time around. Edwards, according to two former campaign aides who asked not to be named describing closed-door discussions, was taken aback and ducked the question. (Edwards declined to comment on a private conversation; Kerry was unavailable for comment.)

Still, to truly cut the cord with Kerry-Edwards, the North Carolinian has to shore up the political weaknesses highlighted by the last campaign. Dismissed as a foreign-policy lightweight in '04, he's co-chaired (with former Republican veep candidate Jack Kemp) a task force on U.S.-Russia relations, and traveled to Europe, India and the Middle East. "The important thing," he says, "is making it clear you have a world view." He's signed up with the New York investment group Fortress—a move that may help combat the notion that as a longtime trial lawyer, he's anti-business. (It also helps cover a new home on 100 acres in Chapel Hill.)

One key advantage Edwards is counting on: people know who he is. His retooled stump speech takes ironic jabs at his old campaign persona. ("There is the chance that at least one of you remembers that I'm the son of a millworker," he told the Indianola audience.) His advisers learned in 2004 that the hardest hurdle a candidate faces is simply getting voters to remember his name. That's not a problem in Iowa anymore, they say. "A Warner or Evan Bayh would have to spend $30 million to get where Edwards is," says an aide who asked not to be identified speaking about a still unannounced campaign. Other campaigns point out that a figure as well known as Edwards will have a hard time redefining himself.

Lowered expectations could also help Edwards's chances. In '04, he was billed as Bill Clinton's second coming, and many audiences were disappointed when they saw the real thing. Now he simply has to show more ability to connect with audiences than, say, Hillary or Mark Warner—a somewhat easier hurdle to scale.

Soon, he'll start inching back toward the limelight. This fall, Elizabeth will publish a memoir; publicity plans include an excerpt in People magazine and major television appearances. But Iowa looms largest, and as the caucuses get closer, Edwards will have to take bigger steps to prove he really is a new man. After his Indianola speech, Edwards disappears into the star-struck crowd of well-wishers. "I really hope you'll get in again," a woman wearing an IOWANS FOR EDWARDS 2008 button says to him. "Thank you, ma'am," the former senator replies. "Yes," she says, "and I hope you'll really fight this time."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John McCaslin

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

Don't tread on me

Virginia senatorial wife Susan Allen and Republican operative Mary Matalin, accompanied by their respective daughters, were asked to leave a birthday celebration for the city of Alexandria on Saturday evening because they were "distracting."

That says a close friend of Mrs. Allen, the wife of Virginia Republican Sen. George Allen, who is seeking re-election to a second term.

"They were asked to leave the public event by Alexandria's Parks and Recreation Department because they were told they were 'distracting,'" the friend states. "That was the exact word [officials] used. Perhaps these Alexandria servants should be reminded that politicking at public, community events is a time-honored, American tradition, not to mention a First Amendment right."

Actually, the two women weren't so much politicking as they were attracting attention while strolling through the waterfront festival, held at Oronoco Bay Park. Frequently mentioned as a possible White House contender in 2008, Mr. Allen faces a formidable challenger in former Navy Secretary Jim Webb, a Republican until he jumped ship and became a Democrat.

Alexandria is known for being a Democratic bastion. The current mayor, vice mayor and council members are all Democrats. In addition, Old Town is home to former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner, a Democrat who has his own eyes on the White House in 2008. Mr. Allen resides in the Mount Vernon section of Fairfax County, just south of Alexandria.

Beyond walking on water, there was little the Alexandria "servants" could do to stop a Potomac River boat captain from showing her loyalty to the Republican candidate by cruising along the waterfront festival with "George Allen for Senate" banners hanging from the port and starboard sides of her boat.

Knows his weeds

A most intriguing e-mail arrived in our mailbox from a Washington public-relations associate, who copied it to every reporter on his media contact list.

The letter reads: "I walk past a marijuana plant on my way to work each day that has found a home just outside the gate of an embassy. I happen to find this a bit funny considering the number of people that walk past it each day.

"Anyway, I'll tell the first reporter to get back to me where the plant is located. I would recommend taking a photo first before asking the embassy any questions."

Inside the Beltway is pleased to announce that we were the first to contact the PR executive, who spoke to us about the marijuana plant on the condition of anonymity.

"It is the Tunisian Embassy at 1515 Massachusetts Avenue," he told us. "But here is the sad thing: they tore it up."

You don't say?

"Don't worry, I took a picture of the plant, and I can send it to you. The plant was much taller and bushier last week."

So do you think somebody harvested the plant? Or do you think it simply got weed-whacked?

"I don't know. There are a lot of weeds growing around there; there's not much upkeep by the embassy."

Hmmm.

"I first noticed the plant a month or two ago. I did a double-take. 'Oh my God,' I said to myself. 'It's a marijuana plant.'"

Then what did you do?

"I kept an eye on it. And it kept growing and growing. It was literally to the left of the gate, growing up out of a crack next to the curb."

Smile, Steny

Inside the Beltway told you last Friday about a pair of candid photographs of House Democratic Whip Rep. Steny H. Hoyer and Maryland Democratic senatorial candidate Kweisi Mfume prominently displayed on the front page of the Michael S. Steele for U.S. Senate Web site.

One photo shows a smiling Mr. Hoyer hamming it up the Republican lieutenant governor during last Tuesday's Independence Day celebration in Bowie.

"Apparently your column item generated a lot of controversy," Steele campaign spokesman Doug Heye called to say over the weekend. "Congressman Hoyer's office just called and asked us to take the photograph down. I told them that I would alert the lieutenant governor to their request and let them know as soon as possible.

"However, I don't see why a harmless photo of two politicians enjoying a moment together can cause such controversy in the Hoyer camp."

Klaus in town

Morton's co-founder Klaus Fritsch, who wrote the book on steak, is paying a visit to the downtown Morton's on Connecticut Avenue tomorrow evening, not Wednesday as reported earlier, to celebrate the release of "Morton's Steak Bible."

Arnold Favored For Re-election (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger holds a wide lead over state Treasurer Phil Angelides, his Democratic re-election challenger who said Friday that, if elected, he would sign a bill to grant marriage licenses to homosexual couples.

Mr. Schwarzenegger, an actor who became governor after a circuslike recall election in 2003, leads Mr. Angelides 44 percent to 37 percent in a statewide poll taken the last week of June. The poll showed 14 percent of voters were undecided, while 5 percent of those surveyed wanted a different candidate.

It is unknown whether marriage will be a defining issue in a race that is four months away, but Mr. Angelides is not shying away from the topic.

"I would sign the marriage-equality bill because I believe if we can get behind people to build a lasting relationship, that is a good thing," Mr. Angelides told reporters at a press conference in San Francisco.

The New York State Court of Appeals last week issued a ruling that said: "Whether such marriages should be recognized is a question to be addressed by the legislature."

California's Democrat-controlled Assembly passed a measure last year that would have legalized same-sex unions. Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican, vetoed the bill, saying the matter should be decided either by voters or by the courts.

Marriage has been a hot topic in California since February 2004, when San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom shocked the nation by allowing 4,200 same-sex couples to "marry." A state court later voided the licenses.

Mr. Newsom said Friday that he is backing Mr. Angelides.

National Democrats, including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, also are supporting Mr. Angelides as he fights for one of the country's most important gubernatorial seats.

"We are all here for the same reason: We think Phil Angelides would be a great governor for California," Mrs. Clinton said Friday in San Francisco after a $1,000-per-plate fundraiser at the St. Regis Hotel.

DOJ_NMG_0039037

The former first lady said Mr. Angelides helped her husband become president in 1992, when Mr. Angelides was the leader of the state Democratic Party.

"He brought passion and commitment to a campaign that was on an uphill side," she said.

Mr. Angelides, who bested state Controller Steve Westly last month after an ugly Democratic primary battle, received his former opponent's endorsement Friday. Mr. Angelides said the race provides "the clearest choice in a generation for Californians: a choice between the Bush-Schwarzenegger agenda of diminished opportunity, and a new agenda."

Others agreed, and promised the Democrat steady help throughout the campaign.

"Phil may not be a bodybuilder but he's a builder of dreams," said Sen. Barbara Boxer, California Democrat, referring to one of Mr. Schwarzenegger's pre-politics careers.

The survey of 900 Californians showing the governor leading the Democrat by seven percentage points was conducted by San Jose State University's Survey and Policy Research Institute. It had a margin of error of four percentage points. In March, Mr. Schwarzenegger held a three-point lead over Mr. Angelides in the same poll.

Pollsters said those surveyed were encouraged by Mr. Schwarzenegger's move to send some National Guard troops to the border as immigration battles heat up in Washington.

The governor has "begun to reclaim the middle-of-the road voters who are crucial to statewide elections," the pollsters said.

However Mr. Schwarzenegger's once high approval rating has not climbed above 50 percent since March. The June poll showed that he has a 43 percent favorable rating.

Politicians Need Not Abandon Religion (USAT)

By Barack Obama

USA Today, July 10, 2006

My faith shapes my values, but applying those values to policymaking must be done with principles that are accessible to all people, religious or not. Even so, those who enter the public square are not required to leave their beliefs at the door.

For some time now, there has been talk among pundits and pollsters that the political divide in this country falls sharply along religious lines. Indeed, the single biggest gap in party affiliation among white Americans today is not between men and women, between red states and blue, but between those who attend church regularly and those who don't.

This gap has long been exploited by conservative leaders such as Jerry Falwell and Pat Robertson, who tell evangelical Christians that Democrats disrespect their values and dislike their church, while suggesting that religious Americans care only about issues such as abortion and gay marriage.

It's a gap that has also been kept open by some liberals, who might try to avoid the conversation about their religious values altogether, fearful of offending anyone and claiming that constitutional principles tie their hands. Some might even dismiss religion in the public square as inherently irrational or intolerant, thinking that the very word "Christian" describes one's political opponents, not people of faith.

And yet, despite all this division, we are united by the fact that Americans are a deeply religious people. Ninety percent of us believe in God, 70% affiliate ourselves with an organized religion, and 38% call ourselves committed Christians.

This is why, if political leaders truly hope to communicate our hopes and values to Americans in a way that's relevant to their own, we cannot abandon the field of religious discourse.

My lesson

I've fallen into this trap myself. During my 2004 Senate race, my opponent said, "Jesus Christ would not vote for Barack Obama." I answered with what has come to be the typically liberal response: that we live in a pluralistic society, and that I can't impose my religious views on another. I said I was running to be the U.S. senator of Illinois, and not the minister of Illinois.

But my opponent's accusations nagged at me, and I knew that my answer didn't address the role my faith has in guiding my values. I, like other progressives, should have realized that when we ignore what it means to be a good Christian or Muslim or Jew, when we discuss religion only in the negative sense of where or how it should not be practiced, when we shy away from religious venues because we think we'll be unwelcome, others will fill the vacuum: those with the most insular views of faith, or those who cynically use religion to justify partisan ends.

Moreover, it's wrong to ask believers to leave their religion at the door before entering the public square. Abraham Lincoln, William Jennings Bryan, Martin Luther King Jr. — indeed, the majority of great reformers in American history — were not only motivated by faith, they also used religious language to argue for their cause. To say men and women should not inject their "personal morality" into policy debates is a practical absurdity; our law is by definition a codification of morality.

If progressives shed some of these biases, we might recognize the overlapping values that both religious and secular people share when it comes to the direction of our country. We might recognize that the call to sacrifice, the need to think in terms of "thou" and not just "I," resonates with all Americans. And we might realize that we have the ability to reach out to the evangelical community and engage millions of religious Americans in the larger project of America's renewal.

But the conservative leaders of the religious right will need to acknowledge a few truths about religion as well.

For one, the separation of church and state in America has preserved not only our democracy but also the robustness of our religious practice. After all, during our founding, it was not the civil libertarians who were the most effective champions of this separation; it was the persecuted religious minorities concerned that any state-sponsored religion might hinder their ability to practice their faith.

Universal values

This separation is critical to our form of government because in the end, democracy demands that the religiously motivated translate their concerns into universal, rather than religion-specific, values. It requires that their proposals be subject to argument, and amenable to reason. If I am opposed to abortion for religious reasons but seek to pass a law banning the practice, I cannot simply point to the teachings of my church. I have to explain why abortion violates some principle that is accessible to people of all faiths, including those with no faith at all.

This might be difficult for those who believe in the inerrancy of the Bible, but in a pluralistic democracy, we have no choice. Politics involves compromise, the art of the possible. But religion does not allow for compromise. To base one's life on such uncompromising commitments may be sublime; to base our policymaking on them would be dangerous.

In the months and years to come, I am hopeful we can bridge these gaps and overcome the prejudices each of us brings to this debate. I believe that Americans want this. No matter how religious they may or may not be, people are tired of seeing faith used as a tool to attack and divide.

Americans are looking for a deeper, fuller conversation about religion in this country. They might not change their positions on certain issues, but they are willing to listen and learn from those who are willing to speak in reasonable terms — those who know of the central and awesome place that God holds in the lives of so many, and who refuse to treat faith as simply another political issue with which to score points.

Barack Obamais a Democratic U.S. senator from Illinois.

The New York Paradox (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

I live and work in New Jersey, but I've always loved the energy and variety of the city that's just an hour's train ride away. So I was happy to read in The New York Times about a New York success story: the surprising resurgence of Manhattan as a site for corporate headquarters.

What's interesting about the corporate return to Manhattan is that it flies in the face of today's conventional wisdom, which says that modern technology is making geography irrelevant. Since work can now be done anywhere, the story goes, jobs move wherever the wages and other costs of doing business are lowest. And this should mean trouble for a high-wage, high-cost location like New York.

But somebody forgot to tell New York about the new rules: in spite of high costs, the city's economy is thriving.

And the report on the headquarters boom suggests that New York may, paradoxically, be doing well precisely because technology has made it possible to move many jobs away from high-cost locations.

During the 1960's and 1970's, New York lost much of its historical role as a headquarters city, as companies moved out to suburban campuses around the country. "But in the last several years," the Times article declares, "New York has regained its magnetic force": there are more than twice as many headquarters and subsidiaries in the city as there were in 1990.

Why are corporations moving back to New York? Manhattan's appeal is obvious: the Big Apple is the best place for top executives to "network face to face with their peers in the hub of the financial, legal and communications industries," as the article puts it. But that's an advantage New York has offered ever since it became America's largest city.

In the past, however, this face-to-face communication came at a high price: in order to keep their top executives in Manhattan, companies also had to pay the rent on large office buildings and fill those buildings with thousands of lower-level employees, paying those employees wages high enough to compensate for New York's high cost of living. Many companies decided that the benefits of a New York headquarters weren't worth the cost.

Now, however, it's possible for many of the people who would formerly have worked at corporate headquarters to work somewhere else instead, communicating with management electronically. And that makes it worthwhile to move top executives back to the center of things.

The same thing may be happening in the financial industry, which these days is New York's principal "export" — that is, New Yorkers sell all sorts of things to each other, but they mainly sell financial services to other Americans and the rest of the world.

If you looked only at the employment numbers, you might think that New York's export base is in trouble. A recent report by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York points out that over the past 30 years, finance-sector employment has been shifting away from New York City toward lower-cost locations, both in the outer parts of the New York metropolitan area and in places like Dallas and San Antonio.

But what seems to be happening is that only relatively low-paid finance jobs are moving out of New York, while highly paid jobs are actually moving in. The Fed study shows that New York's share of U.S. financial industry earnings, as opposed to employment, is actually higher now than it was in 1970. And it's a good guess that financial firms, like corporate headquarters, find it easier to put their top people in New York now that the back-office work can be carried out someplace cheaper.

The story of the New York economy isn't entirely a happy one. The city has essentially lost all of its manufacturing, and it's now in the process of outsourcing both routine office work and many middle-management functions to other parts of the country.

What's left is an urban economy that offers a mix of very highly paid financial jobs and low-wage service jobs, with relatively little in the middle. Economic disparities in New York, as in the United States as a whole, are wider than they have been since the 1920's.

But for once, let me focus on the positive: the world's greatest city, a city that a generation ago seemed to be in irreversible decline, seems to be doing O.K.

Lobbyists, Yes. The People, Maybe. (NYT)

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

The news that the Washington lobbying industry is rapidly extending its tentacles into cities, towns and school districts across the country should be an outright embarrassment to Congress. Elected lawmakers — not high-paid lobbyists — are supposed to be best attuned to meeting the needs of their localities. But not in the booming marketplace called earmarking — the rapid-fire, debate-free amending of budget bills with millions in special-interest boons for favored pleaders. In this case, lobbyists are shopping themselves as gifted middlemen for mayors and school boards. And localities are biting, having seen the sorry evidence that lawmakers tend to deliver earmarks more readily for Beltway lobbyists than for hometown nobodies.

In Florida, 44 public sector clients of one well-connected lobbyist netted $173 million in earmarked projects since 2001. This is a return of better than $18 federal dollars for every local dollar spent on lobbying, according to a report by Jodi Rudoren and Aron Pilhofer of The Times. The founding fathers surely didn't envision such a lucrative warping of the federal-local relationship. But lawmakers do very well by it. They not only deliver tailored pork back home, but they also are rewarded by the circular money game where grateful lobbyists and special interests raise vast sums for the re-election campaigns of cooperative incumbents.

Among the unfinished business as Congress returns is the failure by the two houses to clean up the ethical mess created by the lobbying industry's increasing muscle. One congressman who peddled his influence through earmarks has gone to prison, and criminal investigations of others are under way. Yet a what-me-worry evasiveness remains the strategy of Republican leaders on ethics reform.

Cultivating Waste (WP)

HEART SURGEON Jimmy Frank Howell owns a piece of land that hasn't produced crops in years. The federal government has paid him $490,709 in rice subsidies since 1996. Michael T. Sullivan's family, corn farmers, sold most of their crop last year above a government-set minimum price. He got $292,054 in federal agricultural payments anyway.

We've known for a long time that America's bloated food subsidy programs rile foreign governments, complicate trade talks, distort agricultural prices and disproportionately benefit large agribusinesses. As if that weren't enough, the results of a nine-month Post investigation published last week vividly detail the scandalous waste of America's vast farm subsidy system.

Many American farmers have learned to speculate on foodstuff markets, successfully timing the sale of their crops to coincide with high prices. Yet under the misleadingly named loan deficiency payment (LDP) scheme the Michael Sullivans of the world can claim federal money as long as the market price dips below a government-set minimum price after they harvest their crop. Intended to benefit farmers hitting hard times, the LDP program handed out $3.8 billion more last year than it needed to guarantee its minimum price.

Other federal agricultural subsidies go to individuals who don't even farm. Under a program Congress designed to phase out government subsidies by untying payments from the cultivation of particular crops, Mr. Howell reaps federal dollars from his land as long as he doesn't grow the crops. These "direct payments" to landowners who don't grow any crop have cost the federal government $1.3 billion since 2000. Another thick layer of irony in all of this is that these programs aren't poorly managed. They operate just as Congress passed them.

In short: Federal farm subsidies are wildly misdirected and shamefully unfair to anyone who pays taxes and doesn't get a piece of the billions -- $25 billion in 2005 -- the government drops every year on agricultural payments. Last year the federal government paid $4.3 billion in corn subsidies, up from $1 billion in 1998.

Lots of American entrepreneurs take risks every year and don't expect a government safety net; why are American farmers, especially the larger planters who expertly extract government farm entitlements, any more deserving? The case for cutting farm subsidies isn't just about closing trade deals, though, as we argued last week, successful trade negotiations are vital. It's also about fixing a broken, inequitable system at home.

Too Many Doctors In The House (NYT)

By David C. Goodman

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

Hanover, N.H.

CAN we cure our ailing health care system by sending in more doctors? That is the treatment prescribed by the Association of American Medical Colleges, which has recommended increasing the number of doctors they train by 30 percent, in large part to keep up with the growing number of elderly patients. But the most serious problems facing our health care system — accelerating costs, poor quality of care and the rising ranks of the uninsured — cannot be solved by more doctors. In fact, that approach, like prescribing more drugs for an already overmedicated patient, may only make things worse.

Many studies have demonstrated that quality of care does not rise along with the number of doctors. Compare Miami and Minneapolis, for example. Miami has 40 percent more doctors per capita than Minneapolis has, and 50 percent more specialists, according to The Dartmouth Atlas of Health Care, a study of American health care markets (for which I am an investigator).

The elderly in Miami are subjected to more medical interventions — more echocardiograms and mechanical ventilation in their last six months of life, for example — than elderly patients in Minneapolis are. This also means more hospitalizations, more days in intensive care units, more visits to specialists and more diagnostic tests for the elderly in Miami. It certainly leads to many more doctors employed in Florida. But does this expensive additional medical activity benefit patients?

Apparently not. The elderly in places like Miami do not live longer than those in cities like Minneapolis. According to the Medicare Current Beneficiary Survey, which polls some 12,000 elderly Americans about their health care three times a year, residents of regions with relatively large numbers of doctors are no more satisfied with their care than the elderly who live in places with fewer doctors. And various studies have demonstrated that the essential quality of care in places like Miami — whether you are talking about the treatment of colon cancer, heart attacks or any other specific ailment — is no higher than in cities like Minneapolis.

Studies of individual hospitals have likewise shown that while the doctor-patient ratio varies widely from place to place, more doctors do not mean better care.

The Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., and the University of California, San Francisco, Medical Center each have about one doctor treating every 100 elderly patients with chronic illnesses in their last six months of life. New York University Medical Center has 2.8 doctors for every 100 such patients and the University of California, Los Angeles, Medical Center has 1.7. The elderly patients at N.Y.U. and U.C.L.A., as compared with those at the Mayo Clinic and the San Francisco hospital, see more specialists and are subjected to more imaging tests and other procedures. But the quality of their care, as judged by doctors, is no better.

Using the N.Y.U. doctor-patient ratio as a benchmark for determining the number of physicians that will be needed to care for the over-65 population in the year 2020, we can project a deficit of more than 44,000 doctors nationwide. But if the benchmark is based on the Mayo ratio, we can project an excess of nearly 50,000 doctors in the year 2020.

How can it be that more spending and greater physician effort does not lead to better health or to improvements in patient satisfaction? One explanation may be that when more doctors are around, patients spend more time in hospitals, and hospitals are risky places. More than 100,000 deaths a year are estimated to be caused by medical mishaps.

The association of medical colleges has argued that increasing the doctor supply overall can remedy regional shortages. But in the past 20 years, as the number of doctors per capita grew by more than 50 percent, according to our measurements, most of the new ones settled in areas where the supply was already above average — places like Florida or New York — rather than in regions that lack doctors, like the rural South. Medical training is an expensive business, and it makes little sense to waste additional public dollars to perpetuate doctors' preference to live in affluent places.

By training more doctors than we need, we will continue to fill more hospital beds, order more diagnostic tests — in short, spend more money. But our resources would be better directed toward improving efforts to prevent illness and manage chronic ailments like diabetes and heart disease.

Better coordination of care is also worth investment. Small physician groups in disconnected offices often provide fragmented treatments, while multispecialty practices integrated with hospitals — prevalent in Minneapolis and some other cities — are associated with lower cost and higher quality of care.

All these strategies have been shown to improve patient outcomes without adding physicians. Instead of training more doctors, let's make better use of the ones we already have.

North Korea Crisis Tests China's New Global Role (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

North Korea's barrage of missile tests has put China in a tough spot, calling into question its policy of patient diplomacy and economic support aimed at encouraging change in Pyongyang.

The U.S., saying Beijing's response is a critical test of China's new high-profile role on the international stage, is urging China to alter course and use its considerable leverage as North Korea's most important trading partner to get Pyongyang to return to talks on its nuclear program.

China has long pushed a noninterference line at the United Nations while seeking good relations around the world through a determined policy of not questioning the internal affairs of countries like Sudan or Venezuela where it seeks oil or other raw materials. But Beijing has assumed a pivotal role in international efforts to wean Pyongyang away from nuclear weapons.

It is far from clear, however, whether even North Korea's rocket launches last week -- in the face of vocal Chinese opposition -- will be enough to overcome Beijing's extreme reluctance to use economic pressure as a diplomatic tool, especially against its communist ally.

A draft resolution that would impose some sanctions against North Korea could come up for a vote at the U.N. as soon as today.

U.S. President George W. Bush, speaking in Chicago on Friday, called on the U.N. Security Council to say "loud and clear, here are some red lines." Mr. Bush also touched on the reluctance of China and Russia to support a U.N. sanctions resolution.

"You know, some nations are more comfortable with sanctions than other nations, and part of the issue we face in some of these countries is that they've got economic interests," he said. The U.S., Mr. Bush said, is trying to convince these countries to see that "security-of-the-world interests trump economic interests."

Part of that job has fallen to Christopher Hill, the U.S. State Department's top diplomat for Asia, who met Friday with senior Chinese officials to express Washington's displeasure with North Korea's moves and to call for the resumption of disarmament talks.

Mr. Hill hurried to Beijing -- the first stop on a multiday trip to Asian capitals -- before a planned six-day trip to North Korea by China's vice premier, Hui Liangyu, set to start today.

Chinese officials expressed serious concern that North Korea's missile launches could encourage Japan to develop weapons to defend itself and lead to an arms race that could destabilize Northeast Asia, according to a senior U.S. official in Beijing. But the official said "there was nothing said" by the Chinese "that would indicate" they are ready to use the threat of economic sanctions to pressure Pyongyang.

U.S. officials say North Korea's decision to ignore warnings from China and others about the test firings shows that Beijing's policies aren't working. "I don't think anyone who believes in an engagement policy can take much of a sense of satisfaction in this," said the senior U.S. official in Beijing. "In the life of a nation, there are certain relationships...that it is time to leave behind."

Chinese diplomats at the U.N. have opposed action in the Security Council that would seek to bar North Korea from importing materials and parts that could be used in its weapons programs. Japan circulated a toughened draft resolution to that effect Friday.

China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, indicated that China wasn't pleased with the draft measure, which otherwise has widespread support. "If this resolution is put to a vote, definitely there will be no unity in the Security Council," he said, indicating that China would either veto the measure or abstain from voting.

Japan's foreign minister, Taro Aso, said yesterday that Russia may abstain from a vote, putting even more pressure on China as the sole one of the Security Council's 15 members standing in the way of passing the resolution.

India's test of a missile capable of carrying nuclear warheads yesterday could complicate diplomatic efforts to sanction North Korea, which is likely to complain that Pyongyang is the victim of a double standard.

China has successfully used arm-twisting in the past. In 2003, China temporarily shut down a pipeline carrying oil to North Korea, apparently in an attempt to pressure Pyongyang to participate in multilateral talks on its nuclear programs, U.S. and Asian diplomats have said. North Korea later agreed to join the negotiations.

To prod Beijing to toughen its stance this time, the U.S. has appealed to China's pride, saying it risks diminishing its international standing if it can't use its influence even to moderate the behavior of one of its closest neighbors.

When Mr. Bush last week called his Chinese counterpart, Hu Jintao, he said North Korea's missile tests represented a serious affront not just to the U.S., but also to China, U.S. officials said.

Washington also has said China's ability -- or inability -- to make headway with North Korea will be important in shaping the future of relations between Washington and Beijing. "This is an important time in the U.S.-China relationship," the senior U.S. official said. "If they are successful, it will be considered a sign that China has indeed arrived."

China is North Korea's largest supplier of both food and energy. Two-way trade between the neighbors has grown rapidly, hitting $1.58 billion last year. The vast majority of consumer goods in North Korea's markets are from China. The country's air force can't fly its planes without Chinese jet fuel.

It was business as usual at border-crossing points between China and North Korea Friday, Chinese traders said. Convoys of trucks laden with supplies rumbled over the steel-girder bridge that connects the Chinese city of Dandong with North Korea.

"We don't expect China to take drastic actions. Ties between China and North Korea are too close," said one Chinese businesswoman who handles North Korean imports and exports. Another trader said: "Our North Korean clients are very worried. But we tell them that our trade won't be affected."

For reasons of principle and pragmatism, however, China generally has been loath to use its economic clout to pressure Pyongyang to make concessions. The ideological cornerstone of Chinese foreign policy is that countries shouldn't interfere in one another's internal affairs. Beijing also has a long history of opposition to the use of economic sanctions.

In the case of North Korea, Chinese policy makers fear that too much pressure could cause the collapse of the regime of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il, potentially leading to military conflict, refugee flows and economic dislocation.

On the other hand, bolstering the economy and sustaining Mr. Kim's control are seen as ways to foster a gradual shift to market economics and more openness in North Korea, while maintaining the country as an independent buffer between China and the region's U.S. military allies, South Korea and Japan.

US Looks To China To Influence N. Korea (CSM)

By Robert Marquand

The Christian Science Monitor, July 10, 2006

BEIJING

A message from President Bush to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il will be delivered Monday in Pyongyang - via two Chinese officials. Beijing now meets quarterly with Mr. Kim, the most contact the unpredictable North has with any outside party.

Whether Vice Foreign Minister Wu Dawei and Vice Premier Hui Liangyu will surprise Kim Jong Il and exert real pressure is unclear.

With an international diplomatic effort under way a week after North Korea tested seven missiles, China has proposed informal six-party talks as a way to move the process along.

That is less than the US hoped for from China. But since China insists that it will veto any UN sanctions against the North, the US will accept such talks, according to envoy Christopher Hill.

All told, Beijing would appear key to shaping how the world deals with the defiant Kim. Yet from the moment Kim launched his missiles, China has denied it has clout; it politely insists that the US has the central role.

Since 2003, China has embarked on a historic effort to prop up and aid North Korea - a state it had the frostiest relations with for more a decade. Now, $2 billion in aid gives Beijing unprecedented access - something China is reluctant to squander, to "mix aid and diplomacy," as a Chinese scholar here puts it.

"China's influence on North Korea is more than it is willing to admit, but far less than outsiders tend to believe," says a recent report by the Seoul branch of the International Crisis Group.

To outsiders, it appears that a rising China - running a lifeline of energy and food to its poor comrade - ought to have clout in Korea, as it holds more carrots and sticks than anyone. It seems axiomatic that Beijing can simply apply ancient Chinese wisdom and modern Chinese might to stop Kim's nuclear ambition. Both states are communist, wear green and red uniforms, fought the US together, and share borders and history. China is the only country with easy access, as well as trade and tourism, to the North.

"China does have leverage, but it is afraid it may overplay its hand," says Joseph Cheng, head of the political science department at City University in Hong Kong.

Since Kim Jong Il's July 4 missile shots, voices from Sandy Berger, President Clinton's security adviser, to John Bolton, US ambassador to the UN, have argued that "China is the key" to dealing with North Korean belligerence. It has become nearly a mantra in Washington. Twelve months ago, it was an article of faith in senior White House circles, misplaced or not, that China would deliver a deal with Kim to dismantle his nuclear program. Yet this did not happen.

Instead, with the US preoccupied in Iraq, China embarked on a quiet policy of self-interest: to strengthen North Korea. That policy helps to maintain the North as a "buffer state" between China and South Korea.

China does not want the North to collapse, and for US troops to fill the vacuum and appear on its northeast border. China has hosted Kim, and moved relations away from a bad patch in the 1990s, during the North's epic famine, when China asked for cash payments for food instead of barter.

In the past two years, Chinese officials have told Kim that he can reform his state along socialist lines just as China did. China has indicated it will help with economic aid, while he retains complete political control. To now castigate Kim could wreck that formula, sources say.

In the larger sense, Kim's launch of missiles, most of which could hit long-time nemesis Japan or US bases in East Asia, puts China in the position of choosing between its North Korean comrade and an evolving consensus in the international community. So far, China has tried to please both sides.

"I'm concerned that China isn't recognizing how serious this issue is," says Zhang Liangui, head of foreign studies at the Central Party School in Beijing, in a rare dissent. "China is taking a rigid position. Yet we have long said that if China wants to be viewed as a responsible superpower, it must not be isolated in the international community."

Adding to Beijing's problems is an unresolved ideological struggle in China - where "neo-orthodox" hard-liners who maintain contact with North Korea want China to support its revolutionary posture. There is also genuine puzzlement in Beijing over how to deal with Kim, whose founder-father, Kim Il Sung, reputedly warned him many times that China would attempt to take over his regime one day.

"I hear often that China is the key, which involves a set of policy steps Beijing can take that will bring about the outcome the allies want," says Russell Leigh Moses of People's University. "But I have yet to see anyone show how if China does X, Pyongyang will do Y."

The White House seems to have abandoned its 2003 optimism that China will harness Kim. China may agree that a nuclear peninsula and a regime that test-fires rockets is not desirable. But it isn't clear on how to force Kim to open his highly controlled state and allow international inspectors to flood in, witness his system of gulags, and bring in potentially subversive material - all to dismantle a nuclear program he's cherished for decades. The White House seems to understand this.

Scott Snyder of Stanford University argues the US is using the same strategy that it used with China in closing down Kim's accounts in Macau. China was forced to choose between the international regulatory authority, or North Korean money-laundering behavior.

Sunday, Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns argued on FOX News Sunday that "It's time for China to exert its influence that it does have on North Korea." Also on Sunday programs, US and Japanese officials claimed they might have the votes to support a Japan-backed resolution for sanctions against the North.

U.S., Allies Try To Prod North Korea To The Table (LAT)

By Barbara Demick

The Los Angeles Times, July 10, 2006

SEOUL — U.S. and Asian officials are trying to use the atmosphere of crisis generated by North Korea's missile tests as the impetus for a fresh diplomatic push on the North's weapons, according to participants in meetings here this weekend.

The push came as the North adopted an increasingly defiant tone, saying that U.N. sanctions would be tantamount to war.

Referring to a rare statement attributed directly to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il, his nation's radio on Sunday broadcast an editorial saying that Kim had announced a "heroic position" in which he "promised to answer to an enemy's retaliation with retaliation and to an all-out war with an all-out war."

In an emergency sweep through the region in the wake of the missile launches, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said he was hoping to reconvene six-nation talks on denuclearization that have been stalled since September.

If North Korea boycotts a formal meeting, Hill said, the six countries might meet informally or there might be a meeting of the remaining five — the United States, China, Japan, Russia and South Korea.

"Six is better than five. Five is better than none," said Hill in an interview on Sunday with a small group of Western reporters.

"If they [the North Koreans] want to negotiate, we are prepared to do so within the six-party process," Hill said. "If they are not interested, we will do our best to defend ourselves and secondly to keep them very isolated."

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns blitzed Sunday morning talk shows in the U.S., urging China to step up pressure on North Korea to return to the talks. If Kim remained defiant, Burns warned, Washington and its allies might push as early as this week for the United Nations to impose harsh sanctions.

"We hope that China is going to bring some pressure and influence to bear to convince the North Koreans that they are entirely isolated in the world," Burns said on CBS' "Face the Nation." "The North Koreans have to come back to the six-party talks."

The fresh diplomatic push appears to be principally an effort by China and South Korea, along with the United States, to prevent the missile launches from escalating into a larger confrontation. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called senior Chinese officials Saturday, and Chinese leaders hurriedly sent a delegation to Pyongyang this weekend for talks.

Both China and South Korea are particularly hesitant to go along with a Japanese-led effort before the U.N. to get sanctions enacted against North Korea.

Seoul intends to hold Cabinet-level meetings with North Korea beginning Tuesday in the South Korean port of Busan and will push for the renewed talks.

"We have to turn the dynamic created by the [missile tests] into a force for diplomacy," said South Korea's top nuclear negotiator, Chun Young-woo, after a meeting with Hill on Saturday.

In the days leading up to last week's missile launches, Beijing hastily tried to organize a meeting of the six nations in the Chinese city of Shenyang. A U.S. official, who asked not to be named, said that the Chinese had the impression that North Korea "was signed up" to attend and were surprised when it instead went ahead with the seven missile launches.

The official said that Kim might have been responding to pressure by hard-liners from within his military not to back down from the missile launches.

China's short-term goal is to get North Korea back to the six-party talks, a move that Pyongyang might accept to defuse the international backlash from its missile launches, said Robert J. Einhorn, a former State Department official who negotiated with North Korea on nuclear proliferation issues during the Clinton administration.

"Clearly, China has the leverage. It supplies more than half of North Korea's food and fuel, but China doesn't want to press the North Koreans to the breaking point," he said. "Nonetheless, the Bush administration is right to call on China to do more, because if anyone is to bring North Korea to its senses, it's the Chinese."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said China's decision whether to support strong U.N. sanctions against North Korea was a "defining issue" in Sino-U.S. relations.

"If they continue to vacillate, as they have all last week in the United Nations, then there are consequences in our relationship," McCain said on "Face the Nation."

But some senior Democrats suggested that the U.S. might want to consider bilateral talks with North Korea, a tactic the Bush administration has resisted.

"We need to get away from this idea that diplomacy is a sign of weakness," Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), who serves on the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee, told the same program.

A North Korean diplomat in New York, Han Sung Ryol, said in an interview published in Seoul on Saturday that North Korea would not return to talks until the U.S. released $24 million held in a bank in the Chinese city of Macao that is being audited by the Treasury Department. Hill rejected those demands.

Hill is to meet in Tokyo today with Japanese officials who are leading the drive for tougher economic measures against North Korea.

Going Ballistic (Sort Of) (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh

Newsweek, July 10, 2006

Is Kim Jong Il wacky? No American diplomat has talked to the North Korean dictator for years. But there have been moments when he's appeared quite sane, even sharp-witted. Six years ago the then Secretary of State Madeleine Albright stood next to the diminutive "Dear Leader"—he's about her height—at a stadium in Pyongyang. In front of them thousands of acrobats and dancers performed feats of synchronization that would have made Barnum and Bailey envious. As part of the show, which was intended to impress the visiting Albright with the glories of the North Korean "revolution," a mass of performers held colored placards that showed Kim's Taepodong I missile lifting off in a 1998 test.

"That was the first launch of that missile," Kim said, turning toward Albright. Then, alluding to a 1999 deal with Washington that placed a moratorium on missile tests, he added, "And it will be the last."

But it wasn't. Since then, Washington has refused to sit down with Kim one-on-one (the '99 missile pact was contingent on continuing negotiations). And on July 4, Kim fired off a total of seven test missiles in one night, in his own menacing fireworks display. Kim's show of defiance—even his sometime ally China had warned him not to launch—included a failed test of his new, and not so improved, Taepodong II. The prototype ICBM is supposedly capable of hitting Alaska or other parts of the western United States, but it splashed into the Sea of Japan some 40 seconds after liftoff. Still, North Korea's first nighttime missile test sent a shudder through Asia even as it provoked snickers in Washington, where intelligence officials dismissed the new Taepodong as a fairly primitive weapon.

At a news conference on Friday, President George W. Bush also played down the dangers posed by Kim's missile and nuclear-weapons program. The president has refused to negotiate directly with Pyongyang, unlike his predecessor, Bill Clinton, Albright's boss. Bush reiterated his six-year-old demand that Kim simply give up his weapons program. "I don't know what the man's intentions are," he said.

Some North Korea experts say that Kim has made his intentions fairly clear: he wants to survive. Since Bush hinted early in his first term that he wanted Kim gone, the North Korean leader has signaled wildly that he's too dangerous to be attacked. In February 2005 his regime volunteered that it had nuclear weapons. And with his tests last week, Kim showed that, even if he can't go intercontinental, he can hit South Korea and probably Japan—including U.S. troops stationed there—with warheads if he desires.

Bush has refused to take the bait. On Friday he insisted that Washington would engage in negotiations only alongside other countries, as part of the so-called Six Party Talks including China, South Korea, Japan and Russia. "My concern about handling this issue bilaterally is you run out of options very quickly," the president said. The problem is that Bush is running out of options now. The administration continues to defer to China, the lead negotiator, but it has seemed clear since a September 2005 pact to restart talks that Beijing will not pressure Pyongyang too hard with sanctions. Why? Mainly because the Chinese fear a collapse of the regime that could send millions of refugees streaming over the Sino-Korean border.

Washington, meanwhile, continues to tighten the noose around Kim. Late last year the administration announced it was investigating a Macau bank through which the North Korean leadership allegedly laundered money. The North Koreans angrily refused to come to the table after that, and the stalemate continues. "The president in his press conference said we have to deal with the world as it is," said Wendy Sherman, a former State Department official who accompanied Albright on the 2000 trip. "That's exactly the phrase we used: you have to deal with Kim Jong Il and the regime as it is. But Bush hasn't wanted to." Kim Jong Il, in response, seems to be speaking in the only language he's comfortable with these days—bombs and blastoffs.

The Kim Conundrum (TIME)

By Bill Powell

Time, July 10, 2006

In missile tests, as in most things, practice makes perfect. So while the lone long-range Taepo Dong--2 rocket fired by North Korea last week sputtered, then splashed down into the Sea of Japan less than two minutes after its much publicized, strategically timed July 4 launch, there's little reason to think Kim Jong Il will be dissuaded by failure. With enough plutonium to make six to eight nuclear warheads and a cache of medium-range missiles, Kim is currently a menace to his Asian neighbors. With nukes and a fully functioning intercontinental missile, he can threaten the U.S. too--and the prospect of bullying his greatest nemesis seems simply too delightful for Kim to resist.

For most of President Bush's time in office, North Korea has been merely a pest, one that the President insisted on dealing with exclusively in concert with China, South Korea, Japan and Russia in six-party talks. But since late last summer, when all the parties agreed in principle that North Korea would shut down its nuclear program in exchange for security guarantees, the North has refused to show up for meetings. Now that Kim has ignored warnings--from the U.S., Russia and China--not to test his missile capability and is threatening more tests in the immediate future, the question for the Administration is, What, besides the status quo, are the remaining options for dealing with the world's most unpredictable totalitarian nuclear regime?

A SWIFT AND PRECISE MILITARY STRIKE

LAST MONTH, AS INTELLIGENCE REPORTS SUGGESTED that the Taepo Dong test was imminent, two former Clinton Administration officials, Defense Secretary William Perry and Assistant Secretary of Defense Ashton Carter, opined in the Washington Post that a nuclear North with an intercontinental ballistic missile presented too great a risk for the U.S. to bear. The moment had come, they argued, for a pre-emptive strike against the North Korean launch site. Even if Perry and Carter were speaking in part to a domestic political audience in an attempt to prove before the midterm elections that Democrats can sound tougher than the Bush Administration on national security, their argument is rooted in what's considered a strategic truth about Kim's regime. It is a government that, far from being crazy or irrational, is motivated entirely "by regime survival," says Yun Dukmin, a national-security specialist at Seoul's Institute for Foreign Affairs and National Security.

Viewed through that lens, would Kim really risk war--and the certain end of a dynastic regime begun by his father--in response to a limited air strike aimed at his missile capability? The answer may well be no, but it's also clear that the Bush Administration thinks a pre-emptive strike is still too risky. The North might not currently be able to retaliate against the U.S., but it has huge artillery batteries stationed just across the 38th parallel ready to take aim at Seoul, one of the world's most densely populated cities. Even if Seoul isn't attacked, a U.S. strike would almost certainly fracture the U.S.--South Korean alliance. The population of South Korea overwhelmingly opposes the use of force against the North. Despite the fact that the government of South Korea has little to show for it, polls there suggest people still support the "sunshine" policy, in place since 1998, which amounts to an all-carrots, no-sticks approach to relations with Pyongyang.

Finally, a military strike against North Korea would infuriate China, an emerging superpower with which the Bush Administration has sought stable, cordial relations. Hitting North Korea at the risk of turning China into an outright hostile power isn't a trade anyone in the Administration wants to make.

CONTAIN THE REGIME. THEN SQUEEZE IT

FOR SOME IN THE BUSH ADMINISTRATION, the ideal strategy for dealing with Kim has always been economic and diplomatic strangulation, with the hope that his government will eventually atrophy into collapse or succumb to a coup that might usher in a more amiable--or at least more predictable--leader. That approach is based on the idea that rather than try to negotiate with Kim or take military action against him, the U.S. and its allies are better off keeping him in a box and focusing on preventing him from peddling his arsenal to other rogue actors. Elements of that strategy have been in place for some time and have produced a few notable examples of success.

The post-9/11 Proliferation Security Initiative (PSI), in which the U.S. and its allies concentrate on intercepting weapons of mass destruction, has made Pyongyang a key target because of the government's past sales of missiles to Pakistan and Iran. The big fear is that North Korea could be tempted to sell nuclear material to al-Qaeda, which would have no reluctance about using it. Former Assistant Secretary of State Robert Gallucci says Pyongyang "might figure that selling fissile material to a terrorist group would be relatively safe and profitable."

More than 60 countries now cooperate with Washington's interdiction efforts, and North Korea's record as a serial proliferator makes it a major target. The program was spurred by an incident in December 2002, when a Spanish warship intercepted--and then released--a Cambodian-registered freighter in the Arabian Sea that was manned by North Koreans and was carrying 15 North Korean--made Scud missiles bound for Yemen. At the time, there was no international legal authority for the weapons to be seized. The PSI changed that, and the U.S. insists the program has crimped North Korea's exports of weapons and matÃ©riel in the years since.

The Administration has also had some success in cutting off North Korea's access to the international banking system. For the past year, the Treasury Department has put intense pressure on international banks doing business with North Korea. Last year it helped shut down dozens of accounts at the Macao-based Banco Delta Asia, which was suspected of counterfeiting and laundering money for Pyongyang. Some diplomats in Beijing, in fact, suspect that the financial pressure the U.S. has been applying was the main reason for Pyongyang's defiant missile launch.

But punishment meted out by the U.S.--or by the U.S. and Japan, the partner in the region most willing to isolate the North economically--has a limited impact. China is North Korea's true economic lifeline, and South Korea its second largest trading partner. And last week, despite the missile test, both made it clear that they have little interest in any stringent economic sanctions against the North for the same reason: sanctions might lead to the eventual collapse of Kim's regime. In the view of both countries, collapse equals chaos, with refugees streaming across their borders. Neither wants any part of it. That's why, when asked last Thursday whether China would agree to economic pressure, Jiang Yu, spokeswoman for Beijing's Foreign Ministry, replied only by reiterating support for the six-party talks and restating China's aversion to interfering in the internal affairs of other countries.

Beijing's top North Korean negotiator, Vice Foreign Minister Wu Dawei, heads to Pyongyang this week for talks. He may scold the North Koreans for defying Beijing by launching the missiles and possibly persuade them to try another round of six-party talks. But serious sanctions are unlikely to be on the table. Stability in North Korea is what matters to Chinese President Hu Jintao--even if it's the kind of stability only a jailer could love.

GO BACK TO THE BARGAINING TABLE--FOR REAL

A SENIOR DIPLOMAT IN EAST ASIA PUTS IT bluntly: "If there's no military option and there isn't--and you can't get meaningful sanctions--and you can't--and the six-party talks are exhausted--as they appear to be--what's left?"

One possibility is to return to the six-party talks, but with renewed energy and flexibility. Former diplomat Wendy Sherman, who negotiated at length with North Korea during the Clinton years, gives Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice credit for allowing her deputy, former Ambassador to South Korea Christopher Hill, to talk directly to the North Koreans within the six-party construct. It's just that, in Sherman's judgment, Hill hasn't had enough to talk about. "What it appeared Rice couldn't win was enough for Chris Hill to have in his pocket to make a difference," she says. "If you have nothing to negotiate with, you have nothing."

The President could endow his negotiators with a few concessions, such as agreeing to more one-on-one chats between Washington and the North in the context of the six-party talks, to lure Kim back to the table. But given that Kim has turned his back on multilateral discussions for almost a year, the Bush Administration may have to face the fact that if it wants closure on North Korea, it will have to engage in what Kim has wanted all along: direct talks. The goal of North Korea would presumably be diplomatic recognition and security guarantees from Washington, as well as all sorts of economic goodies like those the U.S. and its European allies are offering Iran as incentives to cease its suspected nuclear-weapons program. In return, Kim would have to agree to stand down on his nuclear program.

The President has always equated Kim's nuclear saber rattling with blackmail, and a face-to-face engagement would seem tantamount to caving in. But when Bush entered the Oval Office, North Korea had two nuclear warheads; now the CIA estimates that Pyongyang has enough plutonium to make as many as eight and is hard at work on the technology that would deliver them to American shores. North Korea is slowly but surely building its nuclear capability, making the world steadily less safe, and it's not clear what anyone can do about it without trying something entirely different. If Kim Jong Il intended to put the pressure back on Washington with his Fourth of July fireworks display, he surely succeeded. [The following descriptive text appears within A diagram] A Growing Threat The bulk of North Korea s arsenal consists of hundreds of short-range missiles that threaten South Korea and Japan. Kim Jong Il is believed to have enough plutonium for six to eight nuclear weapons, but the recent failures show he still lacks a rocket capable of reaching the U.S. for now Worst case Experts fear that North Korea is trying to modify a Taepo Dong-2 missile to carry a lighter warhead as far as the mainland U.S., but that capability is thought to be years away The missile that crashed in two minutes is believed to be a three-stage rocket, though its exact configuration remains unclear. North Korea Initiative Aims At 'five-party' Talks (FT)

By Anna Fifield And Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, July 10, 2006

Efforts are under way to convene "five-party talks" involving North Korea's neighbours and the US as officials search for diplomatic avenues to respond to the Asian country's missile tests last week without further highlighting the divergent views over how to deal with the rogue state.

But China, the host of the talks, and North Korea's closest ally, is understood to be unwilling to hold a meeting without Kim Jong-il's representatives, posing another challenge to presenting a united front in condemning the tests.

"We think there ought to be six-party talks – six is better than five but five is better than none," Christopher Hill, Washington's top delegate to the talks, said after meeting senior South Korean officials on Sunday.

"We need the six-party process regardless of whether we get all six parties to come to it," said Mr Hill, who is visiting Beijing, Seoul, Tokyo and Moscow to try to unite the five engaged players.

After reaching what appeared to be a breakthrough agreement in September last year, the talks aimed at trying to persuade North Korea to dismantle its nuclear weapons programme have stagnated as Pyongyang refuses to return to the negotiating table while Washington continues its freeze on its bank accounts in Macau.

Before the missile test, China proposed convening an informal six-way meeting in the north-eastern city of Shenyang, near the border with North Korea, to try to overcome the current deadlock.

All six parties are understood to have had agreed to the idea a few days before the missile tests.

"The question now is, do we try to go ahead with this?" asked one person involved in the process. "China wants to go ahead with the six-party talks and the rest of us are prepared to do it even without the North Koreans. This is not a time to let the North Koreans hold up the train."

The US and Japan are struggling to win support for their plan to impose sanctions on North Korea's weapons programme through the United Nations, with China, a permanent Security Council member, warning it will not support the move.

Wu Dawei, Beijing's chief nuclear negotiator, and Hui Liangyu, a vice-premier, are due to travel to Pyongyang today to discuss the tests. "I hope they are not too polite because I think their politeness has not got them very far," said one US official.

The US is “counting on” Russia and China to use their influence with North Korea to reignite negotiations, Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state said yesterday on CNN. He indicated the US had not yet heard “the last word” from either country on whether they would veto a UN resolution imposing sanctions.

“When we get results of this Chinese delegation to Pyong-yang, I think you will then see us move ahead in New York at the Security Council,” he said. “We hope that China and Russia are going to support this resolution.”

South Korean officials told Mr Hill they would talk tough on Tuesday when they meet their Northern counterparts in a pre-arranged ministerial meeting but said they did not yet have enough evidence that sanctions would be effective to be able to support them.

On the diplomatic front, however, South Korea’s chief negotiator in the talks had a similar message. Chun Yung-woo told the Financial Times: “But if North Korea continues to boycott the six-party talks, then it would be better to have five-party talks rather than no talks at all.”

After reaching a “breakthrough” agreement in September, the talks aimed at trying to persuade North Korea to relinquish its nuclear ambitions have stalled.

U.S. Wants North Korea To Return To Talks (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea, July 9 — The top American negotiator with North Korea said Sunday that his first priority was to get that country back to the negotiating table, signaling that the United States was seeking a diplomatic solution instead of punitive economic sanctions against it for launching seven missiles last week.

The negotiator, Christopher R. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, said his talks with South Korean officials here over the weekend focused on kick-starting the six-nation talks over the North's nuclear program. The talks have been deadlocked since last September.

"My mission here is not to get sanctions," Mr. Hill told reporters before meeting South Korean officials on Sunday morning. "My mission here is to make sure we can all speak with one voice to deal with this provocative action by the North Koreans."

In an interview earlier Sunday, he repeated a rejection of North Korea's demands for bilateral talks with the United States. He said he was ready to meet with North Korean officials on the sidelines of six-nation talks, as he had done previously.

"I don't know how many more million times they want to hear from us that the six-party talks are how we plan to proceed with this problem," he said.

The United States has tried to rally support for a United Nations Security Council resolution drafted by Japan that would impose sanctions on North Korea for its missile launchings. But China and Russia, two veto-wielding permanent members of the Security Council, said they preferred a less forceful, nonbinding statement with no threat of punishment.

South Korea, which is not a member of the Security Council, has also strongly indicated that it opposes the Security Council resolution. The resolution will probably be put to a vote early this week.

Mr. Hill said he had not emphasized the issue of United Nations sanctions with Chinese officials in Beijing, his first stop on a whirlwind tour of China, South Korea, Japan and Russia, the countries involved in the six-nation talks along with the United States and North Korea.

"The U.N. discussions are on a different track and involve different people, and they're kind of ongoing, so I did not try to inject myself in the U.N. issue," he said.

Over the weekend, Mr. Hill also restated the United States' position that it would not lift a crackdown on banks dealing with the North Korea and its businesses, a precondition North Korea has set for returning to the talks.

Other than the United States, only Japan, among the other countries in the six-nation talks, has forcefully come out in favor of a Security Council resolution leading to sanctions.

In television appearances in Japan on Sunday morning, Foreign Minister Taro Aso said his government would not compromise on the draft resolution and was pressing for a vote on Monday.

"To compromise because of one country that has veto power, even though most other countries support us, sends the wrong message," Mr. Aso said, singling out China. "We can't alter our stance."

Under Secretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said Sunday on the NBC News program "Meet the Press" that the United States probably had sufficient support in the Security Council to impose sanctions on North Korea, but he again urged China to apply pressure on its neighbor.

"We think we've got the votes to pass that," he said, referring to the resolution drafted by Japan.

Mr. Burns said on CNN's "Late Edition" that "I don't think we've heard the last word" from either China and Russia on the resolution, and that intensive diplomacy was continuing.

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, said on the CBS News program "Face the Nation" that if China wavered in its support for the American stance, there should be "consequences in our relationship."

But Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, a senior Democratic member of the Foreign Relations Committee, disagreed. "China's not our enemy on this," he said, also on "Face the Nation." "They don't want an arms race in that part of the world any more than we do." He said bilateral talks with North Korea might be necessary.

Senator Richard G. Lugar, Republican of Indiana, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, warned Sunday that if North Korea sold nuclear materials to terrorist groups, an American military attack on North Korea would probably be "heavily considered." He said on the ABC News program "This Week" that if Japan felt sufficiently threatened, it might pursue its own nuclear arsenal, which he said would be "very dangerous."

In South Korea, Mr. Hill, after meeting with Song Min Soon, the security adviser to President Roh Moo Hyun, told reporters that he had doubts about the effectiveness of sanctions in solving the problem.

Choo Kyu Ho, the spokesman for the South Korean Foreign Ministry, said the South Korean government "won't go fully in hand with Japan, which is leading this movement," and added, "In the end, we expect China to veto it."

He said South Korea would make the missile tests the focus of ministerial talks next week between the Koreas in South Korea.

Despite drawing worldwide condemnation for firing seven missiles, including the new long-range Taepodong 2, North Korea vowed Sunday to respond "to an all-out war with an all-out war."

North Korea's leader, Kim Jong Il, said that "even a small concession wouldn't be made to the sworn enemy U.S. imperialistic aggressors," the Korean Central Broadcasting Station, said in a report monitored here by Yonhap, a South Korean news agency.

U.S. Rejects North Korean Bid To End Bank Freeze (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea -- The U.S. is holding the line on a freeze of North Korean funds in a Macau bank, rebuffing Pyongyang's latest effort to link diplomatic talks on its nuclear-weapons program with a probe of its financial activities by U.S. and Chinese authorities.

North Korea's deputy ambassador to the United Nations was quoted in a Seoul newspaper as saying Pyongyang wouldn't rejoin six-party talks on its weapons program until the U.S. takes steps to lift a freeze of about $24 million in North Korean funds in a bank in Macau, a special administrative region of China.

The Macau government froze the accounts after the U.S. blacklisted the bank, Banco Delta Asia, for allegedly assisting the North Koreans in currency counterfeiting and money laundering. North Korea has boycotted the talks since November, two months after the six countries reached an agreement for North Korea to give up nuclear-weapons development in return for a nonaggression promise from the U.S. and more financial aid.

Han Song Ryol, North Korea's deputy ambassador to the U.N., said Pyongyang wants access to its money in the Macau bank as a "minimum condition" for returning to the nuclear talks. He made the remarks in an interview published Saturday by the newspaper Hankyoreh.

The chief U.S. diplomat to Asia said North Korea should return to negotiations without conditions and again sharply criticized a series of missile tests Pyongyang conducted last Wednesday, which included the launch of a malfunctioning intercontinental ballistic missile that could reach U.S. territory.

"To change the subject from this rather reckless [missile] activity on their part back to an issue of illicit activities, which I would argue are also reckless, is simply not appropriate," Christopher Hill, U.S. assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, said Saturday after meeting with South Korean diplomats following the missile launches.

North Korea appears to associate the weapons discussion with the bank investigation because the U.S. blacklisted the Macau bank days after the six-way talks -- among North Korea and South Korea, Japan, China, Russia and the U.S. -- produced the tentative accord in September.

Since North Korea fired seven test missiles last week, the U.S. and Japan have called for more economic sanctions. South Korea and China, which have a bigger economic and political stake in the North, condemned the military testing but are resistant to economic pressure. China suggested holding talks on an informal basis, a step the U.S. and South Korea said they are willing to take.

S. Korea Plays It Cool After Tests (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, July 10, 2006

SEOUL — When Kang Hyuk Jin saw the front-page newspaper headlines about North Korean missile tests last week, the 25-year-old college student reacted swiftly: He turned the page and started reading about something else.

"It's the problem of the government and some old guys," he says.

Kang's reaction is typical in the South Korean capital, especially among young people. The news has been greeted with a shrug, never mind that Seoul sits within range of North Korean artillery and rockets. The attitude in South Korea is in sharp contrast to the alarm with which the missile tests were viewed in Tokyo and Washington.

On Sunday, the administration of South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun even issued a statement criticizing Japan for what it said was an overreaction to the missile tests.

"There is no reason to fuss over this … like Japan, but every reason to do the opposite," said the statement from the office of Roh's spokesman. Japan has joined the United States in pushing for sanctions against North Korea in the United Nations Security Council.

South Korea's attitude has made it even harder for U.S. policymakers to forge a coalition committed to punishing North Korea. China and Russia, traditional North Korean allies, have opposed harsh sanctions.

As a diplomatic crisis raged Sunday, the most-read story on the website of the Chosun Ilbo daily was headlined "From Golf to Laptops, Asian Designs Stay Hot."

Some South Korean TV viewers were dismayed Wednesday when an early-morning broadcast of a World Cup soccer match was interrupted by news of the North Korean missile launches. "They were annoyed," says Kim Eui Young, a political scientist at Kyung Hee University in Seoul. "It was a serious matter: Missiles were flying over us, and we were just watching TV."

Behind the nonchalance toward North Korean brinkmanship is a change in South Korean political attitudes over the past several years.

Fading away is the older generation defined by the 1950-53 Korean War, grateful to the United States for repelling a North Korean invasion and hostile toward the Stalinist regime in Pyongyang.

Taking their elders' place in positions of authority are members of what is known here as the "386 Generation": people in their late 30s who attended college and fought to bring democracy to South Korea in the '80s and who were born in the '60s. They are suspicious of U.S. motives and eager to ease North-South tensions, which until the mid-'80s had been exploited by South Korean military governments to repress dissent. Their aspirations are reflected in the "Sunshine Policy" of reconciliation with the North, put in place by former South Korean president (and Nobel Peace Prize winner) Kim Dae Jung and continued by his successor, Roh.

Roh rode to the presidency in 2002 on a wave of anti-Americanism provoked by a wide array of grievances, from public outrage over a South Korean speedskater's controversial gold-medal loss to an American in the Winter Olympics, to an accident in which two South Korean schoolgirls were crushed by a U.S. military vehicle.

Many South Koreans are offended by President Bush's opposition to the Sunshine Policy and his words of contempt for North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il. "Bush criticisms of Kim Jong Il are taken personally, the way a family member might react if an outsider criticizes his deadbeat uncle," says Korea specialist Scott Snyder at the Asia Foundation. "Everyone knows it's true, but it is an insult for an outsider to say it."

Only 20% of South Koreans surveyed last year by the newspaper JoongAng Ilbo and the East Asia Institute said they trusted the United States, compared with 44% who expressed distrust.

In office, Roh's government has provided nearly unconditional aid to the impoverished North and has discouraged criticism of North Korea's appalling human rights record and the policies that led to the death by starvation of 2 million to 3 million North Koreans in the 1990s. "The government is not very interested in human rights issues," opposition legislator Song Young Sun says. "The Roh Moo Hyun government is not paying any attention."

"The South Korean government is hypnotized, paralyzed, numbed," says activist Moon Gook Han, who has organized North Korean defections at foreign consulates in China. "Imagine if even 100 South Koreans died of starvation. The government would collapse, and there would be reforms."

Attitudes could be shifting again. Political scientist Kim of Kyung Hee University says the missile tests will end up being a "catalyst" for rethinking conciliatory policies — policies that haven't moderated North Korea's behavior or been reciprocated at all. "After several years of Sunshine Policy, we aren't getting any return," says college student Jung Hwan Wook, 24. "We should change."

Roh's approval rating last month had already hit a rock-bottom 18%, according to a poll by the Korea Society Opinion Institute. Meanwhile, the percentage of South Koreans who support U.S. policy toward North Korea has risen to 37% from 30% in 2004 and 20% in 2002, and support for increased aid to the North has narrowed to 54% from 59% in 2004, according to a poll released in May by the Korean Social Science Data Center and the Hankyoreh newspaper.

South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon took the unusual step last month of gently criticizing North Korea before the U.N. Human Rights Council.

"In the end," says Norbert Vollertsen, a German doctor who became a human rights activist and a critic of the Kim Jong Il regime after working as a medical volunteer in North Korea, "the South Koreans will wake up."

Washington, Seoul Face A Thorny Issue (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Despite North Korea's missile tests, talks between South Korea and the U.S. on a free-trade agreement resumed in Seoul Monday. One sensitive issue: South Korea wants the pact to cover goods originating at its joint-venture Kaesong industrial complex in North Korea.

The joint venture, launched in 2003 and located just north of the demilitarized zone that divides the Korean peninsula, combines South Korean capital with North Korean labor. It employs about 7,000 North Koreans who produce goods such as appliances and plastic containers for cosmetics. While the value of goods made at the venture is small, representing about one-third of the $1 billion in annual trade between North and South Korea, its potential is big. By the time the complex is in full operation in 2012, it could employ more than 750,000 North Koreans.

Kaesong illustrates a fundamental difference between the U.S. and South Korea. The U.S. sees North Korea as a threat to global stability and is seeking ways to force the country to abandon its nuclear ambitions. But South Korea sees a potentially peaceful neighbor and is looking for ways to promote dialogue and spread capitalism, with reunification the ultimate aim.

"It's a long-term goal that we'd like to achieve during...negotiations," says Ahn Chong Ghee, economic counselor at South Korea's embassy in Washington. Mr. Ahn says North Korea's missile testing hadn't damped the South's eagerness to include Kaesong in any pact.

Mr. Ahn says South Korea is aware of political difficulties the initiative faces in the U.S. but stressed Kaesong's importance. "This could be a symbol of reconciliation between North Korea and South Korea," he says. "That's why we are doing this." South Korean diplomats say the project is exposing North Korean workers to market economics and suggest that including it in a free-trade pact could encourage changes in the North.

The free-trade accord would be the U.S.'s largest pact since the North American Free Trade Agreement passed Congress more than a decade ago. Annual trade between the U.S. and Korea stands at $70 billion, and a business coalition including U.S. auto makers, financial-services firms and drug manufacturers sees important market-access gains to be had. In South Korea, there is concern about protecting domestic rice farmers from U.S. competition, but Seoul also hopes a trade pact would solidify the country's role as an Asian economic hub, giving Korean producers an edge over Asian rivals in access to the U.S. market.

Amid global tensions over North Korea, the Kaesong proposal will be difficult for the White House to swallow and would almost certainly be a deal killer if the trade pact reaches Congress.

The Kaesong proposal would puncture economic sanctions imposed by the U.S. on North Korea and runs counter to the White House's strategy of isolating North Korea. It would almost certainly force a larger debate on Capitol Hill, shifting attention from improved trade ties with Seoul to North Korea's nuclear ambitions and its record of labor and human-rights abuses.

The U.S. and South Korea hope to agree on the trade deal by year's end, so it could go to Congress before President Bush's authority to negotiate trade pacts expires at midyear 2007. Under that authority, Congress can vote "yes" or "no" on trade pacts but can't alter them. Even before the missile test, U.S. officials were leery of making an overture toward North Korea, insisting that any trade pact simply be "an agreement between our two countries," as a spokesman for the office of U.S. Trade Representative put it.

The Kaesong proposal illustrates the strains on Mr. Bush's trade policy. With global talks going nowhere, the U.S. is rushing to enact bilateral deals aimed at opening targeted markets for U.S. goods and services. It is negotiating with 11 nations, and three deals -- with Oman, Peru and Colombia -- are pending on Capitol Hill. But even the smaller deals face hurdles. Pacts with Peru and Colombia, for instance, are clouded by concerns about labor-rights protections.

The Korea negotiations are part of a U.S. strategy to build closer ties in Asia outside China. Free-trade talks are under way with Thailand and Malaysia, and the U.S., as part of Vietnam's planned entry into the World Trade Organization, is pushing Congress to overturn Cold War-era economic sanctions.

Even without Kaesong, a fight over the South Korea pact likely looms on Capitol Hill. American textile producers are worried about increased competition, and the AFL-CIO has expressed "grave concerns" about labor rights. Adding Kaesong "has the potential to sink" any deal, inviting the pact to be debated on geopolitical grounds, warns Montana Sen. Max Baucus, the top-ranking Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee.

The End Of Cowboy Diplomacy (TIME)

By Mike Allen And Romesh Ratnesar

Time, July 17, 2006

The dress code at George W. Bush's White House is cuff-linked and starch collared, reflecting the temper of a President with a reputation for no-nonsense, alpha-male decisiveness. That's why the 200 guests gathered at the White House on Independence Day were surprised to learn that Bush had decided to rip up protocol. It was an early 60th-birthday party for the President, attended by former classmates from first grade to Yale, and Bush was in high spirits. He waved to supporters on the South Lawn who had assembled to watch fireworks. They serenaded him with a hurried rendition of Happy Birthday. But instead of the usual starch, he wore a red-and-white Hawaiian shirt for the occasion.

Six years into his presidency, Bush can't be blamed for wanting a change. All the good feeling at the White House on July 4 couldn't hide the fact that he finds himself in a world of hurt. A grinding and unpopular war in Iraq, a growing insurgency in Afghanistan, an impasse over Iran's nuclear ambitions, a brewing war between Israel and the Palestinians--the litany of global crises would test the fortitude of any President, let alone a second-termer with an approval rating mired in Warren Harding territory. And there's no relief in sight. On the very day that Bush celebrated 60, North Korea's regime, already believed to possess material for a clutch of nuclear weapons, test-launched seven missiles, including one designed to reach the U.S. Even more surprising than the test (it failed less than two minutes after launch) was Bush's response to it. Long gone were the zero-tolerance warnings that peppered his speeches four years ago, when he made North Korea a charter member of the "axis of evil" club and declared at West Point that "the only path of safety is the path of action." Instead, Bush pledged to "make sure we work with our friends and allies ... to continue to send a unified message" to Pyongyang. In a press conference following the missile test, he referred to diplomacy half a dozen times.

The shift under way in Bush's foreign policy is bigger and more seismic than a change of wardrobe or a modulation of tone. Bush came to office pledging to focus on domestic issues and pursue a "humble" foreign policy that would avoid the entanglements of the Bill Clinton years. After Sept. 11, however, the Bush team embarked on a different path, outlining a muscular, idealistic and unilateralist vision of American power and how to use it. He aimed to lay the foundation for a grand strategy to fight Islamic terrorists and rogue states by spreading democracy around the world and pre-empting gathering threats before they materialize. And the U.S. wasn't willing to wait for others to help. The approach fit with Bush's personal style, his self-professed proclivity to dispense with the nuances of geopolitics and go with his gut. "The Bush Doctrine is actually being defined by action, as opposed to by words," Bush told Tom Brokaw aboard Air Force One in 2003.

But in the span of four years, the Administration has been forced to rethink the doctrine with which it hoped to remake the world as the strategy's ineffectiveness is exposed by the very policies it prescribed. The swaggering Commander in Chief who embodied the doctrine's aspirations has modulated himself too. At a press conference with British Prime Minister Tony Blair in May, Bush swore off the Wild West rhetoric of getting enemies "dead or alive," conceding that "in certain parts of the world, it was misinterpreted." Bush's response to the North Korean missile test was equally revealing. Under the old Bush Doctrine, defiance by a dictator like Kim Jong Il would have merited threats of punitive U.S. action--or at least a tongue lashing. Instead, the Administration has mainly been talking up multilateralism and downplaying Pyongyang's provocation. As much as anything, it's confirmation of what Princeton political scientist Gary J. Bass calls "doctrinal flameout." Put another way: cowboy diplomacy, RIP.

So what happened? The most obvious answer is that the Bush Doctrine foundered in the principal place the U.S. tried to apply it. Though no one in the White House openly questions Bush's decision to go to war in Iraq, some aides now acknowledge that it has come at a steep cost in military resources, public support and credibility abroad. The Administration is paying the bill every day as it tries to cope with other crises. Pursuing the forward-leaning foreign policy envisioned in the Bush Doctrine is nearly impossible at a time when the U.S. is trying to figure out how to extricate itself from Iraq. Around the world, both the U.S.'s friends and its adversaries are taking note--and in many cases, taking advantage--of the strains on the superpower. If the toppling of Saddam Hussein marked the high-water mark of U.S. hegemony, the past three years have witnessed a steady erosion in Washington's ability to bend the world to its will.

Despite appearances, the White House insists that Bush's goals have not changed. "The President has always stressed that different circumstances warrant different responses," says White House counselor Dan Bartlett. "The impression that the doctrine of pre-emption was the only guiding foreign policy light is not true. Iraq was a unique circumstance in history, and the sense of urgency on certain decisions in the early part of the first term was reflective of a nation that had to take decisive action after being attacked."

Nonetheless, a strategic makeover is evident in the ascendancy of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who has tried to repair the Administration's relations with allies and has persuaded Bush to join multilateral negotiations aimed at defusing the standoffs with North Korea and Iran. By training and temperament, Rice is a foreign policy realist, less inclined to the moralizing approach of the neoconservatives who dominated Bush's War Cabinet in the first term. Her push for pragmatism has rubbed off on hawks like Vice President Dick Cheney, the primary intellectual force behind Bush's post-9/11 policies. "There's a move, even by Cheney, toward the Kissingerian approach of focusing entirely on vital interests," says a presidential adviser. "It's a more focused foreign policy that is driven by realism and less by ideology."

To much of the world, that's a relief. But having expended so much energy and so many resources on al-Qaeda and the war in Iraq, the Administration is finding that other global challenges--from the turmoil in the Middle East to the genocide in Sudan to the regional ambitions of China--have grown beyond its ability to do anything about them. "It's difficult to think of many other times and many other presidencies when so many dangerous events were happening at once," says Wendy Sherman, a State Department official under President Clinton. "But there's so much going on in every global hot spot because the Bush Administration really opened up Pandora's box with little-to-no plans to support their actions." At the same time, there is a danger that Bush's belated embrace of conventional diplomacy will turn out to be a cover for disengagement, at a time when U.S. leadership is still required to fend off civil war in Iraq and deter the ambitions of Iran and North Korea--to say nothing of al-Qaeda. We are witnessing an overhaul of the old Bush Doctrine, but the question is, Can the U.S. find a new one to take its place?

â€¢THE IRAQ EFFECT

It may be too soon to say whether history will look kindly on the U.S.'s decision to invade Iraq, as Bush and his aides insist will happen. But the very fact that parts of Iraq remain on the edge of chaos after three years of fighting and the deaths of more than 2,500 Americans are incontrovertible evidence of how the Administration's miscalculations have come back to haunt it. Toppling Saddam was to be the singular demonstration of the Bush Doctrine, a quick and decisive strike against tyranny in the heart of the Middle East. It would also send a message to the rest of the world's malefactors, including Iran and North Korea, to think twice about testing the U.S.'s patience with regimes bent on acquiring weapons of mass destruction.

As it turns out, Iraq may prove to be not only the first but also the last laboratory for preventive war. Instead of deterring the rulers in Tehran and Pyongyang, the travails of the U.S. occupation may have emboldened those regimes in their quest to obtain nuclear weapons while constraining the U.S. military's ability to deter them. "We put three countries on notice--Iraq, Iran and North Korea--and we attacked one of them pre-emptively," says retired Marine Corps General Joseph Hoar, who commanded the U.S. Central Command from 1991 to '94. "Now we find that was a put-up job. Meanwhile, North Korea and Iran have chosen different routes than what we wanted them to take."

Fighting the insurgency in Iraq has eroded the appeal of the Bush Doctrine in a more mundane but no less significant way: it's exhausting. Public backing for the war rose slightly after the killing of terrorist leader Abu Mousab al-Zarqawi in Iraq last month, but the unremitting body count has pushed those numbers back down again. More than half the public believes going to war was not worth the cost. The drain on U.S. resources is becoming embarrassing. According to the Associated Press, the diversion of money for Iraq is partly responsible for a shortfall in an Army fund that has left one base, Fort Bragg, unable to buy office supplies. Another base, Fort Sam Houston, has received utility disconnection notices.

There is another cost, and that is the drain of brainpower and psychic energy in the Administration, from the President on down. Governments habitually overestimate what they can achieve and underestimate how much of their working day they have to spend on the really tricky issue at hand. Bush's aides say he and they can multitask--"We can walk and chew gum at the same time," says one--but the ceaseless need to make a bad situation passable is a drag on the entire enterprise. "If Iraq gets better, everything gets better," a White House official says. "If Iraq doesn't get better, there's no hope."

â€¢TWILIGHT OF IDEALISM

If the grind of the war in Iraq has undermined one plank of the Bush Doctrine--pre-emption--the complexity of global politics has caused the U.S. to struggle in its goal to spread democracy as a defense against terrorism. Some democracy activists give Bush credit for giving a jump start to limited reforms in closed Arab regimes such as Saudi Arabia. But the White House was premature, at best, in its hopes for dramatic change. In Egypt, which the Administration has praised in the past for opening its political process, the government of Hosni Mubarak has launched a renewed crackdown against its political opponents. Lebanon, another onetime success story championed by Bush, has witnessed an unraveling of the coalition of parties that led to Syria's withdrawal from the country last spring.

Among ordinary Muslims, outrage at the bloodshed in Iraq and the excesses of the Administration's campaign against al-Qaeda--in particular, reported abuses at Abu Ghraib and GuantÃ¡namo Bay prisons--has strengthened the appeal of Islamists opposed to the West. As a result, elections are producing governments more hospitable to extremism, not less. Exhibit A was the election of Hamas, a group the U.S. and Europe classify as a terrorist organization, to run the Palestinian Authority. In response to Hamas' victory, the U.S. has led an international ban on aid to the democratically elected Palestinian government.

That reflects a broader dimming of the Administration's commitment to the ideals of its once proactive freedom agenda. Despite occasional jawboning, the U.S. has put only token pressure on Russia and China to improve their records on civil liberties and human rights, which have grown worse on Bush's watch. A senior Administration official tells TIME that the White House wants to set up new systems that will use efforts at democracy building as a condition for foreign aid and as a criterion for judging the work of U.S. ambassadors. But some officials inside the White House admit that the Administration's attention appears sporadic, limited to calling for elections but then failing to follow through on the tougher, more costly and less glamorous work of building institutions that can sustain democracies. Michael O'Hanlon, a senior foreign policy fellow at the Brookings Institution, says, "The Administration's top-down approach of assuming that elections will solve problems has been too simplistic. You also need educational institutions and economic development."

â€¢THE LIMITS OF POWER

To accomplish those goals of democracy building, you need help. The biggest illusion of the Bush Doctrine was the idea that the U.S. could carry out a strategy as ambitious as reshaping the Middle East and changing unfriendly regimes without a degree of international legitimacy and cooperation to back it up. Though the Administration sought broad international assistance in Afghanistan, it largely shunned it in Iraq. As a result, while NATO forces are now relieving U.S. troops of some of the combat burden for fighting the Taliban in southern Afghanistan, Americans continue to fight and die alone (with some backup from Iraqi troops) against the Sunni insurgents in western Iraq.

The practical costs of the last plank of the Bush Doctrine--unilateralism--may have finally persuaded the Administration to jettison that too. This move is being led by Rice, who is emerging as Bush's most visible and intimate adviser. "The President is more willing to listen to arguments in favor of utilizing diplomacy as a tool to fight radical Islam when it comes from her, because he trusts her totally," says a presidential adviser. Rice appears to have won some internal arguments--such as getting Bush to offer conditional direct talks to Iran and calling for the closure of Gitmo--but she has yet to pull off any major diplomatic breakthrough that could burnish the Bush legacy. And neoconservative allies of Bush blast Rice for pursuing diplomacy for its own sake. "When you are bereft of options, you pursue process and call it progress," says Danielle Pletka, a vice president of the American Enterprise Institute.

Since joining multilateral talks over Iran and North Korea, the U.S. has failed to persuade Russia and China, who wield veto power in the U.N. Security Council, to agree to specific sanctions against either Tehran or Pyongyang. The gap between the U.S.'s priorities and the rest of the world's stretches beyond those two challenges. The war on terrorism has provided a neat ideological framework for U.S foreign policy in the Bush years, but it has distracted the attention of the U.S. from developments in other areas--Asia, Russia and its former satellites, and Latin America--where new international systems are being built without the U.S. as their builder. For most outside the U.S., the threat of suicide bombings is a less pressing concern than issues like health care, education, job security and the environment. The longer the U.S. bases its foreign policy around the single-minded pursuit of Islamic terrorists, the less influence it is likely to have.

Can the Bush Administration recover all it has lost? Much depends on the temper and commitment of the President himself. "He can juggle all the balls and still let his hair down," says Charlie Younger, an orthopedic surgeon from Midland, Texas, and longtime friend, who spent three nights at the White House this month. "He's an eternal optimist."

But global leadership can't be based on optimism alone. And true diplomacy means more than repeating the word itself. Despite the crises facing him, Bush still has options, though they are ones he hasn't yet shown a willingness to use. Until recently, Bush failed to acknowledge how much Iraq has eroded U.S. credibility or show that he takes seriously the criticisms lodged against his policies by the U.S.'s allies. Iraq may turn out to be a peaceful and thriving democracy, but Bush himself concedes he doesn't foresee that happening before he leaves the stage 30 months from now. If Bush hopes to salvage a more popular, less contested legacy, he needs to commit himself to something big and attainable beyond Iraq--a strategic rapprochement with Iran, perhaps, or a Marshall Plan for African development--and bring allies on board for the ride. Of course, the longing for a foreign policy legacy is common to all lame-duck Presidents; more often than not, such quests have ended in disappointment. Bush may still be able to avoid that fate, but he's running out of time.

The U.N. Sideshow On Korea (NYT)

The United Nations Security Council certainly should register international condemnation of last week's North Korean missile launches. But if any serious progress is going to be made on this and the related North Korean nuclear issue, it will not be through Security Council resolutions or sanctions.

There are only three countries with any real leverage — the United States, China and South Korea — and none are doing all they could to nudge North Korea onto a less provocative course. Until they do, Security Council resolutions will remain a largely symbolic sideshow.

Last week's missile launches instantly complicated the security picture in Northeast Asia, but they violated no international law or treaty that would clearly justify mandatory penalties from the Security Council. (India tested a long-range nuclear-capable missile just yesterday.) Individual nations, particularly the three most influential ones, would do better to devise short-term penalties and longer-term incentives to persuade North Korea to forswear nuclear weapons and longer-range missiles.

The Bush administration should drop its reflexive opposition to direct talks. But before scheduling a meeting, Washington should call on North Korea to reinstate its moratorium on long-range missile tests and keep it in place for at least one year while talks on a permanent ban proceed.

Those direct talks should also include discussions on North Korea's nuclear weapons programs. Nearly a year ago, North Korea agreed in principle to give these up as part of an agreement with the United States, China, Russia, Japan and South Korea. Crucial details were never worked out because North Korea left the talks over unrelated banking sanctions the Bush administration announced last fall. Washington has refused to conduct direct negotiations on the banking sanctions.

Even if this gratuitous obstacle were removed, completing the nuclear talks would be difficult because North Korea wants civilian power reactors before it completes nuclear disarmament. Given North Korea's record of diverting nuclear material from civilian to military programs, it should have to demonstrate compliance with nonproliferation rules before building power reactors.

Pressure from China and South Korea may be required to get North Korea to agree to acceptable terms, and both countries should be signaling their willingness to apply such pressure by imposing short-term penalties for the missile tests. For China, the most effective signal would be a short-term suspension of oil shipments. South Korea could cancel this week's scheduled cabinet-level talks.

The most urgent objective for all three nations should be to convince North Korea to not test its long-range missile again. Preparations for a test are reported under way. The next goal should be to jump-start talks aimed at permanently ending North Korea's long-range missile and nuclear weapons programs.

West Woos Russia In Bid To Curb Iran N Programme (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, July 10, 2006

Western governments are stepping up their efforts to win Russian and Chinese backing for a tougher stance over Iran's nuclear programme in the run-up to the G8 summit next weekend.

The latest indication came from the US, which at the weekend said it was willing to offer Moscow a deal on civil nuclear co-operation – as long as Russia provided more help in convincing Tehran to scale down its programme. The deal could allow Russia to make billions of dollars from storing nuclear waste from US-supplied reactors around the world.

"For agreement on peaceful co-operation to go forward, we will need Russia's active co-operation in blocking Iran's attempts to obtain nuclear weapons," a White House spokesman said.

Western officials acknowledge that North Korea's missile tests last week distracted international attention from Iran, while the international reaction underlined Moscow and China's reluctance to use United Nations sanctions to deter proliferation. Indications that Iran's nuclear programme may be faltering technically have also reduced the sense of urgency surrounding the case. At the heart of the controversy is uranium enrichment, a process that can produce both fuel and weapons grade material.

The US and the European Union, which fear that Tehran is coming closer to developing nuclear weapons, are focused on using the July 15-17 G8 summit in St Petersburg as the main source of pressure on Iran. Russia wants the summit to focus on energy security instead, while Iran, which insists its programme is purely peaceful, has said it will not reply until August.

"They want to get past an action-forcing deadline and the idea that the Americans have more leverage," says Mark Fitzpatrick, nuclear expert at London's International Institute for Strategic Studies. "So long as the Iranians haven't rejected [the international proposal for Iran to halt enrichment work], Russia and China will say there is no reason to go to the [UN] Security Council."

He adds that Iran's technical progress has also recently slowed, with a 164-centrifuge cascade – used to enrich uranium – not working well and plans for a second and third cascades delayed.

Western diplomats say they expect Ali Larijani, Tehran's top nuclear negotiator, to ask for clarifications on the international offer when he meets European officials tomorrow – but not to provide a definite response.

The EU will be looking for signs that Tehran is seriously considering the proposal – which includes economic and civil nuclear aid rather than just trying to spin the process out.

If the encounter with Mr Larijani proves frustrating for the Europeans, the EU and the US will seek to rally support from Russia and China at a foreign ministers' meeting in Paris for a tougher international line. This will set the tone for the G8 summit later in the week.

"The Iranians sometimes miscalculate the international mood," says a western diplomat. "The Russians don't want a big row at St Petersburg."

Analysts say Iran could eventually agree to take a temporary break with enrichment and allow talks with the permanent five UN Security Council members and Germany to begin.

It could then use the talks to argue that it should be allowed to maintain a small-scale UN-monitored enrichment programme.

Russia-U.S. Shift In Power Balance May Mold Summit (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The decision by the Bush administration to allow Russia to house spent nuclear fuel highlights a dynamic likely to shape this week's Group of Eight summit: the shifting power balance between a U.S. facing challenges on several fronts and a Russia moving to reassert itself on the world stage.

Less than a week before the summit of the G-8 leading industrial nations in St. Petersburg, the Bush administration's need for Russian support in political showdowns with Iran and North Korea is forcing the U.S. to accede to Russian demands on a range of issues. The White House already has quietly agreed to downgrade its standard pro-democracy push in the face of Russian President Vladimir Putin's refusal to make it a major focus of the gathering, and administration officials concede they are likely to bow to a range of other Russian demands over the course of the summit.

The moves represent an acknowledgment by the administration that on a variety of hot-button issues, the U.S. needs Russia more than Russia needs the U.S. The White House says it wants to use diplomacy to persuade Iran and North Korea to abandon their nuclear-weapons programs, but that approach depends heavily on Russian support at the United Nations and in continuing multination negotiations with the two countries. The U.S. also wants to ensure that Russia doesn't use its vast oil and natural-gas holdings as weapons in disputes with the fragile democracies in neighboring Georgia and Ukraine.

Russia has hinted it would be willing to offer at least conditional support to the American-led diplomatic initiatives over Iran and North Korea, but at a cost.

In a briefing late last week with American reporters, a top Putin aide, Igor Shuvalov, said Moscow hoped to win final U.S. approval for Russia's bid to enter the World Trade Organization during a bilateral summit between Messrs. Bush and Putin on the eve of the summit. Mr. Shuvalov also said Moscow wanted White House assurances that Russian firms would be able to freely invest in the U.S. without facing the kind of political scrutiny that derailed recent proposed acquisitions of U.S. assets by companies from China and the United Arab Emirates.

Administration officials said the decision to allow Russia to store spent nuclear fuel was meant as a further inducement to Mr. Putin, who has demanded for some time that Russia be given a larger piece of the lucrative business. The decision, reported Saturday by the Washington Post, is set to be announced after the bilateral meeting between the two leaders at the start of the summit, the officials said.

The deal is a reversal for the U.S., which has refused to allow Russia to store nuclear waste, because of Moscow's role in helping Iran build and run its first large-scale nuclear reactor. Another concern has been Russia's failure to provided good security for its nuclear facilities against accidents or possible theft.

The U.S. supplies much of the civilian nuclear fuel for global markets and continues to control that material when it is spent, even in foreign countries. Without an agreement with the U.S., no country receiving U.S. nuclear materials could send its spent fuel to Russia for storage.

Bush administration officials say they are hopeful that the agreement with Russia's demand will spur Mr. Putin to lend at least tacit support to any American efforts to impose sanctions on Iran or pass a U.N. Security Council resolution that could clear the way for possible military action against the country in the event of a crisis.

Still, the deal is certain to be a matter of debate on Capitol Hill, where anti-Russia sentiment is high because of Mr. Putin's crackdown on his country's media and political opposition. A U.S.-Russian accord on nuclear waste doesn't need congressional approval, but it could be blocked if both chambers vote to do so within 90 days of its signing.

"This is another example where the Russians have got to understand again that their continued autocracy ... should not be rewarded with an agreement that is probably more beneficial to them than to us," Sen. John McCain, (R., Ariz.), said on CBS's "Face the Nation." "It's time for some very tough talk with the Russians."

The Odd Couple (USNEWS)

It was a grim week--with North Korea firing a batch of missiles as a warning to its adversaries, a standoff continuing with Iran over its nuclear program, and more bloody attacks in Iraq. But Russian leader Vladimir Putin couldn't resist needling President Bush last Thursday. Noting that it was Bush's 60th birthday, the Russian president passed along best wishes from the global labor leaders he had been hosting in the Kremlin that afternoon. Everyone wished the embattled American president well, Putin said, except the labor leaders from America. Both men laughed, but Bush aides saw a larger point. "They like and respect each other," said a senior adviser. "They have many strong disagreements, but they have a very good relationship."

Despite such towel-snapping moments, however, Bush has gotten more realistic about Putin since they first met in June 2001. That's when Bush famously declared that he had "looked the man in the eye ... and was able to get a sense of his soul"--concluding that Putin was "very straightforward and trustworthy" and committed to reform. Things haven't turned out quite that way, of course, and today Bush's assessment looks naive and certainly premature. U.S. policymakers admit as much. "Our views on Russia are very realistic now," says a senior administration official, who concedes that the administration's early hopes for a "strategic partnership" were unfounded. "We've stepped back," says the official.

Careful criticism. As Bush prepares to meet Putin this week at the annual conference of the Group of Eight industrialized democracies in St. Petersburg, the Russian leader's hometown, he is under pressure to condemn Putin's lurches toward autocracy. Among them: clamping down on dissent, asserting control of his country's television networks (story, Page 40), and intimidating his independent-minded neighbors by threatening to cut off energy supplies. Some critics, such as former Soviet dissident Natan Sharansky, urge Bush to criticize Putin's backsliding in a very dramatic way this week. Arizona Sen. John McCain has even suggested that Bush boycott the entire conference in St. Petersburg.

Bush never considered such a draconian step. But he is trying to find a way to thread the needle by expressing disapproval for Putin's excesses while at the same time winning Kremlin support for his key international objectives. "First of all," a senior U.S. official told U.S. News, "this isn't the Cold War. The world is changing. Russia is no longer a strategic adversary, nor is it a strategic threat to the United States. I think it's clear that cooperating with Russia can help us solve a number of issues that are important for American security and American economic prosperity." They include halting the spread of nuclear weapons, fighting terrorism, and promoting the peaceful use of nuclear energy. More urgently, Bush wants to secure long-term cooperation from Putin in pressuring Iran to abandon any nuclear weapons program. Russia, however, has been reluctant to back the stringent international sanctions that Bush wants. Another disappointment for White House officials is Russia's refusal to back strong sanctions against North Korea even after Pyongyang fired several test missiles last week.

Putin, for his part, wants to use this week's summit--the first time Russia has hosted the annual G-8 gathering--to gain legitimacy for his country as a major power. More pragmatically, he wants to promote Russian as a world-class energy exporter and gain support for his concept of a global nuclear energy partnership that would help Russia rebuild its nuclear industry.

President Bush has always placed a high premium on his personal relationships with other leaders. In Putin's case, not only has Bush exhibited trust in the Kremlin leader from the day they met, but he has tried to cultivate Putin with regular meetings around the world--18 so far--and frequent phone conversations. Bush even arranged a Putin visit to his ranch in Crawford, Texas, which Bush considers the top perquisite he can grant, since Prairie Chapel Ranch is his home. Bush believes his personal relationship with Putin will eventually pay off. "I don't necessarily agree with every decision he's made about what's happening inside of Russia," Bush told CNN's Larry King last week, "but it's very important for me to keep a good personal relationship with him so I can have good, candid discussions. But no leader wants to be lectured by somebody, no leader likes to be scolded publicly."

The question is whether Bush can parlay his relationship into something tangible in St. Petersburg. This remains unclear partly because of Russia's growing hubris. The administration has been concerned, for example, by Russia's threat to disrupt natural gas shipments to Ukraine and Georgia, putting pressure on the two young democracies led by politicians out of favor in Moscow. U.S. officials also complain about Moscow backing Aleksander Lukashenko, the dictator of Belarus, despite international pressure to stop his crackdown on opposition movements. Similarly, Russia is faulted for fostering separatist movements in the Georgian regions of South Ossetia and Abkhazia, and in Moldova.

Petro-power. Part of the reason for Russia's assertiveness is the nation's vast earnings from the high price of oil. Energy-rich Russia now has foreign reserves of about $230 billion, translating into a more confident Kremlin--what Russia scholar Dimitri Simes calls "petro-arrogance." The attitude among many Russian policymakers, says Simes, is, "All this democracy business is a charade--or, more precisely, a stick to attack Russia and Russian allies like Belarus."

Putin and his aides were particularly angry over Vice President Dick Cheney's tough speech in Vilnius, Lithuania, on May 4 in which he blasted Putin's regime for backsliding on democracy and seeking to "reverse the gains of the last decade." This has increased "anti-American spirit" in Russia, senior Kremlin official Igor Shuvalov said last week.

A senior U.S. official told U.S. News: "One of the things that we want to do ... is not to isolate Russia, and to bring it into organizations and institutions that are rules-based, that have certain standards, and try to do what we can to get the Russians to live up to those standards." That includes the G-8.

More broadly, Bush is trying to build new partnerships--with Russia and other nations--after a first term in which he was derided as a unilateralist, a cowboy, and a warmonger. U.S. officials admit that it's particularly important to form coalitions now because so many hot spots are boiling over and the United States can't deal with them alone.

Complicating matters is that Bush's allies in the Iraq war are dwindling. Italy's Silvio Berlusconi left office in early May after his party lost a national election. Spain's Jose Maria Aznar was thrown out amid rising opposition to his support for the war. British Prime Minister Tony Blair is leaving office before the next national election. Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi exits in September. One bright spot is in Germany, where Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, a fierce Bush critic, was pushed from office by voters earlier this year in favor of Angela Merkel, who favored better relations with the White House. Partly to cultivate Merkel, Bush will visit her in Merkel's home territory of Stralsund and Trinwillershagen before traveling to St. Petersburg.

The last thing Bush wants this week is a blowup that will revive his image as an arrogant Lone Ranger. So administration officials say the president will mostly make nice as he talks with his friend Vladimir and their counterparts amid the czarist palaces, churches, fountains, and other glories of Russia's imperial past.

Unreality Television (USNEWS)

By Sebastian Smith

U.S. News and World Report, July 10, 2006

When Russian journalists describe Vladimir Putin as the country's chief newsmaker, they're not exaggerating. It's not just that he's the president and attracts the expected attention--he also rules a Kremlin bureaucracy able to decide what is news.

Under Putin, Russia has experienced a dramatic rollback of media freedom, a sensitive issue as his fellow leaders of the Group of Eight major industrialized nations meet late this week in St. Petersburg. Freedom House, the U.S.-based human-rights group, ranks Russia 158th out of the 194 countries and territories for press freedom. It is urging the other G-8 leaders, the world's most powerful democratic figures, to press Putin for more open news media.

Before Putin took over in 2000, opposition voices were often heard on the three dominant television networks, particularly on the then privately owned NTV channel. There were hostile interviews with officials, merciless political satire shows, and investigations of what human-rights groups call Russia's dirty war in Chechnya. Today, NTV is owned by the state-run natural gas behemoth Gazprom, and its output differs little from that of the two big state-owned channels Rossiya and Channel One.

No criticism. A typical news broadcast on all three channels consists of showing Putin and government ministers hard at work, feel-good reports on life in the armed forces, and historical features related to the Soviet defeat of Nazi Germany. Opposition figures are rarely seen. The Center for Journalism in Extreme Situations, a leading Russian press freedom group, released a study in April that found that 91 percent of political news on Channel One was devoted to Putin and the "ruling powers." Nearly three quarters of that coverage was positive, a quarter neutral--none of it critical.

Newspapers are relatively freer, and a few, such as the daily Kommersant, are boldly critical. The Internet, where accessible, is a growing source for news. But in the world's biggest country, television is everything in shaping opinion. State-run channels, accessible to anyone with a TV, reach more than 90 percent of the 143 million population, while nontabloid newspapers rarely manage circulations of more than 100,000. (Recently, authorities have pressured radio stations to stop carrying news from Voice of America and Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty.)

The result is a country where debate is so stifled that formal censorship becomes unnecessary, says the Carnegie Moscow Center's Masha Lipman. "The Kremlin has been pretty sophisticated in dealing with the media," she says. "It's about ensuring that big media managers are loyal, then leaving some of the small outlets free to let off steam, while ensuring they remain irrelevant." What appears on television "is a product of close cooperation between Kremlin aides and the TV network managers," she adds. "Access to information, or the ability to hold a government official to account--this doesn't exist."

Defenders of Kremlin policy flatly deny there is a problem. And mirroring arguments used by Moscow to defend against criticism of issues such as human rights, they throw the accusation back at what they view as a hypocritical West. Vladislav Surkov, a Kremlin official often seen as Putin's eminence grise, told reporters last month that alleged bias in the media's coverage of opposition figures was "a matter of taste."

Margarita Simonyan, editor-in-chief of the state's new 24-hour English-language channel Russia Today, agrees. "The state channels show the president of Russia. That is because state television should tell the people what the state is doing," she says. "I look at CNN and they constantly show [President George W.] Bush. And not only CNN. Why should Russia's president be less interesting?"

Simonyan and other Kremlin loyalists argue that Putin's breaking of private media empires since 2000 merely stopped businessmen from using television and newspapers to impose their own views. The perception that there was freedom of the press in the 1990s before Putin "is a cliche that does not correspond to reality," says Kremlin-connected political analyst Gleb Pavlovsky.

"Managed democracy." History shows that Pavlovsky is partly right. The media barons of the 1990s were key in President Boris Yeltsin's uphill re-election of 1996. Their outlets covered up stories about Yeltsin's ill health and fueled scaremongering about his Communist challenger. But where Yeltsin struck bargains with the media, Putin has simply taken control, extending his hallmark strategy of "managed democracy" from the ballot box to the TV set and printing press.

There has not been outright nationalization. Rather, media ownership has passed into the hands of Kremlin-friendly businesses like Gazprom, which also owns the formerly heavyweight, now increasingly bland newspaper Izvestia. Other well-known newspapers owned by or linked to Kremlin-connected businessmen include Nezavisimaya Gazeta, Argumenty i Fakti, and Vremya Novostei.

There are notable exceptions, including Kommersant and Vedomosti, a business newspaper partly owned by the Financial Times and the Wall Street Journal. With its hard-hitting interviews and balanced news coverage, Gazprom-owned Echo Moskvy radio is considered the standard-bearer for freedom in the electronic media. But Sergei Parkhomenko, a star of the post-Soviet media scene who was forced from his job as editor of the independent Itogi magazine in 2001, warns that outlets like Echo Moskvy or Kommersant are just window dressing. "If anything in Russia is not under government control, that's because the government has decided that it doesn't need to control that yet," he says. "The moment they want to close Vedomosti or Kommersant, they will."

And at the heart of this taming of the Fourth Estate, argues Parkhomenko, is a phenomenon running much deeper than Putin's urge to control. "The most important thing is that society doesn't support the journalists," he says. "Society doesn't demand information. We got freedom of speech as a gift in the 1990s. It just fell from the sky. But people quietly let it go, and now they struggle to remember they ever needed it."

It's a view ratified by Nikolai Svanidze, a leading anchor on Rossiya, who said in June that viewers were "tired of pluralism." "Our guests from the United States and European countries may not understand what I'm talking about," Svanidze said, "but the classic Soviet viewer is not used to alternatives. It's tiring to have a choice because you have to think."

What's Bad For Putin Is Best For Russians (NYT)

By Garry Kasparov

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

Moscow - When observing the West's conciliatory dealings with Russia, I'm reminded of a quotation often attributed to Winston Churchill: "However beautiful the strategy, you should occasionally look at the results."

For five years, President Bush has been talking about maintaining an open dialogue with Russia's president, Vladimir Putin, and about how hard he has worked to convince the Russian leader that "it's in his interest to adopt Western-style values and universal values." This sounds reasonable, but we don't have to go on theory. There's a track record — one that clearly shows that persuasion and appeasement toward Russia have failed.

It is long past time for Western leaders to take a tougher stand if they want their rhetoric about democracy to be credible. A perfect opportunity awaits at this week's meeting of the Group of 7 leaders in St. Petersburg. I say "Group of 7" rather than "Group of 8" because I continue to hope that the West will find its collective backbone and make Russia's participation contingent on its actually being a democracy.

The St. Petersburg meeting offers the visiting heads of state a chance to see for themselves how bad things here have become. The right of Russians to elect their governors and parliamentary representatives is steadily eroding, with more and more influence accruing to the executive. Even Aleksandr Veshnyakov, the chairman of the Central Electoral Commission who has rubber-stamped the results of every election under President Putin, recently said that if all the new legislation proposed by Mr. Putin's United Russia Party were passed, elections here "would be a farce." Opposition activists and journalists are routinely arrested and interrogated. The Kremlin, in complete control of the judiciary, loots private businesses and then uses state-controlled companies to launder the money abroad.

Mr. Bush and Europe's leaders apparently believe it is best to disregard such unpleasantness for the sake of receiving Russia's cooperation on security and energy. This cynical and morally repugnant stance has also proven ineffective. Just as in the old days, Moscow has become an ally for troublemakers and anti-democratic rulers around the world. Nuclear aid to Iran, missile technology to North Korea, military aircraft to Sudan, Myanmar and Venezuela, and a budding friendship with Hamas: these are the West's rewards for keeping its mouth shut about human rights in Russia.

It's time to stop pretending that the Kremlin shares the free world's interests. The high energy prices the Putin administration requires to keep its hold on power are driven by the tensions that come with every North Korean missile launching and Iranian nuclear threat. It's no surprise that Russia continues to block United Nations sanctions against these rogue states. The mystery is why the West continues to treat Russia like an ally.

Tomorrow and Wednesday, State Department representatives are scheduled to attend the Other Russia conference in Moscow. Organized by the opposition umbrella group of which I am a founder, the conference will bring together politicians and nongovernmental organizations from all over Russia and from every part of its political spectrum.

The primary aim of the conference is to document our national crisis for the Russian government, the Russian people and the widest possible international audience. It is equally important to discuss what is to be done and to make it clear that it is not too late. Our citizens must refuse to be bought off with a fleeting oil windfall and the false impression of a return to superpower status. Western leaders must live up to their rhetoric about human rights by stating in no uncertain terms that Russia's status as a trading partner, security ally and G-8 member are all at risk if the country continues its slide into dictatorship.

Just days ago, dozens of activists en route to Moscow to attend the conference were arrested, some beaten. Possession of opposition literature is being defined as an attempt to "overthrow constitutional order." Will the Western delegations sit silently? Will the American president say nothing?

Perhaps silence is the best option if the most Mr. Bush has to offer are weak expressions of concern and remarks about his personal relationship with Mr. Putin. President Ronald Reagan's hard public line on the Soviet Union let us know that someone out there was aware of our predicament and was fighting for us. Now this American president seems to be saying that Iraqis and Afghans are deserving of democracy, but Russians are not.

The darkest days of Communist rule are now a generation behind us. Between the end of the Communist dictatorship and the crackdown under President Putin, there was a period of freedom. It was brief and it was flawed, but it could have served as a foundation for a democratic Russia. Since 2000, however, Mr. Putin has done everything possible to dismantle that fragile edifice. In dealing with Russia, please don't confuse what's good for the Putin regime with what's best for the Russian people.

The Democracy Backlash (WP)

By Fred Hiatt

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

When communism collapsed in 1991, no one expected democracy to triumph everywhere and instantly. But no one expected the other side to fight back, either. After all, what was "the other side"?

Yet when President Vladimir Putin hosts the first summit of Group of Eight leaders in Russia this week, the most notable thing won't be that his country has failed to become the consolidated democracy that the G-7 countries expected when they invited Russia to join a decade ago. What will be remarkable -- but has been little remarked on -- is that Putin has become a leader and an emblem of an active movement to combat the spread of democracy.

"What seems to be the case," Sen. Richard Lugar (R-Ind.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, told me, "is that governments that are authoritarian have decided to fight back."

Lugar chaired a hearing last month on "The Backlash Against Democracy Assistance," which is the title of a report he commissioned from the National Endowment for Democracy, a private, federally funded organization created in 1983 to promote democratic institutions around the world. The organization found the backlash to be most pronounced in what Carl Gershman, NED's president, calls "hybrid regimes": autocracies that maintain some nominally democratic processes, usually including elections, and that generally claim to be democracies.

Many of these regimes tolerated civic groups promoting freedom and human rights during the 1990s and allowed them to receive help from democracy promoters in the United States and other nations. But after the Rose Revolution swept away the corrupt regime of Eduard Shevardnadze in Georgia, followed by the Orange Revolution in Ukraine, Putin and other leaders decided they could no longer take any chances.

They concluded, Gershman said in a recent talk, that, as Abraham Lincoln noted in a different context, "a government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free." And so they accelerated their harassment of civic groups, radio stations, political parties and any other independent voices -- with arbitrary detentions, visa bans, impossible funding rules, intrusive registration requirements and more.

For the most part, the regimes claim that these measures are aimed only at protecting state sovereignty, defeating terrorism or countering espionage. That's good news, in a funny way; most of them still feel compelled to describe themselves as democrats. Even now there is no "other side," ideologically speaking.

But it also makes the measures difficult to combat. Post reporter Peter Finn's account last week of how the Kremlin has eliminated Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty broadcasts from most Russian radio stations without formally banning the programming -- instead harassing, insinuating and threatening to revoke licenses -- provides a good example.

And the rebounding dictators are learning from each other. In January Putin signed legislation regulating nongovernmental organizations that will give 30,000 bureaucrats the option of revoking the registration of any troublesome group. Now Hugo Chavez in Venezuela and Robert Mugabe in Zimbabwe are pushing similar legislation. China reportedly sent researchers to Uzbekistan and other former Soviet states to compare notes on democracy countermeasures; meanwhile, Belarus's dictator, Alexander Lukashenko, "reportedly acquired China's latest internet monitoring and control technology while in Beijing in December 2005," NED reported.

The man who helped provoke all this -- Georgia's democratic president, Mikheil Saakashvili -- was in Washington last week warning that Putin and his ilk may be interested in more than defense; they may want to roll back democracy in Georgia, Ukraine and beyond. Bush, who spent two hours with the Georgian, appears to understand this.

Putin is, in fact, working hard to undermine democratic Georgia, a nation of fewer than 5 million people bordering Russia on the south. He has banned imports of Georgian produce, wine and mineral water; he is manipulating secessionists inside the country. Saakashvili's success in promoting economic growth and diminishing corruption may be too dangerous an example for Putin to abide.

A key question for this week will be whether the G-7 leaders make clear that undermining neighboring democracies is not an acceptable policy. France and Germany will be reluctant to allow principle to interfere with commercial interests, which lie with Russia, not some tiny nation to the south. So it will be up to Bush.

Saakashvili seemed to be delivering just such a message when he handed Bush a photocopy of a 1936 letter his government had discovered in the KGB archives. The letter, handwritten by leaders of fiercely independent people of the mountainous Khevsureti region, was addressed to the "Great American Government." It bewailed the encroaching Bolsheviks, who were forcing the locals onto collective farms and preventing them from practicing their religion.

"We won't surrender as long as a single Georgian in Khevsureti is alive," they wrote. "We'll defend ourselves with swords and daggers. . . . We hope you will help us. You are the only ones who can . . . ."

The letter never reached Franklin Roosevelt, of course, and all its signatories were promptly murdered by the KGB (then known as the NKVD).

Times have changed, thank goodness. But history hasn't ended, and the spread of democracy still can't be put on autopilot.

Iran Asks IAEA To Remove Chief Inspector (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, July 10, 2006

Iran has asked the International Atomic Energy Agency to remove the head of the inspection team probing Tehran's nuclear program, U.N. officials said Sunday.

The inspector, Chris Charlier, has not been back to Iran since April because of Iranian displeasure with his work, the officials said.

However, Charlier remains the head of the team, they said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the issue was confidential.

The German newspaper Welt am Sonntag reported Sunday that Charlier had been removed from his post and assigned to other duties. It quoted him as saying he believes Iran is operating a clandestine nuclear program and suggested it was linked to weapons.

IAEA spokespeople in Vienna, Austria, declined comment Sunday.

Charlier, 61, has previously complained publicly that Iranian constraints made inspection work there difficult.

Tehran denies it is interested in nuclear weapons but revelations of past clandestine activities and finds of documents linked to warheads, along with its insistence on carrying out uranium enrichment, have heightened international suspicions.

Meanwhile, Tehran warned the Group of Eight Sunday against making any decisions on Iran's nuclear program without consulting it first.

"Any (G-8) summit decision on Iran — if premature and incomplete — could harm the current positive trend of negotiations," Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said, referring to talks with the European Union about an incentives package offered to Iran to end the impasse over its nuclear program.

"The G-8 summit won't be comprehensive without Iran's participation and opinion," Mottaki said of the gathering by the leaders of the world's largest economies that is scheduled to open Saturday in St. Petersburg, Russia.

EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana and top Iran nuclear envoy Ali Larijani met in Brussels, Belgium, last week. A formal meeting is scheduled for Tuesday.

On Sunday, Mottaki reiterated that Iran would give a formal response to the offer by the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council and Germany next month. He hinted that Tehran planned to negotiate some aspects of the package first.

The West wants Iran to respond to the incentives before the G-8 summit.

Bush's Shift: Being Patient With Foes (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

WASHINGTON, July 9 — President Bush has never made apologies for enshrining pre-emption as the defining doctrine of his first term. He has declared many times that in a post-9/11 world, presidents no longer have the luxury of waiting for the slow grinding of diplomatic give-and-take when unpredictable dictators are assembling arsenals that could threaten the United States.

But as he leaves for Europe and Russia this week, where the simultaneous nuclear standoffs in Iran and North Korea will top the agenda, Mr. Bush finds himself struggling to square his muscular declarations with the realpolitik of his second term after the invasion of Iraq. At every turn, and every provocation, he finds himself in an unaccustomed position: urging patience.

"These problems didn't rise overnight, and they don't get solved overnight," he told reporters during an hourlong news conference in Chicago on Friday. At another point, he said: "You know, the problem with diplomacy, it takes a while to get something done. If you're acting alone, you can move quickly." Underscoring the idea again, he said, "It's painful in a way for some to watch because it takes a while to get people on the same page."

The Chicago news conference was notable because it seemed to mark the completion of a rhetorical journey for Mr. Bush. It is a journey that has steadily moved away, in public pronouncements — if not the president's own thinking — from the lines he drew in the 2002 State of the Union address. In that famous "axis of evil" speech, he identified the threats from Iraq, Iran and North Korea as the three most pressing post-9/11 challenges facing the United States.

"We'll be deliberate, yet time is not on our side," he said in one of the most-quoted passages of what became the signature speech of his administration. "I will not wait on events, while dangers gather. I will not stand by, as peril draws closer and closer. The United States of America will not permit the world's most dangerous regimes to threaten us with the world's most destructive weapons."

Yet to some conservatives who backed Mr. Bush's decision in Iraq, "standing by and waiting" is the essence of Mr. Bush's current strategy.

Nicholas Eberstadt of the American Enterprise Institute wrote in The Wall Street Journal after North Korea's missile tests last week that North Korea had achieved more "strategic successes" under the Bush administration than it had under President Clinton.

"Apparently unwilling to move against North Korea's nuclear challenges by itself, and evidently incapable of fashioning a practical response involving allies and others, the Bush administration's response to Pyongyang's atomic provocations is today principally characterized by renewed calls for additional rounds of toothless conference diplomacy," he wrote.

This weekend in The Weekly Standard, William Kristol, another prominent conservative voice, wrote: "The red lines, pink lines, and mauve lines of U.S. foreign policy seem increasingly to be written in erasable ink. What was 'unacceptable' to President Bush a week ago (a North Korean missile launch) has been accepted." He called the current policy "Clintonian."

Mr. Bush's aides, who decline to speak about their internal deliberations on North Korea and Iran for attribution, say their critics have done everything but describe a workable alternative. Iran, they note, is five or more years from a nuclear weapon — and, in their more candid moments, they acknowledge that it has numerous options for retaliating for any military action.

A military attack on North Korea's missile pads, they say, has always been regarded as an unacceptable risk — even before American forces were tied up on the other side of the world. That is why they were so quick to dismiss a call two weeks ago by President Clinton's defense secretary, William Perry, and his top aide on nuclear issues, Ashton B. Carter of Harvard, to conduct a lightning, precision strike on North Korea's Taepodong 2 long-range missile before it could be tested.

"It sounds good," one of Mr. Bush's national security aides said at the time, "until you ask yourself the question, what good is a strike if it leaves their nuclear capability untouched?"

To Mr. Bush's critics, the question goes to the heart of the new argument over pre-emption: whether Mr. Bush, in focusing on Iraq in 2003, missed his chance. It was in January of that year, as American forces were flowing toward the Middle East, that North Korea threw out the international inspectors who had been watching over its stockpile of nuclear fuel, and withdrew from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

The action did not have the drama of a multiple-missile launchings. But unlike the test-firings, it was a clearer violation of international law. (Any country has a right to exit the treaty with 90 days' notice, but the North evicted the inspectors before that period expired.)

But Mr. Bush made no effort then to seek sanctions at the United Nations Security Council, or to rally China and Russia to impose economic sanctions. One senior former official who was involved in the discussions said Mr. Bush was briefed on his military options to strike at the nuclear facilities before the spent fuel rods were moved — but the options looked bad, and he turned back to the Iraq invasion plan.

Administration officials still defend that decision, saying that Saddam Hussein lived in a more volatile neighborhood and needed to be dealt with first. But as one senior American diplomat who was involved in the Iraq decision conceded late last week, "The decisions we made then narrowed our options now."

In short, Mr. Bush is discovering the limits of his own pre-emption doctrine — and the frustrations of its alternative. He knows, aides say, that even to hint at military action or deadlines if Iran refuses to suspend enriching uranium, or if North Korea continues to test missiles and make bomb fuel, would probably destroy any chance of getting China and Russia aboard on a common strategy.

But failing to lay out the consequences clearly — the kind of straight talk Mr. Bush used to say distinguished his administration's foreign policy — may embolden Iran and North Korea to try to run out the clock, produce more nuclear material and hope for a better deal with the next president.

India Reports A Long-Range Missile Test (NYT)

By Hari Kumar And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

NEW DELHI, July 9 — India test-fired its longest-range nuclear-capable missile on Sunday for the first time, government officials said. But although the missile was launched, it was unclear whether the entire test was successful, with at least one report saying that the missile had failed at some point in its flight.

The launching has occurred at a time of rising international tension over North Korea's recent missile tests, and as the United States Congress is considering a civilian nuclear pact that the Bush administration negotiated with India.

While the pact does not concern missile tests or other military activity, its critics say the Bush administration failed to obtain any commitment from India to stop producing new nuclear weapons fuel, or to restrict its production of new weapons. The test of the Agni 3 missile (agni means fire in Hindi) appeared intended to show that India's strategic arsenal could reach far beyond Pakistan and cover territory including China.

The missile is reported to have a range of more than 1,800 miles. The Defense Ministry said it had been launched from Wheeler Island, off the coast of Orissa State in the Bay of Bengal, and had taken off successfully.

But later, the Press Trust of India news agency quoted an unidentified military official as saying that the missile had developed troubles, perhaps in the firing of its second stage, and had not completed the test successfully.

A Defense Ministry spokesman, Sitanshu Kar, would not comment on the report other than to say, "The missile took off successfully, and the rest of the data need to be analyzed, in a day or two, to come to a conclusion."

India and neighboring Pakistan have often traded rounds of missile and nuclear tests in times of tension between them. But relations between the nations have improved lately, and the governments have a standing agreement to inform each other before such tests. On Sunday, the Pakistani Foreign Ministry confirmed that India had told it about the test in advance.

While short-range missiles are enough to keep India and Pakistan in mutual range, analysts have seen India's development of long-range ballistic missiles, and the continuing development of its nuclear weapons program, as a strategic step to keep China in check. The listed range of the Agni 3, hundreds of miles longer than that of other missiles India has tested, would put more of China's major cities within striking distance.

In the past two years, tensions between India and China have lessened somewhat, and direct border trade between them reopened last week along the storied Silk Road through the Himalayas for the first time since they fought a war 44 years ago.

The BBC reported that before the launching on Sunday, India had twice postponed tests on the Agni 3, once for technical reasons and once because of concern about the international response while it was trying to seal its civilian nuclear deal with the Bush administration. In May, the Indian defense minister, Pranab Mukherjee, was quoted as saying that the missile was ready but that India was observing "self-imposed restraint" before testing.

The nuclear deal between India and the United States is under review by Congress and would, in effect, remove all United States restrictions on nuclear trade with India that are in place because India has refused to sign the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. The only other countries to refuse are Israel and Pakistan. North Korea withdrew from the treaty three years ago.

Under the deal, the United States would give vital help to the Indian civilian nuclear program, including uranium for fuel for civilian reactors. The United States would not provide any fuel for Indian weapons, but critics have pointed out that it would essentially free the limited Indian uranium supplies for weapons production. The agreement contains no restriction on how much or how fast India could increase the size of its nuclear arsenal.

Upping The Ante In Gaza (USNEWS)

By Larry Derfner

U.S. News and World Report, July 10, 2006

Hitkansut is a buzzword that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert introduced into the Israeli political lexicon. It means, in the government's translation, "realignment," shorthand for Olmert's ambitious goal of withdrawal from most of the West Bank in order to secure Israelis behind a protective barrier.

But that word hasn't been heard much lately. And the future of Olmert's plan--the centerpiece of his election win--now rests on his handling of the growing political crisis sparked by Palestinian militants' kidnapping of Israeli Army Cpl. Gilad Shalit and the escalating military conflict that has drawn Israeli forces back into Gaza.

Last summer's Israeli withdrawal from Gaza--which its architect, then Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, dubbed hitnatkut, or disengagement--was meant to be the successful precedent for a far-reaching unilateral pullout from the West Bank to finally remove Israeli soldiers and settlers from the Palestinians' midst. But success in Gaza, from Israel's viewpoint, means peace and quiet for Israelis living close to Gaza's borders. And that hasn't happened. Since the last Israeli soldier left Gaza 10 months ago, following the 8,500 settlers whom the Army forcibly removed from their homes, Palestinian militants have used the territory to fire wildly inaccurate Kassam rockets at residents in Israeli border towns.

As Israel stepped up its jet bombings and cross-border tank shelling against the militants, killing dozens of Palestinian fighters and civilians, the militants fired off more Kassams and issued still more threats. In late June, several guerrillas, including members of the Palestinian Authority's ruling Hamas movement, tunneled about half a mile from Gaza to the Israeli side of the border. On June 25, the guerrillas climbed out, killed two tank-crew members at an Army post, and kidnapped a third, Corporal Shalit.

Gaza redux. This meant Israeli soldiers were headed back onto the sands of Gaza. Suddenly, Sharon's disengagement didn't seem as safe and sure as it did last summer. And Olmert's realignment plan--which would put Israel's Ben-Gurion International Airport and several Tel Aviv suburbs within Kassam range of West Bank militants unhindered by the presence of the Israeli Army--was recast as a risky proposition. "We said this was going to happen; they're firing rockets from Elei Sinai," said an off-duty Army major who evacuated from the former Elei Sinai settlement in northern Gaza, which is now a landscape of worthless rubble. A 7-foot-long Kassam rocket had just landed harmlessly in an open field about 200 yards from a protest tent camp that is now home to the major and some of his former neighbors, some 3 miles from Elei Sinai. A few days after the major uttered those words, Israeli troops swept back into the destroyed settlement and two others nearby to root out the Kassam threat.

A survey by Israel's leading pollster, Mina Tsemach, showed that Olmert's popularity and that of his centrist Kadima (Forward) party has been hurt, as has that of Kadima's liberal Labor Party coalition partner. The public is now more divided over realignment. In both the cabinet and the Knesset, some of Olmert's allies are starting to break ranks over the plan. "There is no point in giving West Bank land and receiving nothing in return," Kadima cabinet minister Meir Sheetrit told the Jerusalem Post, warning that cities in central Israel could come under attack.

This is the right-wing opposition's strongest argument against Olmert's long-term plan. With Kassams now beginning to fall in Ashkelon, a coastal city of 120,000 about 8 miles northeast of Gaza, Hanan Kristal, a leading Israeli political analyst, says, "This argument is now much easier to sell to the public." If Olmert and his inexperienced defense minister, Labor Party leader Amir Peretz, do not establish their leadership credentials by getting the upper hand on the Palestinian attacks, Kristal says, "they will not have the political stature to carry out the realignment. This is their first test, and if they don't pass it, they could effectively become lame ducks."

The test includes two daunting challenges: to silence the rockets, and to win the release of Shalit, without giving in to the militants' demands for a large-scale release of Israel's Palestinian prisoners, who number over 9,000. Israel holds the overwhelming military edge, but Palestinian guerrillas have smuggled vast stores of arms from Egypt into Gaza since the Israeli Army left the territory. For now, this is the realignment that really matters.

Sharon's Shadow (NSWK)

By Dan Ephron And Christopher Dickey

Newsweek, July 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0039065

Ehud Olmert's voice quavered as he spoke at the U.S. Embassy's Fourth of July party last week. Behind the Israeli prime minister was an American flag made of colored balloons. The cocktail-sipping crowd on the lawn grew quiet. Olmert had shown no overt sign of stress, but people were watching. Days before, Palestinians from Gaza had captured an Israeli soldier. Now a Qassam rocket fired by the guerrilla wing of Hamas had hit the Israeli city of Ashkelon. Still, even in the wet heat of a Tel Aviv summer, Olmert looked cool in his dark suit and striped tie, until he mentioned his predecessor, Ariel Sharon.

As he began his remarks in Hebrew, Olmert recalled that Sharon had stood on the same dais just one year earlier, and that it had been only six months since a massive stroke plunged the legendary general turned politician into a coma. Olmert's voice seemed to crack as he wished aloud that Sharon might come back to be his old self again.

It was a sentimental and suggestive moment. As the crisis continues to grow, the question comes up often: "What would Sharon have done?" The answers are different and contradictory. "I don't know," says Mark Heller, a political scientist at the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies, "but I'm pretty sure people would have felt a lot more comfortable with whatever it was. It's not that anyone is saying there's an obvious alternative to what Olmert is doing. It's more a matter of inspiring confidence."

Although Olmert always wanted this job, not many Israelis ever expected he would get it. "He's fully aware of the accidental nature of the way he came to this position," says a political peer who prefers not to be seen as betraying a friend's confidence. Olmert had been mayor of Jerusalem, but he was not a popular figure in the Likud Party. When Sharon decided on the bold move of evacuating Jewish settlers from Gaza, however, he picked Olmert as his deputy. When Sharon started a new party to support his disengagement policy, Olmert was the first to join. When Sharon suffered his stroke, Olmert became acting prime minister, then took the position outright in elections. "Winning the lottery would have been easier," says Yossi Sarid, former head of the left-wing Meretz Party. "He was in the right place at the right time."

But now Olmert needs more than luck and his well-honed political skills: he needs the kind of credibility that Sharon had developed with the Israeli people and, perhaps most important, with the increasingly impatient Israeli military. Neither Olmert nor his Defense minister, Labor Party leader Amir Peretz, had serious command experience during their mandatory military service. Sharon took big risks in war, and ultimately in peace. Sharon was "a strong man whose toughest decision was to take Israel out of Gaza," says historian Tom Segev. "What is finally coming out of it is more suffering, more refugees and more hatred." And with Sharon out of the picture, Olmert is left to take responsibility, or blame, for the consequences.

Frictions between Olmert and his generals were growing well before Palestinian guerrillas managed to capture Cpl. Gilad Shalit on June 25. The problem was the cobbled-together rockets being lobbed from Gaza into Israel. They were crude but dangerous, and their range was extending. "It was clear we would be going into Gaza," says a senior Israeli military source, who insisted on anonymity because he is officially prohibited from talking to the press. "We knew this months ago, with or without Olmert. This isn't a quesion of making decisions on a political level. The writing was on the wall."

But if Olmert saw that writing, he saw other messages as well. "This is a highly complicated struggle—the terror struggle on the ground, the struggle to maintain the moral high ground in world opinion and the struggle to keep internal unity," says one of Olmert's close associates, who consults with him regularly and didn't want to compromise the relationship by being named. "There's a clear contradiction between the immediate tactical needs and the long-term objectives." Gaza's population is densely packed and very young. When school lets out, its streets are rivers of children. The closer Israeli troops move into the towns, the greater the risks of horrific civilian casualties and global outrage.

So when Shalit was captured, Olmert approved military tactics meant to put enormous pressure on the Hamas leadership, even if it meant suffering for thousands of people. Power stations were knocked out, bridges blasted apart. Sonic booms rattled windows and nerves night after night. "I want nobody to sleep at night in Gaza," Olmert said. "I want them to know what it's like." Hamas cabinet members and legislators in the West Bank were arrested. European governments protested. But no civilian casualties were reported. "People are saying it's uncomfortable," Olmert told the cabinet. "It will be uncomfortable. Nobody dies from being uncomfortable."

Then the rocket hit Ashkelon, seven miles north of the Gaza border. No one there was hurt. It blasted a large hole in the yard of a high school. But when Olmert addressed the Fourth of July party two hours later, he spoke as if a corner had been turned, not only in the fight with the Palestinians but in the struggle with the military. He predicted "unprecedented and far-reaching consequences," and the Israeli tanks that had been poised on the northern edge of Gaza began to roll. Within three days, at least 40 Palestinians, including a mother and her two children, were killed in the fighting. One Israeli soldier also lost his life in what may have been a friendly-fire incident. Hamas talked of a truce. But the captured corporal remained a prisoner. And at least 12 more Qassam rockets were launched.

Hamas, too, is watching the dynamic between Olmert and his military. "Olmert can engage in negotiations only if the generals recommend that to him," Hamas legislator Mahmoud Ar-Ramahi told NEWSWEEK, "and so far these generals prefer not to enter into negotiations over the Israeli soldier ... In their mind, striking a deal with the captors of the soldier will strengthen Hamas."

"I think we have no choice but to conduct a massive operation in Gaza, to recapture the area for a week or two, arrest a lot of people and get out," says Yuval Steinitz, a Likud member of the Knesset and chairman of the subcommittee on defense and counterterrorism. "I can tell you Sharon did exactly those things. He also hesitated a bit, but eventually ... isolated Arafat even though he was an elected leader and a Nobel Prize winner." Steinitz would like to see the whole Hamas government brought down. "We should make it so difficult and horrible for the Palestinians until it's clear they cannot continue with this terrorist government."

And then? Olmert has staked his political future, as Sharon had, on the success of unilateral disengagement—with pullouts planned from parts of the West Bank as well as Gaza. Now that's on hold. A policy of unilateral action that requires repeated incursions by Israeli troops is not a viable long-term option. "There is no way to defeat Hamas without a Palestinian partner," says Ephraim Sneh, a Labor Party lawmaker and retired general. "Defeating Hamas doesn't take an overnight operation. It's a process that is military, political, economic and cultural."

But Olmert faces a strategic problem. Not only does he have no partner in peace, as he often says, he has no partner in war. The would-be peacemaker, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, has been relegated to a role as spectator. And the breakdown of law and order in Gaza is such that the elimination of the Hamas government could mean the elimination of all government—with a likely increase in the influence of both Iran and Al Qaeda.

What's needed is a break with the past, says historian Segev. "It has never worked to punish a population, because Palestinians are as patriotic as Israelis and they say to themselves, 'We won't go down on our knees.' The Palestinians have nothing to lose, and we have never been able to understand that." If Olmert can bring calm out of this crisis, he will emerge as a leader in his own right. If not, chaos and violence will only serve, as they have so often in the past, to create nostalgia for leaders long gone.

Israel Vows To Fight Until Soldier's Release, And Palestinians Mourn Their Dead (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

GAZA, July 9 — Israel will continue its military offensive in the Gaza Strip at its own pace until Palestinian militants release a captured Israeli soldier and halt their rocket attacks, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told his cabinet on Sunday.

The operation in Gaza is a "war for which it is impossible to set a timetable," Mr. Olmert said, according to briefings provided by an Israeli official. "We will continue this battle with level-headedness and patience, while making use of the proper means," he is reported to have said. "We cannot sit and not respond to the Qassam rocket fire."

Mr. Olmert ruled out negotiations with Hamas, which leads the Palestinian government and whose military branch is holding Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who was abducted during a raid into Israel on June 25.

He said he had been prepared to release prisoners to Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority, before the two men met for a formal meeting, and Mr. Abbas confirmed that on Friday. But Mr. Olmert said Sunday, "We intended to release them to moderate elements, not terrorist elements." Releasing prisoners to Hamas in response to a kidnapping would further damage Palestinian moderates and reward extremism, Mr. Olmert said.

He repeated to the cabinet that Israel would not reoccupy Gaza but would act militarily there as it saw fit. "We will operate, enter and pull out as needed," the official quoted Mr. Olmert as saying.

Maj. Gen. Yoav Galant, commander of Israel's southern region, said late Saturday that Israel was ready for a long campaign, planning to shift the focus of operations from place to place. "We are prepared to continue the operation a month, two months and, if need be, even more," he told Channel 2 television. "The Palestinians will do their reckoning. They will count hundreds of dead terrorists, they will count the damaged infrastructure, the destroyed offices, the damaged factories."

On Sunday, the Palestinians counted more dead, even as they mourned and buried four people, including three from the same family, killed Saturday night in the Shijaia neighborhood, near the Karni commercial crossing, in an explosion at a house. The Palestinians blamed Israel.

But Israel said that its investigation showed that the explosion did not come from an airstrike, and that intelligence reports later showed that the deaths had been caused by a Palestinian anti-tank rocket.

Capt. Jacob Dallal, a spokesman for the military, said the Israeli Air Force, which tracks its missiles carefully, reported that its missile "hit the intended target," which was a nearby street where armed militants were walking with weapons. He said the army did not know what happened to those men, but "we hit the area we targeted, not the house."

An Israeli military official said intelligence information developed later, presumably from a source within Gaza, "clearly says that it was a Palestinian anti-tank missile." The military official insisted on not being identified and said he could not be more specific.

On Sunday, a Palestinian civilian was killed by an Israeli missile fired at a car carrying Hamas militants in the southern town of Rafah. The militants apparently escaped from the car, and a second missile hit nearby, wounding bystanders. The dead man was identified as Bilal Sliman Rabah, an 18-year-old supermarket clerk. Seven other Palestinians were wounded, with one in very serious condition, hospital authorities said.

Earlier Sunday, just after midnight, the air force struck a group of armed militants near the Karni commercial crossing, wounding three, members of the Palestinian security forces said.

Airstrikes also destroyed a major bridge in Beit Hanun, in northern Gaza, and an electricity transformer there, making it difficult to travel easily to the city and cutting electricity and some water supplies.

Palestinians continued to fire Qassam rockets into Israel despite the military operation. One resident of the nearby Israeli town of Sderot was moderately wounded Sunday morning from shrapnel wounds to the chest when a Qassam hit. A second rocket hit a house, and three people were treated for shock.

Three of the four Palestinians killed Saturday in the house explosion were members of the Hajaj family — Um Ayman Hajaj, 48; her son Muhammad, 21; and her daughter Rawan, 6. Four other family members were wounded.

The house is on the very edge of the Palestinian area closest to the Karni crossing into Israel.

Iman Hajaj, 23, one of Mrs. Hajaj's 14 children, said she was in the house's living room during the explosion, where some were watching an Egyptian soap opera. Those people were wounded, she said; those who died were in the garden drinking tea or cooking corn over a fire. "We had been nervous for two days with the movement of tanks and the shells," Ms. Hajaj said, sitting in a room of mourning women, all covered in black head scarves and long black robes, in a relative's house nearby.

"My brother Muhammad, who died, had just arrived a minute before to visit my married sister," Ms. Hajaj said, beginning to cry, then held out her hand, holding a curved piece of shrapnel. "More than 20 pieces like this we took from the body of my mother," she said.

As she spoke, young women who lined the banister of the stairway all began to chant in unison, "With our souls, with our blood, we sacrifice ourselves for our martyr!"

Um Hassan Hajaj, the aunt of the dead mother, spoke angrily about what she said was the responsibility of Israel and the United States for the deaths in her family. "Look at what your weapons are doing to us!" she yelled. As the television cameras came closer, she turned to them and shouted: "One day the Muslim countries will change everything, and there will be hard days for America! Injustice never lasts."

As the bodies of the dead were brought, wrapped in the flags of Islamic Jihad and Fatah, there was screaming and ululating and the cascading sounds of gunfire from the militants surging around the courtyard. The militants wore various forms of mufti, waving weapons and flags, including the green of Hamas. As the small body of Rawan was carried, tiny in the stretcher, her face exposed, the wailing swelled, and Um Fathi Hajaj, the girl's grandmother, collapsed in tears.

As he walked along the route of the funeral march, Abu Ahmed, the spokesman for the Islamic Jihad's military wing, quietly promised retribution. "We have 70 suicide bombers in a new brigade awaiting orders to strike Israel," he said.

Asked whether Islamic Jihad would respect a negotiated political document calling for Palestinian military activity to concentrate on Israel proper, he smiled wearily. "All of historic Palestine is ours, and we don't distinguish between 1948 or 1967," he said.

Mr. Abbas, back in Ramallah, ordered two representatives to discuss the crisis with Syria and with the exiled leader of Hamas's political bureau, Khaled Meshal.

On Friday, in a news conference, Mr. Abbas said he did not know of any splits in Hamas and dealt only with the elected Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniya, who called in vain for a mutual cease-fire on Saturday, quickly rejected by Israel without Corporal Shalit's release.

The Israeli Army also announced after an investigation that the only Israeli soldier who has died in this nearly two-week Gaza operation was accidentally killed by Israeli fire.

Israel Vows To Press Gaza Offensive (AP)

AP, July 10, 2006

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Sunday he would push ahead with the army's widescale offensive in the Gaza Strip, saying the fight to free an abducted soldier and stop militant rocket fire would last for a "long time."

The 12-day-old operation has caused widespread destruction in Gaza, left 51 Palestinians dead and led to international complaints that Israel was using excessive force.

Despite the offensive, militants launched three rockets into Israel on Sunday, wounding one person in the town of Sderot and damaging a house. Also, militants linked to the Palestinians' ruling Hamas party maintained their refusal to free Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who was captured in a June 25 raid, or even reveal his condition.

An Israeli airstrike Sunday night targeted a car carrying Hamas militants near Gaza City, wounding five people, including an 8-year-old girl, Palestinian health officials said. The vehicle was filled with explosives, which led to a series of large secondary explosions, the army said.

Israeli aircraft attacked a building early Monday on the outskirts of Gaza City, setting it on fire, Palestinians said. No injuries were reported. The military said the building was used by Islamic Jihad to make weapons.

Before daybreak, aircraft fired a missile at a group of militants near Gaza City, killing one and seriously wounding another, Palestinian hospital officials said. The military said a missile had been fired at militants on their way to launch a rocket.

Speaking to the Israeli Cabinet, Olmert counseled patience.

"We're talking about a war that will continue for a long time and it is complicated," Olmert said, according to a participant in the meeting. "This is a war for which we cannot set down a timetable and we can't say how long it will continue."

The Cabinet expressed unanimous support for the military action in Gaza and Olmert's refusal to negotiate with the militants, who demanded the release of 1,500 Palestinian prisoners in exchange for information about Shalit, 19.

Israeli security officials told the Cabinet that the offensive, the army's largest operation in Gaza since Israel withdrew from the territory last summer, was likely to force the militants to scale back their demands, according to the participant in the meeting, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the meeting was closed to the press.

But Palestinians were widely supportive of the militants' actions. A poll released Sunday showed that 77 percent of those questioned backed Shalit's kidnapping and 67 percent said they supported further abductions. Sixty-nine percent said the soldier should only be released in exchange for prisoners.

The survey of 1,197 Palestinians by the Jerusalem Media and Communication Center had a margin of error of 3 percentage points.

Olmert told the Cabinet that before Shalit was captured, he had been planning a prisoner release as a goodwill gesture to moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, but now a release appears out of the question.

"It's not a secret before the kidnapping that we would free prisoners. But we intended to release them to moderate elements and not to terrorist elements," Olmert said.

"The release of prisoners means destroying the moderates in the Palestinian Authority, and would signal to the world that Israel can only talk to extremists."

Since the offensive began June 28, Israeli forces have battered Gaza with artillery barrages and airstrikes. One airstrike Sunday missed a car carrying members of a Hamas rocket squad and killed a bystander instead, Palestinian health officials said. The army confirmed it carried out an airstrike.

The United Nations blamed Israel for widespread human rights violations and hardship to civilians in Gaza.

Palestinian hospital officials say at least 51 Palestinians have been killed and more than 180 wounded in the offensive.

One Israeli soldier was killed last week, and military officials said Sunday an initial inquiry showed he was shot accidentally by Israeli forces.

Olmert and other ministers said they were not overly concerned about the international reaction.

"Anybody who calls this operation disproportionate has no clue about the facts on the ground. We have been attacked and bombarded for months and weeks," Cabinet minister Yitzhak Herzog said.

"With all due respect to all those who criticize us, if anything of this nature would have happened in their homeland, they would have acted much worse."

Radical Politics Mideast Democracy: One Violent Group Finds It Works Fine (WSJ)

By Karby Leggett

BEIRUT, Lebanon -- When Syrian troops left Lebanon last year, the Bush administration saw a prime opportunity to de-fang a group one U.S. diplomat once called the "A-Team" of terror groups: Hezbollah, which receives major backing from Syria.

The end of Syria's nearly three-decade occupation was a watershed moment for President Bush's campaign to spread democracy in the Middle East as an antidote to violent Islamic movements. Millions of Lebanese celebrated the country's liberation. With an election approaching, Hezbollah was worried. "We felt danger," says Nawar Saheli, a political leader in the group.

Today, it's stronger than ever. The group, once disdainful of domestic politics, filled the power vacuum of Syria's departure by joining Lebanon's governing coalition. That has given Hezbollah new clout, including control over two ministries.

It also has helped the group elude a big threat: international pressure, led by the U.S. and France, to disarm. Over the past year "Hezbollah built a big shield over its military wing," says Amal Saad-Ghorayeb, a professor at the Lebanese American University.

How the militant group turned adversity to opportunity reveals a conundrum for the Bush administration: Rather than resisting Washington's democracy drive, some radical Islamic groups, including organizations the U.S. deems terrorist, are using it to promote their agendas.

In the Palestinian territories, the Sunni Muslim group Hamas won elections that were encouraged by the U.S. in January, taking control of the government. Like the Shiite Muslim Hezbollah, Hamas has resisted international pressure to renounce violence and disarm. In Iraq, the firebrand cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, whom U.S. officials once called a terrorist and vowed to capture or kill, has become an important behind-the-scenes player in the new Iraqi government. His "Mahdi Army" flourishes with little challenge from the U.S. or Iraqi officials.

Though Washington has generally supported these democratization moves, letting militant groups enter politics without giving up their weapons carries big risks. An example is Gaza, thrown into crisis by the kidnapping of an Israeli soldier by Hamas's armed wing. Israel responded by blowing up a major electricity grid, arresting dozens of Hamas lawmakers and cabinet ministers and launching a ground offensive that has killed more than 30 Palestinians.

Israel also threatened Syrian President Bashar Assad, who permits senior Hamas leaders to reside in Damascus, by flying warplanes over one of his palaces, raising the prospect of a wider confrontation. And, worried that Hezbollah's armed wing might attack too, the Israeli military has issued a high-level alert along its northern border with Lebanon.

Hezbollah, whose name means Party of God, has an especially thorny history with the U.S. and Israel, and it presents unique problems. The group emerged in the early 1980s to oppose Israel's occupation of part of Lebanon, during a phase of the long Lebanese civil war. Hezbollah has slowly developed a vast network that provides social services far more efficiently than the Lebanese government in many areas. But the U.S. lists Hezbollah as a terrorist organization because of a series of bombings, kidnappings and airplane hijackings it carried out in the 1980s and early 1990s.

Amid tension over Iran's nuclear facilities, Hezbollah also draws scrutiny because it has close ties to Iran. Hezbollah has an estimated 15,000 missiles pointed at Israel from land it controls in southern Lebanon. Some U.S. and Israeli officials worry that if there ever were a military confrontation between the West and Iran, Hezbollah could become a proxy for Iran and step up attacks on Israel. In such an event, Israel would almost surely reply with overwhelming force, potentially inflaming passions in the Middle East and raising the danger of region-wide war.

The risk was underscored in late May as Israel and Hezbollah had their most ferocious skirmish in years. Hezbollah fired rockets into northern Israel and hit a military base. Israel destroyed several dozen Hezbollah forts, killing at least one adherent. "Hezbollah is a big nightmare for us," says an Israeli military commander, Lt. Col. Ishai Efroni.

Despite Hezbollah's maneuvering, U.S. officials describe events in Lebanon as progress toward the goal of spreading democracy. They say bringing Hezbollah into mainstream politics will gradually cause the group to distance itself from Iran and focus its energies on domestic issues, a process they argue will eventually lead to Hezbollah's disarmament.

In the meantime, they say the U.S. will continue to support international efforts to disarm the group, underscored by a series of tough United Nations Security Council resolutions. "The fact that there is even discussion about Hezbollah's disarmament is progress," says Jeffrey Feltman, U.S. ambassador to Beirut.

With its location along the Mediterranean between Syria and Israel, Lebanon has long been a focus of regional conflict. A land of more than a dozen Christian and Muslim sects, it erupted in a brutal civil war in 1975. A 1989 accord that formally ended the war specified a government reserving key positions for each main group. Lebanon's prime minister must be a Sunni Muslim, the president a Maronite Christian and the speaker of Parliament a Shiite Muslim.

What drew Hezbollah into its higher profile in politics was the February 2005 bomb slaying of Rafik Hariri, a former prime minister who'd become publicly critical of Syria's military occupation. Many Lebanese suspected Syria's government of involvement in the killing, and a popular uprising ensued. When Syria capitulated and withdrew its troops, many hoped the move would free the Lebanese to decide their own affairs.

In some ways, that's just what happened. More than ever before, Hezbollah turned the goodwill engendered by its social-services work into political might.

After Syria withdrew, Hezbollah leaders asked Mr. Saheli and 11 others to run for seats in Lebanon's 128-member Parliament. Under the banner of Hezbollah's political party, Loyalty to the Resistance, they won easily. Hezbollah's top leader, Hassan Nasrallah, also became more active on the national stage.

Together they reshaped Lebanon's political agenda with a mixture of bare-knuckle politics and occasional compromise. The top priority, says Mr. Saheli, was derailing the international effort to force Hezbollah to disarm. That effort was embodied two years ago in U.N. Security Council Resolution 1559, which among other things demanded that all Lebanese militias turn in their weapons.

Mr. Saheli, 39, grew up in Hermel, a drab city of 100,000 on the northern edge of the Bekaa Valley, near the border with Syria. A Hezbollah supporter since his teens, he'd become a lawyer and member of his town's city council.

The number of seats Hezbollah could win in Parliament was limited by Lebanon's complex power-sharing formula. Even so, Mr. Saheli sensed the value of producing a big voter turnout for Hezbollah. The group's campaign efforts in effect turned the voting into a referendum on whether it should be able to keep its armed military wing.

During the three-week campaign, Mr. Saheli says, he visited up to 15 villages a day. Skipping other issues such as education, he hammered a single theme: Protect "the resistance," Hezbollah's term for its military wing. Often, he says, he ended speeches with a harangue against the U.S. "The Americans have a big project against the Arab world -- Iraq, now Syria and next Hezbollah. And we must resist."

Voters, especially in Shiite-dominated areas, loved it. When the results came in June 2005, Hezbollah and a few parties it had aligned with were huge winners, taking the maximum 35 parliamentary seats available to Shiite Muslims.

Though Hezbollah had fielded candidates in previous elections, it had always remained an opposition party. This time, Mr. Saheli and his bloc accepted an invitation to join a coalition government. They asked for two important ministries, energy and labor.

And they made another demand: that all major government decisions, including the question of Hezbollah's weapons, be decided through consensual agreement rather than by a straight vote of the cabinet ministers. Coalition partners -- the biggest was Future Movement, led by a son of the slain Mr. Hariri -- needed Shiite representation in their government, and agreed to the conditions. That gave Hezbollah the power to veto just about anything it opposed.

Hezbollah legislators pushed through approval for a $35 million drinking-water facility, a waste-disposal project of similar cost and a $68 million road project, all in the Shiite-heavy Bekaa Valley. On a recent afternoon, workers were laying asphalt on the new highway under a blazing sun. It will improve access to some elaborate Roman temple ruins, boosting tourism and jobs, Mr. Saheli says.

At a cabinet meeting in December, Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, a staunch critic of Syria, asked ministers to vote, without a debate, on a proposal to set up an international court to try people arrested for Mr. Hariri's murder. Hezbollah's two ministers, accusing Mr. Siniora of breaking his promise to make all decisions consensually, walked out.

When three ministers from another Shiite party followed this lead, the new government faced paralysis. The Hezbollah ministers set a tough condition for their return: a public statement from the Sunni prime minister calling Hezbollah's military wing a "resistance" movement rather than a "militia."

It's a key distinction. U.N. Resolution 1559 calls on all Lebanese militias to disarm. Mr. Siniora stood before Parliament a few weeks later and said his government would henceforth refer to Hezbollah only as a resistance movement.

Though Hezbollah's politicians had been victorious, the showdown left the organization wary. It now activated a fallback plan: an unlikely alliance with a former Lebanese general and Christian leader, Michel Aoun.

Tensions between Hezbollah and Lebanon's Christians have run deep ever since some Christian factions worked with the Israelis during the civil war. Mr. Aoun lived in exile for 15 years before returning to Lebanon last year. He was an outspoken foe of Syria's occupation and also advocated disarming Hezbollah. In exile, the 71-year-old ex-general also met with officials in the U.S. and France in an effort to create an international front against Hezbollah.

Those efforts stopped on Feb. 6, when Mr. Aoun and Hezbollah suddenly made a deal. It amounted to a simple trade-off: Mr. Aoun suspended his call to disarm Hezbollah, and the group agreed to support him as a future Lebanese president.

Mr. Aoun says he still believes Hezbollah will disarm someday. But he now calls this an "internal matter" for Lebanon and offers no timetable. "The U.S. isn't too happy with me anymore," he notes.

Mr. Saheli, asked about Mr. Aoun, says: "We have common interests."

Hezbollah still has vocal critics. Walid Jumblatt, leader of Lebanon's Druze religious sect, says, "We need to squeeze Hezbollah, put them in a corner." He blames the group for "paralyzing" the government. But he doesn't favor trying to disarm through force. "We don't want a civil war," he says.

Amid growing political and economic strain, there are new signs of sectarian tension in this land of so many different religious factions. Last month, a fight broke out between knife-wielding Druze and Shiite students at a university campus. A few days later, thousands of Shiite residents in Beirut rioted after a TV show mocked Mr. Nasrallah, Hezbollah's leader. Lebanese security forces moved to Christian neighborhoods to avert further trouble.

In his parliamentary office on a recent day, Mr. Saheli said sectarian strife is a big concern. But he maintained that this longstanding problem, as well as the issue of Hezbollah's arms, must be resolved through democracy and national dialogue.

At Least 20 Killed In Mogadishu Battles (WP)

By Guled Mohamed

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia, July 9 -- Islamic militiamen attacked fighters loyal to defeated secular warlords in Mogadishu on Sunday, and at least 20 people were killed and scores wounded in heavy street battles, witnesses said.

The death toll was expected to rise in the most serious flare-up since the militiamen seized control of the Somali capital from U.S.-backed warlords a month ago.

Mogadishu's war-weary residents ran for cover as rival groups fired machine guns and pounded each other with mortar rounds near an area that had been a pocket of warlord resistance to the Islamic militiamen.

"I am fighting for Islam, and I don't fear dying," said Ahmed Hashi, a militiaman who suffered head injuries.

The Islamic militias, wanting complete control of the coastal capital, set a daybreak ambush for fighters loyal to Hussein Aideed, an interior minister in the interim government, and another warlord, Abdi Awale Qaybdiid.

As they put up checkpoints around the area to prevent the militiamen from escaping or receiving help, both warlords vowed that their men would fight to the end.

Aideed, speaking from the provincial town of Baidoa, where the interim government is based, said: "They took over one of our bases in the Hosh area of western Mogadishu, which was in our hands for the last 15 years. . . . We won't give up."

Staff members at one of Mogadishu's main hospitals said victims were pouring in on the back of pickup trucks in scenes reminiscent of battles earlier this year when Islamic fighters took over the city.

"Every five minutes, vehicles carrying wounded are coming in," said hospital administrator Ali Moallim, adding that 20 people had died and nearly 100 were wounded, many with serious gunshot wounds, some requiring amputation.

After the June 5 capture of Mogadishu, the Islamic militiamen took other towns across a large swath of southern Somalia. Their advance has challenged the aspirations of the Western-backed interim government, which was formed in Kenya in 2004 and is based in Baidoa because it is too weak to enter Mogadishu.

Talks between the government and Islamic militias are scheduled to begin Saturday in Sudan.

Most of the warlords who had run Mogadishu since the 1991 ouster of military dictator Mohamed Siad Barre surrendered or fled after their defeat in last month's battles, in which 350 people were killed, but pockets of fighters loyal to them hung on.

Sunday's battle ended a relative lull in violence for Somalis.

Mexican Runner-Up Files Legal Challenge (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

MEXICO CITY, July 9 -- Legal advisers to the presidential election runner-up, Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, gathered Sunday evening at a polling place guarded by soldiers toting machine guns and filed a formal challenge to Mexico's vote results.

The filing demands a vote-by-vote recount of the closest presidential election in Mexican history, which was decided Thursday when an official tally left Lopez Obrador, the populist former mayor of Mexico City, a half-percentage-point behind Felipe Calderon, a champion of free trade. Outside the polling place, Manuel Camacho Solis, a top Lopez Obrador strategist, accused election officials, as well as the administration of outgoing President Vicente Fox, of election violations that were "systematic and on a grand scale."

Lopez Obrador chose a polling place in the Colonia del Valle neighborhood, a Calderon stronghold, because his strategists consider it emblematic of what they call a stolen election.

"We wanted to file in a place where they were operating," said Gerardo Fernandez, spokesman for Lopez Obrador's Democratic Revolutionary Party.Calderon and his campaign team kept a low profile over the weekend, saying they prefer to argue in court. Calderon has said there is "no doubt" about his 240,000-vote margin of victory and has received congratulatory calls from President Bush and other world leaders.

Lopez Obrador's challenge will be heard by the Federal Electoral Tribunal, a seven-member special elections court, which has until Sept. 6 to decide whether to certify the results. The complaint consists of thousands of pages of documents, including e-mails that allegedly show that enrollment in social programs was used to coerce votes for Calderon.

The tribunal will also receive what Lopez Obrador says is evidence of an Internet smear campaign against him and examples of alleged illegal campaigning by Fox, who, as president, was prohibited by law from involvement in political campaigns. Lopez Obrador is also expected to use the complaint to resurrect one of his most effective campaign issues: allegations that Calderon's brother-in-law received sweetheart government contracts.

The challenge will assert, Camacho said, that the brother-in-law, Diego Zavala, was hired to develop software to review voter registration. Lopez Obrador's supporters say the contract created a conflict of interest that could have been used to give Calderon an improper advantage.

In an interview before the election, the head of the electoral commission, Luis Carlos Ugalde, denied contracting with Zavala's company, known as Hildebrando.

During the campaign, Calderon and his brother-in-law vigorously denied wrongdoing.

Lopez Obrador also alleges that the electoral commission preprogrammed its computers before the election to show a Calderon victory. Electoral commission officials on Sunday denied the accusation.

Mexico Candidate Claiming Election Fraud (AP)

By Istra Pacheco, Associated Press Writer

AP, July 10, 2006

Leftist presidential candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador was sending hundreds of pages of purported evidence of fraud Sunday to a court he hoped would overturn his conservative rival's razor-thin preliminary victory.

Lopez Obrador said his lawyers would give the Federal Electoral Court evidence of fraud, including computerized manipulation of the results, a day after he called for continued hope from supporters at a mammoth rally in Mexico City's historic center.

The legal appeal would seek not to annul the July 2 election, but to force authorities to conduct a manual recount of all 41 million ballots.

"This was a very irregular election and we are asking that they count vote by vote to legitimize the president elect," Gerardo Fernandez, a spokesman for Lopez Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party, said outside the tribunal Sunday night as he waited for lawyers to arrive.

"We won't recognize Calderon's triumph unless they legitimize the election," he said.

Dozens of reporters waited outside the nation's top electoral court as the lawyers' expected arrival was repeatedly delayed. Three soldiers kept watch over a scene that was calm in contrast to Saturday's massive gathering.

Fernandez said the lawyers were held up by making copies of the 800 pages of allegations.

Election officials said Thursday that Felipe Calderon beat Lopez Obrador by less than 244,000 votes in the July 2 election — or a margin of just 0.6 percent.

But Lopez Obrador contends some of his votes weren't counted or were voided without reason. He has millions of devoted followers who believe only he can help Mexico's poor and downtrodden, and he has long used street protests to pressure the government and courts.

Lopez Obrador's claims also include allegations that President Vicente Fox used government funds to support Calderon, the candidate of Fox's conservative National Action Party.

Fox has denied interfering in the elections, and election monitors from the European Union said they found no irregularities in the vote count.

But fraud allegations strike a sensitive nerve with many Mexicans. They question whether Mexico has overcome decades of institutional corruption and fraud that long favored the ruling party — the Institutional Revolutionary Party for 71 years until it lost the presidency to Fox in 2000.

Lopez Obrador has sought to stoke those fears. On Saturday, he accused the respected Federal Electoral Institute, held up as an example to emerging democracies around the world, of being a "pawn of the party of the right."

Over 100,000 supporters rallying in the capital's main plaza Saturday chanted "Vote by vote!"

Turning to his charges that Fox unfairly aided Calderon, Lopez Obrador said the popular president "dedicated himself to attacking us and ended up being a complete traitor of democracy."

Representatives for Fox and Calderon were not immediately available to comment. Fox has stayed out of the public eye for two weeks in an effort to avoid accusations that he was meddling in the debate.

Lopez Obrador, a former Mexico City mayor, has said a software program was used to skew initial vote-count reports — a charge that revives memories of the alleged computer crash that flipped Mexico's 1988 election in favor of the then-ruling PRI.

Legal challenges were built into Mexico's elections process in recent years to help ensure clean elections, so Calderon can't be declared president-elect until the electoral court weighs allegations of fraud or unfair campaign practices. The court has until Sept. 6 to declare a winner.

The law allows a manual recount only for polling places where credible evidence of irregularities exist. Lopez Obrador's supporters say that applies to at least 50,000 of the approximately 130,000 polling stations.

"We are going to ask that they clean up the elections. We are going to ask that they count all the votes, vote-by-vote, poll-by-poll," Lopez Obrador said.

Despite the EU monitoring team's characterization of the vote count as fair, the leftist claimed election fraud was worse than under the PRI, which often using fraud to hold power.

Calderon says the vote was clean and has taken congratulatory phone calls from President Bush and the leaders of Canada, Spain and Colombia, among others — despite Lopez Obrador's plea for foreign governments to hold off on recognizing the result.

Lopez Obrador has repeatedly evaded questions about whether he would accept a court decision that went against him.

He provoked groans of disappointment from the crowd at the Zocalo in Mexico City when he told them not to block highways.

"This has been and goes on being a peaceful movement," he said. "We are not going to fall for any provocations."

Also Sunday, the Federal Electoral Institute wrapped up congressional vote tallies, determining the number of seats for each party.

According to National Action Party representative Jorge Zermeno, 206 seats in the 500-member lower house will go to Calderon's conservative party, 127 seats will go to Lopez Obrador's party, and 103 seats will go to the PRI. Minor parties have the 64 remaining seats.

López Obrador Ups Stakes On Mexico Poll (FT)

By Adam Thomson

Financial Times, July 10, 2006

The leftwing candidate in Mexico's presidential election at the weekend raised the pressure on the country's electoral authorities by openly claiming this month's vote had been fraudulent.

Calling on Mexicans to initiate a wave of nationwide protests, Andrés Manuel López Obrador of the Party of the Democratic Revolution (PRD) told an estimated quarter of a million people in Mexico City's main square: "If we allow them to impose themselves through fraud, it will be a regression to the past."

In one of the most impassioned speeches he has given yet, the charismatic 52-year-old campaigner asked supporters from Mexico's 300 electoral districts to march on the capital on Wednesday. He also called for another rally in Mexico City next Sunday.

Mr López Obrador's accusations follow a tense vote-count last week that handed victory to Felipe Calderón of the centre-right National Action party (PAN). According to the country's electoral authorities Mr Calderón, a 43-year-old Harvard-trained economist, beat Mr López Obrador by just 0.58 per cent. On Friday, several governments, including that of the US, sent messages of congratulations to Mr Calderón, the candidate of choice for Mexico's business community. The country's stock market and currency last week showed strong gains on the news.

But Mr López Obrador said he would submit evidence of foul play in the July 2 election to the electoral authorities. "This election process is not over yet," he said. Electoral authorities have until the end of August to weigh the evidence, and have to announce their decision by September 6. Mr López Obrador also accused President Vicente Fox of Mr Calderón's PAN of being "a traitor to democracy". Mr Fox, who is scheduled to leave office in December, was voted into power six years ago in an election that ended more than 70 years of rule by the Institutional Revolutionary party.

There is a widespread perception that the vote was rigged, and all last week demonstrators outside Mr López Obrador's campaign headquarters vowed to take their protests as far as necessary to reverse the result.

Leftist Is To Press Challenge Of Mexico's Election (WSJ)

By John Lyons And José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the left-wing candidate narrowly defeated in Mexico's presidential race, launched a legal campaign late last night to overturn the results, mixing allegations of vote fraud with broader claims that the election process was unfair.

The legal challenges came a day after Mr. López Obrador held a rally in Mexico City, kicking off the first of several protests he hopes will pressure election authorities to accede to his demands. Mr. López Obrador wants to nullify the results from more than a third of the 130,500 polling stations, and is demanding that all 41 million ballots be hand-counted a second time.

The 52-year-old former Mexico City mayor lost a July 2 vote by a slim margin -- around 240,000 votes -- to Felipe Calderón, 43, the candidate of President Vicente Fox's pro-market National Action Party, according to an official hand count conducted by Mexican poll workers and party representatives. Although he initially said the vote was clean, Mr. López Obrador has lashed out at election officials, Mr. Calderón, President Fox, and big business since the results were announced, claiming they formed a conspiracy to deny him victory.

"I won the presidency," Mr. López Obrador said early yesterday at a news conference. "I am going to defend our victory. This isn't over." The message was partly meant for the stream of heads of state, including Spain's socialist Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero and President Bush, who have extended congratulations to Mr. Calderón.

Despite his rhetoric, analysts say the veteran politician faces an uphill battle both to win a court ruling to overturn the election as well as to galvanize Mexicans into taking to the streets to support him. "López Obrador is now in the uncomfortable position of complaining about things that he said were fine at the time," said Federico Reyes-Heroles, a political analyst and writer in Mexico City.

Whatever the outcome, the dispute is likely to further polarize a divided nation, making governing more tricky for the next president.

Mr. López Obrador's legal challenges mark the first major test for the nation's special electoral tribunal, set up in the 1990s as the ultimate authority on electoral disputes as part of an effort to stamp out fraud. The court earned a reputation for flexing its muscle in 2000, when it annulled a local election in Mr. López Obrador's home state of Tabasco.

Now, the leftist is asking the electoral court to order a recount. In his legal complaint, delivered to the court late last night, he was expected to ask that the results from as many as 50,000 polling stations be thrown out for reasons including vote buying. He also was expected to ask the court to rule that the election was unfairly tilted against him by the meddling of President Fox and the collusion of electoral officials.

Mr. López Obrador's camp argues that Mr. Fox illegally campaigned for Mr. Calderón through government-sponsored advertisements touting the achievements of his government. Under Mexican law, a president can't endorse or campaign for a candidate. Mr. López Obrador may also argue that the Calderón camp surpassed spending limits to launch an illegal negative advertising campaign.

Leftist Starts Legal Battle Over Mexico Vote (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

MEXICO CITY, July 9 — A day after calling for mass demonstrations, Mexico's leftist presidential candidate began a legal battle on Sunday evening to try to overturn the results of the close presidential race.

The candidate, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, a former Mexico City mayor who campaigned on promises to reduce poverty, was planning to formally challenge the results in a single election district in the capital that went to the conservative winner of the election, Felipe Calderón. The act was largely symbolic, but his aides said other challenges would be submitted to local election boards and to the Federal Electoral Tribunal before midnight Monday.

Mr. López Obrador's lawyers contend that the initial count of the ballots, on election night a week ago, was careless. In some cases, they also assert that poll workers purposefully inflated Mr. Calderón's totals. Mr. López Obrador is calling for a complete recount in about 50,000 of the 130,000 polling places, where he contends he has evidence of irregularities or fraud.

"They counted the votes, but badly," said Mr. López Obrador, of the Party of the Democratic Revolution. "What we are asking is that they count the votes once again, polling place by polling place."

On Thursday, election officials determined that Mr. Calderón won the election by a narrow margin of 240,000 votes of 41 million cast. Although the Federal Electoral Tribunal has yet to ratify the official tally, Mr. Calderón has declared himself the winner and has received congratulations from the White House, Canada and the European Union.

Mr. López Obrador remains convinced he won and refuses to concede defeat. He is preparing legal challenges to present to both the Federal Electoral Tribunal and the Supreme Court.

At a rally of 150,000 people in the capital's central square on Saturday, he called on his supporters to stage two large marches this week to protest the outcome. Earlier, he told reporters he would mount a sustained campaign of peaceful protests.

As worries grew here that the marches could turn violent over time, the European Commission on Sunday called on both sides to show restraint while the courts dealt with the legal challenges.

The election results contain some oddities that Mr. López Obrador's lawyers hope to use to force a recount or, possibly, to annul the election. There were 900,000 "null votes," in which the voter's intention was unclear to poll workers. Since that number is unusually large and enough to change the outcome, lawyers for Mr. López Obrador's party contend that each ballot should be re-examined.

Second, there were numerous instances during the unofficial tally on Sunday night and Monday morning in which poll workers reported to the electoral institute's headquarters more votes for Mr. Calderón than he had actually received, especially in northern states where the conservative candidate's National Action Party is strong. Mr. López Obrador has said that pattern is evidence of fraud. Mr. Calderón's aides denied the party had committed any wrongdoing.

Finally, during the official tally on Wednesday and Thursday, the chiefs of local election boards uniformly rejected requests from Mr. López Obrador's representatives to recount ballots in thousands of polling places where there were irregularities.

Instead, the election officials stuck to the letter of the electoral law, which requires a recount only if a tally sheet is lost or contains an error or the ballot box appears to have been damaged. The law does not prohibit recounts for other causes, but it does not spell out the conditions either.

In about 2,600 polling places, election officials did recount ballots because of mistakes on tally sheets. Mr. López Obrador pointed out that in a vast majority of those cases, the counts were off.

Martín Ramírez, a spokesman for the electoral tribunal, said the court could not ratify the official tally and recognize Mr. Calderón as president-elect until it had ruled on all of Mr. López Obrador's legal challenges. By law the court must certify a new president by Sept. 6.

By late Sunday afternoon, the tribunal still had not received the official results from the Federal Electoral Institute, Mr. Ramírez said.

John M. Ackerman, an expert on electoral laws at the National Autonomous University of Mexico, said because electoral laws were relatively untested, it was hard to predict Mr. López Obrador's chances of success.

The electoral tribunal was empowered in 1996 to validate presidential elections. The only opportunity it has had to use those powers was in 2000, when President Vicente Fox of the National Action Party handily defeated the candidate of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, ending 71 years of its single-party rule.

Mr. Ackerman said that in the tribunal's short history it had ordered broad, though not complete, recounts in state and local elections. The largest recount, he said, was six years ago in the state of Jalisco, where the race was so tight and fiercely contested that the state was compared to Florida in 2000.

Mr. Ackerman also said the tribunal had not hesitated in the past to reverse decisions by the Federal Electoral Institute.

Mr. López Obrador has proved unpredictable himself. He is known for the demonstrations he staged in 1994 to protest his loss in the governor's race in his home state of Tabasco, charging that the governing party had committed fraud at the polls.

Now he has stepped up his accusations against President Fox, Mr. Calderón and their party, the PAN, saying they are betraying the democracy they helped create and engaging in the same fraudulent practices as the old governing party, the PRI. He also contends that Mr. Fox used state resources to help Mr. Calderón's campaign, a claim both men deny.

Haves And Have-Nots (NSWK)

By Joseph Contreras And Monica Campbell

Newsweek, July 10, 2006

The words on his T shirt read SMILE, WE'RE GOING TO WIN, but Abraham Flores was all frowns. Earlier in the day, the 24-year-old moving-company employee had voted for Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the former Mexico City mayor who ran for president on a pledge to help Mexico's poor. But preliminary returns looked grim. So Flores filed into the famous Zócalo plaza in downtown Mexico City with hundreds of other angry voters to demand a recount. "If the elites get their way and López Obrador doesn't win, they'll hope the Mexican people will forget and go on with their lives," fumed the $10-a-day laborer. "But I doubt that will happen. We're sick of the elites trying to rule the country."

By the weekend, Flores's worst fears were confirmed: final tallies showed Felipe Calderón of the center-right National Action Party (PAN) defeating López Obrador by a mere 244,000 votes. It was Mexico's closest-ever presidential race. The ex-mayor announced plans to challenge the tally in court, and the federal election tribunal has until early September to certify or annul Calderón's apparent win. But no matter how the dispute plays out, the vote confirms an emerging trend in Latin America: a sharpening divide between haves and have-nots. "There are the people without running water and basic services, and those who can afford flats in New York City," says Juan Carlos Moreno-Brid of the U.N. Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean. "But this isn't just Mexico's challenge. Latin America is the most unequal region in the world."

Class tensions are certainly rising in Bolivia, where socialist Evo Morales won a landslide victory last December. Residents of the more prosperous provinces approved a ballot measure last week calling for greater autonomy from the central government. In Peru, voters split sharply along class lines in last month's runoff election: the private sector overwhelmingly backed ex-president (and eventual winner) Alan García against the populist challenge of a former Army officer. "In southern Mexico and Peru you have a lot of people who haven't enjoyed any of the benefits of globalization, and there's a great degree of anger and frustration," says Michael Shifter of the Washington-based Inter-American Dialogue think tank.

The fragmentation is not universal. Robust growth has helped foster consensus in countries like Colombia, Chile, Argentina and Brazil. But Mexico proves that growth alone is not a solution for class divisions. The Mexican economy expanded by 4.4 percent in 2004 and 3 percent in 2005. But almost half of the country's 107 million people still live in poverty, and inequalities are likely to widen before they narrow. Latin America's recent run of strong growth may peter out next year, particularly if the U.S. economy sputters. That would increase pressure on Calderón—who garnered only 36 percent of the total vote and is facing an opposition-led Congress. His first task may be to appease the many voters who feel cheated.

The Good Neighbor Strategy (TIME)

By MOISéS NAíM

Time, July 10, 2006

A presidential election too close to call. Aggrieved voters in the streets. Partisans exchanging accusations of fraud and demanding manual recounts. Lawyers drooling in expectation of weeks of court fights.

Sound familiar? It should. Mexico City today feels a lot like Tallahassee, Fla., six year ago. But Mexico's election is about much more than who will become the country's next President, and its result will have lasting implications for Latin America as a whole. In 2000, although U.S. voters were choosing between two very different presidential candidates, only a minority felt that the outcome would drastically alter the basic foundations of the nation. Not so for Mexicans. Voters believed the election would not only decide who would run the country for six years but also, more fundamentally, what kind of political and economic system Mexico would have. The platforms of the two leading candidates--the conservative Felipe CalderÃ³n and the leftist AndrÃ©s Manuel LÃ³pez Obrador--differed on the roles of the state vs. the market, the nature of political institutions, how to fight poverty and what kinds of links Mexico should have with the rest of the world.

That clash of visions is not confined to Mexico. Similar battles are raging throughout Latin America, which is witnessing the rise of a generation of politicians seeking to capitalize on frustration with the free-market, pro-American policies commonly pursued in the region in the 1990s, when much was promised and little was accomplished in terms of raising living standards. The leader of this turn toward populism is Venezuelan President Hugo ChÃ¡vez, who has cast himself as the heir to Fidel Castro, using his country's oil bonanza to purchase political influence all over the continent. But in recent months, the ChÃ¡vez movement has run up against opposition from forces that view it as wrongheaded, militaristic and undemocratic. In Mexico's election, as in Peru's last month, ChÃ¡vez turned out to be more of a liability than an asset to the leftist candidate carrying his banner.

That ambivalence provides an opportunity for the U.S. The issues fueling the ChÃ¡vez movement--poverty, inequality, exclusion, corruption and widespread frustration--haven't gone away. Despite the perorations of populists like ChÃ¡vez and Castro, Latin America's maladies are not made in Washington but are self-inflicted wounds originating in the predatory Ã©lites that control policymaking in places like Buenos Aires, Caracas, BrasÃ-lia and Mexico City. Those are problems for which Washington has never had the skills or the means to influence. On the whole, the U.S. is better off letting Latin Americans figure out how to solve Latin America's problems.

But indifference has its costs too. After Sept. 11, the U.S.'s priorities of fighting Islamic terrorism and waging wars in Afghanistan and Iraq have led the Bush Administration to ignore Latin America as mostly irrelevant, which has allowed leaders like ChÃ¡vez to attack U.S. policies at will and sully Washington's reputation in the region. But the U.S. can still repair much of the damage--if it takes two bold initiatives that would break through the shortsighted policies that limit its opportunities in Latin America.

The first step toward draining the appeal of ChÃ¡vezism and restoring the U.S.'s image in Latin America would be to unilaterally lift the embargo on Cuba. The U.S. embargo has never worked as a tool to weaken Castro. Instead it has provided him with a wonderful excuse to hide his failures and justify the island's dire poverty and harsh political repression. The embargo is even less effective now that Cuba is so deeply intertwined economically and politically with Venezuela and other countries in the region. Embargoing Cuba without cutting off its ties to other countries is akin to staging an embargo against Portugal that ignores its ties to the rest of Europe. The U.S. embargo on Cuba has enormous political costs for the U.S. and no benefit other than pleasing a portion, but not all, of Cuban-American voters. Moreover, for the U.S. to maintain an embargo on Cuba while embracing Vietnam--a communist state with which the U.S. fought a long and costly war--and promoting trade and investment with Hanoi represents a blatant double standard that provides ammunition to U.S. detractors everywhere.

Another strategic surprise would be to engage the largest, most influential country in South America: Brazil. For decades U.S. policy toward Latin America has been driven by emergencies and a small-country bias: Cuba, the tiny Central American nations, Grenada and Haiti have all consumed far more of Washington's time and resources than giant Brazil, which was too big, remote and independent to be a pawn in the cold war. The only significant departure from the U.S.'s small-country bias has been with Mexico, first in the creation of NAFTA and then when Washington bailed the country out after its financial crash in 1994. Paying attention to Brazil would involve offering an attractive trade agreement that would grant freer access to the U.S. market for Brazilian steel, shoes, orange juice, ethanol and other products that currently face import barriers. The costs for the U.S. economy would be relatively minimal. For Brazil, such a deal would stimulate exports, drive investment and lift the economy.

Even more important, such an approach would reward and support a country (and a government) that is providing a powerful counterexample to the populist policies that are gaining favor in the region. That could be a very inclusive initiative: any Latin American country could be invited to join the two leading nations in the western hemisphere in this agreement. To be eligible, countries would need to adopt pro-poor, growth-inducing economic reforms that spur competition and open markets. They would also be required to enact political reforms that strengthen democratic practices and institutions. It could be a powerful stimulus for positive change, since few countries in the region could afford to be left out of an economic arrangement that included Brazil and the U.S.

Would this Administration be willing to pursue either of these moves? At this stage it doesn't seem likely. The first measure would provoke howls from many Cuban exiles in Florida, while the second would irk U.S. business interests that would face competition from Brazilian imports. But if Richard Nixon could go to China, perhaps George W. Bush could discover Brazil--and stop making a failed Caribbean dictator an important element of U.S. policy. It could be that an embattled, second-term U.S. President looking for a legacy other than a botched attempt at installing democracy in faraway lands could warm up to the idea of leaving a permanent, positive mark in his country's own neighborhood.

Saudi Arabia Tests Its Potential For Unlocking Heavy-Oil Reserves (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree And Russell Gold

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

With global energy demand soaring, Saudi Arabia, whose abundant reserves of light oil have supplied the world for decades, is looking to unlock its huge, hard-to-tap and largely unexploited reservoirs of heavy crude.

If it succeeds in overcoming the technical hurdles, the effort could significantly increase Saudi Arabia's oil reserves over the next several years, potentially adding some slack to tight energy markets. It would also be a blow to so-called peak-oil theorists who have forecast that world oil production is on the brink of peaking.

Crude-oil prices have more than tripled since 2002 as increases in global demand have outstripped production capacity. On Wednesday, crude-oil futures on the New York Mercantile Exchange reached a new high, settling at $75.19 a barrel before slipping back to finish the week at $74.09.

While there is still plenty of oil left in the ground, most of the supplies that are easy to reach already have been developed, forcing the global petroleum industry to turn to oil deposits that are trickier to recover. Heavy oils, which can be the consistency of molasses, or even denser, are costlier to bring to the surface than light oils. They also typically contain more contaminants like metals and sulfur.

Because refineries need special equipment to remove these impurities, heavy oil is priced lower than light oil. But a growing number of refineries around the world can handle heavy oil, turning it into such products as gasoline, diesel, jet fuel and heating oil, and Saudi Arabia recently announced plans to build more of them.

Earlier this year, in a critical trial of Saudi Arabia's heavy-oil potential, U.S. oil giant Chevron Corp. began a field trial of a technique designed to pump out heavy oil that was previously considered unrecoverable. In the pilot project, which it plans to expand to additional wells, Chevron is injecting steam to loosen up sludge-like heavy-oil reserves in Wafra, a field in the so-called neutral zone between Saudi Arabia and Kuwait. Oil from the neutral zone is shared equally by the two countries.

Chevron and the Saudis say initial results are promising and that the technique could greatly enhance recovery at some huge fields.

Saudi Oil Minister Ali Naimi said many heavy-oil fields in his country aren't currently included in its official tally of 260 billion barrels of recoverable reserves, the world's largest. If steam injection works in these fields, it would add "tens of billion of barrels" to Saudi reserves, Mr. Naimi said in an interview.

Chevron has used steam injections successfully for decades to greatly boost production in heavy-oil fields in California and Indonesia. Now, the Saudis and Chevron want to see if the technique will work in the more porous rock formations common in Middle East.

In addition to the Wafra test with Chevron, the Saudis are also considering developing the gigantic Manifa field, which is believed to have a large component of heavy oil. As its lighter components are pumped out, Manifa could also be a candidate for steam injection.

Without steam, heavy oil can be very difficult to pry out of the earth because it is so thick it barely flows. Heavy-oil fields sometimes yield as little as 5% of their oil with conventional pumping, compared with 35% or more in a light-oil deposit.

In some ultra-heavy-oil fields -- like the massive Canadian tar-sands deposits, where production is rapidly gearing up -- the oil is far heavier than in Saudi Arabia. Oil companies there are using a similar steam-injection technique, with even more heat, to make the oil extractable.

Rising world demand has taken up all of Saudi Arabia's light-oil output at a time when the kingdom's need for oil is rising sharply at home as it industrializes. Mr. Naimi, the Saudi minister, wants to tap the country's heavy-oil deposits to meet the country's own energy needs and to feed thirsty foreign markets by refining the oil into such products as gasoline.

The Wafra pilot is also a big test for Chevron, which wants to build on its long track record of developing heavy-oil fields in hard sandstone and shale rock formations. In century-old oil fields outside Bakersfield, Calif., Chevron has used steam injection for years to drastically increase the amount of oil that can be pulled out of the earth, radically extending the productive life of the fields.

"It's all about draining the tank to the bottom," says Jeff Hatlen, a Chevron engineer. Using steam, Chevron has managed to extract 80% of the oil from some reservoirs in the California oil fields, compared with 15% in the pre-steam days.

The Saudis hope for a similar boost in recovery. Using conventional pumping, Wafra is expected to yield only 3% of the billion barrels in its reservoir. But after steaming, as much as 40% could be pumped out.

Operating costs in Chevron's California heavy-oil fields were $14 a barrel last year, well above costs in the Middle East. That suggests that the Saudis could pay a premium to extract their heavy-oil deposits and still make a huge profit.

Unlike California's deposits, however, most of the Middle East's heavy oil is locked inside carbonite formations, where steam injection has never been tested on a large scale. If the steam leaks out through fissures in this softer rock, it would be difficult to build up the high temperatures needed to melt the heavy oil. It would also make the process more costly, since it takes lot of natural gas to make the steam.

The Chevron technique is to inject steam into a field through one well, soaking the oil-rich rock. As the steam heats the thick oil, its consistency thins to that of watery syrup. Then, the oil is pumped to the surface through another well.

Chevron's test in Saudi Arabia involves one steam-injection well, four producing wells and one observation well that collects data about the interaction of the oil and steam. Though it declined to give a timetable, Chevron is committed to expanding to a larger second phase that will include 16 injection wells and 25 producing wells as well as the installation of water-treatment facilities and steam-generation facilities. Total estimated cost: $300 million.

Chevron isn't alone in trying to use steam flooding in the Mideast. In Oman, Occidental Petroleum Corp. is preparing to spend $2 billion on a large-scale steam-injection project in the Mukhaizna field, which holds about a billion barrels of oil. After four years of negotiations, Occidental persuaded the Omanis to let it run the field, in part by promising them a ten-fold increase in production to 150,000 barrels a day.

Although it hasn't specified it will use steam flooding, Kuwait is planning a pilot project to exploit its northern heavy-oil fields. These fields are needed to help Kuwait meet its goal of raising output to some four million barrels a day by 2020 from the current 2.6 million barrels a day.

Three years ago, the U.S. Geological Survey estimated the world has more than one trillion barrels of heavy oil, mostly in Canada, Venezuela and elsewhere in the Western Hemisphere. Taken together, these reserves are comparable to the world's conventional light-oil reserves, the majority of which are in the Eastern Hemisphere.

But some experts believe the amount of heavy oil in the Middle East has been underestimated because of the focus on the giant deposits of light oil in the region. "They have quite a bit, and there is probably more heavy oil in the Middle East than the official figures show," says Emil D. Attanasi, an economist at the Geological Survey.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Rep. Hoekstra Raises Concerns Over Congressional Oversight Of Intelligence. Highlighting what it characterizes as a "rift" between the White House and GOP lawmakers the New York Times (7/9, A1, Lichtblau, Shane, 1.19M) in a front page story reports, "In a sharply worded letter to President Bush in May, an important Congressional ally charged that the administration might have violated the law by failing to inform Congress of some secret intelligence programs and risked losing Republican support on national security matters." House Intelligence Chairman Peter Hoesktra's letter "did not specify the intelligence activities that he believed had been hidden from Congress." He "clearly was referring to programs that have not been publicly revealed." Administration officials have recently briefed Rep. Hoekstra, which appears "to have eased but not erased the concerns of Mr. Hoekstra and other lawmakers about whether the administration is sharing information on all of its intelligence operations." Hoekstra's letter "appears" to be linked to the selection of Gen. Michael Hayden to lead the CIA with Stephen Kappes as his deputy."

Like the New York Times, the Washington Post (7/9, A6, Babington, 744K) highlights the significance of Hoektra's "sharply worded letter" because it represents rare GOP criticism of Administration national security policies before noting, "Much of Hoekstra's letter to Bush outlined the chairman's objections -- which were widely known -- to the appointment of Stephen R. Kappes as CIA deputy director under Hayden. Kappes quit the CIA in 2004 in a dispute with then-Director Porter J. Goss. Goss preceded Hoekstra as House intelligence committee chairman, and many Republicans remain loyal to him." Hoekstra wrote, "Regrettably…the appointment of Mr. Kappes sends a clear signal that the days of collaborative reform between the White House and this committee may be over."

Journalism Deans Advocate Publishing National Security Secrets As Counterbalance To "Extraordinary Power Of The Presidency." A letter from four deans of leading US journalism schools is published in the Washington Post (7/9, B2, 744K) Outlook section. Annenberg School for Communication dean Geoffrey Cowan, dean, University of Southern California, Harvard University Shorenstein Center director Alex Jones, Northwestern University Medill School of Journalism dean John Lavine, Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism dean Nicholas Lemann and UCal Berkeley Graduate School of Journalism dean Orville Schell write, "It is the business -- and the responsibility -- of the press to reveal secrets." The deans maintain "Despite the rhetoric of their fiercest critics, most journalists take secrets seriously." They "believe that the extraordinary power of the presidency at this moment mandates more scrutiny rather than less. Yet Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales has said he would consider prosecuting journalists for publishing classified information. Such an action would threaten to tilt the balance between disclosure and secrecy in a direction that would weaken watchdog reporting at a time when it is badly needed."

Columnist Accuses Administration Of Intimidating Media. Frank Rich in his column in the New York Times (7/9, 1.19M) warns the Administration has an "insidious game plan" to "reboot its intimidation of the press, hoping journalists will pull punches in an election year." Rich claims that strategy worked for the Administration after the 9/11 attacks citing the "chilling words articulated at the get-go by Ari Fleischer (Americans must 'watch what they say') carried over to the run-up to the Iraq war, when the administration's W.M.D. claims went unchallenged by most news organizations."

Notes May Have Aided Gitmo Suicides. The CBS Evening News (7/8, story 6, 0:10, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "US officials say three inmates who killed themselves last month at the Guantanamo prison may have had help from other inmates. In a court filing officials found instructions for tying knots in the cell of other detainees who may have been planning suicides."

Following a Washington Post story yesterday, the New York Times (7/9, Cave, 1.19M) reports, "Detainees at the Guantánamo Bay detention center in Cuba may have planned three suicides there last month by exchanging messages on note paper that was provided by lawyers and generally not scrutinized by guards because of confidentiality rules." The Times adds, "Because all three of the men who died had never been visited by attorneys, government lawyers said the evidence 'indicated the passing of materials and messages between detainees and that some level of planning or coordination of the suicides had taken place.'"

The AP (7/9, Fox) adds, "The detention center's commander, Navy Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris, said in an affidavit that investigators believe 'the suicides may have been part of a larger plan or pact for more suicides that day or in the immediate future.'" The detainees lawyers "have condemned the confiscation of the legal papers" and one note on the suicides "did not appear to be written by the prisoner, or another of the detainees who committed suicide, and it was written on paper provided by lawyers stamped with the words 'Attorney-Client Privilege.'"

NYT, WPost Accuse Bush Administration Of Failing To Create "Fair" Legal Process For Terrorists. The New York Times (7/9, 1.19M) in an editorial writes that as Congress prepares to debate the Administration's detainee policies the debate "is not between people who want to win the war on terror and those who for some unfathomable reason do not. It is between an executive branch that seems bent on proving that the president has unlimited power and those who believe that the Constitution and the rule of law did not crumble along with the World Trade Center." The Times adds, "We would not be in this mess if Mr. Bush had followed the rules. If he had allowed the screening of captives on the battlefield, which the military wanted and the Geneva Conventions require, hundreds of innocent men would never have been sent to Gitmo. If he had asked Congress to create tribunals, instead of fashioning extralegal ones, some of those prisoners who really are terrorists might have been convicted by now in full view of the world."

And the Washington Post (7/9, B6, 744K) editorializes, "Having allowed President Bush to assert extralegal powers for nearly five years, some in Congress now want to rush through legislation that would rubber-stamp the regime that the court rejected. There is talk of completing a bill by summer's end. Some Republicans appear eager to turn what ought to be a serious debate about balancing national security and human rights into an election issue -- by labeling as soft on terrorism anyone who opposes Mr. Bush's unworkable scheme for trying Guantanamo inmates." But the Post finds it "encouraging" that "the Armed Services Committee under the chairmanship of Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) will take the legislative lead in the Senate. Mr. Warner's committee was the source last year of the sole piece of responsible legislation on foreign detainees since 2001, the ban on cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment of prisoners authored by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.)."

San Antonio Express News Urges Adherence To Rule Of Law In GWOT. The San Antonio Express News (7/9) editorializes, "Even in times of war, the United States is a nation of laws. When those laws are ill-suited to the conflict at hand, the commander in chief can work with Congress and the courts to modify them or create new laws. He may not simply ignore them. ... The Hamdan decision is the latest effort to restore a new equilibrium in this contentious debate."

Suspected Al Qaeda Arrested In Germany. The New York Times/AP (7/9) reports, "A German citizen of Moroccan descent" identified as Redouane E. H. "has been arrested in Hamburg on suspicion that he is a member of Al Qaeda with contacts to a man close to the Sept. 11 hijackers, federal prosecutors said Saturday." The man "is suspected of being in contact with Said Bahaji, who had close ties to the three Sept. 11 hijackers who lived and studied in Hamburg -- Mohamed Atta, Marwan al-Shehhi and Ziad al-Jarrah, Ms. Scheuten said. Mr. Bahaji is suspected of providing logistical support for the Hamburg cell but fled before the attacks and is thought to be in Pakistan. Ms. Scheuten said there was no evidence of direct contact between Redouane E. H. and the hijackers." He was arrested after officials gathered "information largely drawn from monitoring the suspect's conversations in online chat rooms."

19 Accused Of Plotting To Kill Westerners Acquitted In Yemen. The AP (7/9, Al-Haj) reports, "Nineteen alleged al-Qaida members accused of plotting to assassinate Westerners and blow up a hotel used by Americans were acquitted Saturday by a judge who also exonerated some of fighting U.S. troops in Iraq." They "were accused of forming a gang to assassinate Americans and Westerners in Yemen, and of joining the so-called holy war against the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq." But the judge ruled "the prosecution failed to provide 'adequate evidence that the defendants were plotting attacks against foreigners or planning to assassinate Americans in Yemen.'" Yemen Islamist affairs expert Mohammed al-Maqaleh "described the verdict as a 'shock' and a sign that President Ali Abdullah Saleh was trying to drum up support from Muslim radicals ahead of the coming presidential elections."

Rice Expresses Sorrow, Solidarity On Anniversary Of London Bombings. The AFP

DOJ_NMG_0039084

(7/9) reports, "The United States has expressed sorrow and solidarity with Britons in memory of the 52 people killed in London bombings a year ago, a day after the grim anniversary." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in a statement, "On the anniversary of their death we again mourn their loss and extend our condolences to their families." She also "recalled the United States shares with the people of Britain 'a deep bond of friendship that has stood the test of time.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Civil Rights Advocates Criticize US Pre-Emptive Terrorist Arrests. While government officials have used the recent terrorist-related arrests in Miami and New York as examples of success in pre-empting terrorist attacks, the New York Times (7/9, Lipton, 1.19M) says they "are inspiring a new round of skepticism from some lawyers who are openly questioning whether the government, in its zeal to stop terrorism, is forgetting an element central to any case: the actual intent to commit a crime." In an interview Friday Rep. Peter King "said that the cases also demonstrate that the authorities cannot always delay charges until they have built airtight criminal cases." King said, "It was essential that the F.B.I. get rid of its pre-9/11 mentality of not making an arrest until they have enough evidence to convict." But University of Richmond professor Carl Tobias, "who tracks terrorism cases, said the modest evidence disclosed so far in some recent cases in relation to the ability of the suspects to deliver on their threats has caused him to wonder if politics might be a factor." Tobias said, "There is some kind of public relations gained by making Americans on the one hand feel concerned that the Sears Tower in Chicago or some tunnel in Manhattan is targeted yet on the other hand feel comforted that the government is on top of it."

Terror Suspects Considered NY And CA Targets. Newsday (7/9, Bazzi) reports, "Before Assem Hammoud and his associates decided to try to bomb New York's PATH trains, they had considered several other targets: the Brooklyn Bridge, the Golden Gate Bridge and the forests of California, where they would set a huge fire, Lebanese security officials told Newsday." Lebanese police "found maps and other information about the two bridges and California forests when they raided Hammoud's home in Beirut." The article said of Hammoud, "In militant chat rooms, he was instructed not to grow a beard, wear Islamic clothing or show any outward sign of religious devotion. He was told to act like a typical Lebanese young man so he could avoid suspicions." He "did not disappoint his militant handlers, living a fast life in Beirut."

Lack Of Funding Leaves US Mass Transit Vulnerable To Terrorism. NBC Nightly News (7/8, story 5, 2:00, Holt, 9.87M) noted the revelation of a terrorist plot to attack New York City's tunnels "is raising questions about what if they had made it here and how vulnerable the nation's mass transit networks really are to attack." Rep. Peter King: "The subways and the commuter trains are always going to be the most difficult to provide security for." NBC (Allen): "Since the attacks in London and Madrid, US transit officials have been warning the nation needs to take more of the $18 billion spent to improve aviation security since 9/11 and spend more of it on the ground." Matt Bettenhausen, Director of California Homeland Security: "If they spent just 10% that they used in aviation security, we would be further along in meeting those needs."

Antiwar Protestors Arrested At NSA. The Washington Times/AP (7/9, Ben Nuckols) reports, "Thirteen anti-war activists were given citations yesterday for protesting outside the National Security Agency headquarters at Fort Meade." The AP adds, "Twenty-five persons participated in the protest, but only 13 who refused to stop carrying signs were cited, said Max Obuszewski, one of those cited and a member of the group Pledge of Resistance -- Baltimore. They carried a banner reading 'NSA = Crime Scene' and other signs protesting the agency's involvement in the war in Iraq."

New Orleans Real Estate Market Is Booming. The New York Times (7/9, Saulny, 1.19M) reports, "In a market spurred by speculators and bargain hunters, an extraordinarily large number of houses in the flood-ravaged metropolitan area here are being sold, according to real estate analysts, who say volume and sales prices exceed levels before Hurricane Katrina." While higher prices stem mostly from rising values in suburban areas or city sections which escaped flooding, flooded New Orleans houses are also selling, often at discounts of up to $50 a square foot. In the nine-parish area that includes New Orleans, 7,506 single-family homes were sold in the first half of this year, compared to 6,449 in the same period last year, while the average price this year is $221,244, up from $193,097 last year.

WAR NEWS:

Military Prepares For Onslaught Of Trials.

The press gave heavy coverage to the oncoming series of trials for alleged war crimes of US military personnel. NBC Nightly News (7/8, story 2, 2:30, Holt, 9.87M) reported that "the military's first report into the alleged murders of Iraqi civilians in Haditha, by American troops may be reverberating up the chain of command." NBC (Colt): "U.S. military officials tell NBC News, this investigation found some of the Marines filed false reports and that their commanders failed to follow-up when initially information did not match the evidence. The suggestion that some officers were derelict in their duty, already some battalion and company officers have been relieved of command and the investigation is not over." Gen. Barry McCaffrey (Ret.), NBC News military analyst: "Do we deal with it with transparency? Do we investigate and take corrective action? Then we reassure both the armed forces and the civilian population that we're going to do the right thing." Iraqi PM Nouri Al-Maliki: "Our people cannot tolerate this. Every day we are faced with heinous crimes causing distress. We must put an end to such practices." Colt: "There are at least five investigations underway into allegations of killings by American troops."

The New York Times (7/9, Worth, 1.19M) reports, "In the past month, new cases in Iraq have led to charges against 12 American servicemen who may face the death penalty in connection with the killing of Iraqi civilians," calling the succession of cases "an extraordinary flurry in a conflict that has had relatively few serious criminal cases so far." Experts attribute the increase to "a confluence of two factors: an increasingly chaotic and violent war with no clear end in sight, and a newly vigilant attitude among American commanders about civilian deaths." The Times reports of previously charged service members, "Of the 16 American servicemen known to have been previously charged with murder [in Iraq], only six were convicted or pleaded guilty to that charge, and none received the death penalty."

Military Confirms Failures In Haditha Matter. The Washington Post (7/9, A13, Ricks, 744K) reports that Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli's investigation of the alleged Haditha massacre "has concluded that Marine leadership failed multiple times, including in pre-deployment training, in the tone set by commanders, and in how information was reported up the chain of command." Most of Chiarelli's findings "endorse the conclusions of an investigation led by Army Maj. Gen. Eldon A. Bargewell." Sources "say they expect charges of homicide, making a false statement and dereliction of duty." The Post adds, "Some of the details of Chiarelli's findings were reported Friday night by CBS News and the New York Times."

US Seeks To Exhume Iraqi Girl's Body. The AP (7/9, Lenz) reports, "U.S. investigators have asked Iraqi authorities to help them navigate cultural sensitivities to exhume the body of a teenager allegedly raped and murdered with her family by American soldiers." An uncle says the family is "eager to cooperate with investigators" and would give permission to exhume the remains. The AP writes that many troops "remain convinced that the alleged rape and killings in Mahmoudiya were aberrations and that most American service members respect the rules of war." The Washington Times (7/9, 90K) reported similar details.

Revised Marine Training Reflects Alleged Crimes. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Perry and Miller, 958K) reports, "Even before the investigation of the killing of 24 civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha is complete, the Marine Corps has taken action, stressing accountability and sternly reminding officers that they must investigate all civilian deaths." The Times notes statements and trips taken by Marine commanders and describes apparent Marine resolve "to seeing that it never happens again."

Rules of War Are Taught To Troops. The AP (7/8, Tanner) reports on concerns about ethical behavior in wartime and describes a Naval Academy course on the "Code of the Warrior." It also quotes a former sniper who says that even though he was "ferocious in combat," he followed his "ingrained" training and never targeted civilians or killed prisoners.

Causes Of Misbehavior Are Contemplated. The New York Times (7/9, Carey, 1.19M) reports that the Mahmoudiyah incident "raises a question: How does someone with a personality disorder — a significant, disabling, and dangerous condition — manage the stress of combat? Wouldn't a person with a serious mental problem drop out, or be identified and quickly discharged? The answer, usually, is yes. People with paranoid, borderline or compulsive personality disorders, for instance, are hobbled by anxieties and delusional fears, experts say: two months of boot camp would typically be overwhelming for them." The Times also notes, "A person with psychopathic tendencies may appear to others as clearheaded as an elite soldier when under fire, or when on the attack. But the internal psychological reality is much different, research suggests."

Photograph Moves Senator To Help. The Washington Post (7/9, B5, 744K) reports on the photograph that "captured the scene when a car carrying the Hassan family home in time for curfew didn't stop soon enough at the soldiers' command. They fired into the vehicle, killing Hussein and Kamila Hassan. Five of the couple's children and a young cousin were in the back seat." Senator Edward Kennedy "helped arrange" medical treatment in Boston for the 12-year-old son. The orphaned children now live with their oldest sister and her husband.

Three US Soldiers Are Killed In Anbar Despite Armor. ABC World News Tonight (7/8, story 3, 0:15, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "In Iraq, the deadly dateline for today's violence is the hostile western Anbar province where more American troops have died. The Pentagon says three US soldiers were killed fighting insurgents there." The CBS Evening News (7/8, story 4, 0:15, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "In the battle for Iraq, three US soldiers were killed today in combat with insurgents. The fighting was in the violent Anbar providence west of Baghdad. A US military official says US Marine commanders will go through a day of pain once the top US general reviews reports they failed to investigate or covered up a massacre of Iraqi civilians in Haditha by Marines. US officials say a sweep of the predominantly Shiite Sadr City area of Baghdad killed or wounded more than 30 rebels."

The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Barnes, Daragahi, 958K) reports that the three "were killed by a massive roadside bomb that destroyed their heavily protected vehicle," a Cougar. Some Marines said that insurgents had "been placing larger roadside bombs to take out the [1st Armored Division]'s fleet of armored tanks and Bradley fighting vehicles." The AP (7/9, Yacoub) reports, "Three U.S. soldiers and an Iraqi woman translator were killed in separate incidents Saturday." The translator "was slain in a drive-by shooting" in Baghdad. In other news, the pro-Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party "said U.S. and Iraqi troops had surrounded 15 mostly Sunni villages near Muqdadiyah, about 60 miles northeast of Baghdad, making it difficult for civilians to move around." The article describes a succession of sectarian murders and the guardedly optimistic impressions of Sens. Jack Reed and Joe Biden after meeting the prime minister. The AFP (7/9) also notes the combat deaths.

Sunni Politicians May Widen Legislative Boycott Over Kidnappings. The New York Times (7/9, Wong, 1.19M) reports, "Sunni Arab politicians are considering withdrawing from executive offices in the Shiite-led government because militiamen have yet to free a Sunni legislator kidnapped this month." The bloc is already boycotting the Parliament; "the Sunni Arab boycott of Parliament just weeks after the government began to operate has underscored the fragility of the ethnic and sectarian power-sharing agreement." The Times notes, "The Sunni Arabs, increasingly anxious over the power accrued by Iranian-backed Shiites, have temporarily withdrawn from the political process in the past." Tayseer Najah al-Mashhadani was kidnapped on July 1.

Saddam's Victims Are Unearthed. ABC World News Tonight (7/8, story 4, 2:20, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "Now to the deaths of the past in Iraq. The tens of thousands of Kurds murdered during Saddam Hussein's regime may finally be getting revenge from the grave, mass graves two decades after they were murdered. Today, ABC's Terry McCarthy in Baghdad was shown evidence of the last desperate acts that could doom the former Iraqi dictator in his next trial." ABC (McCarthy): "Even as Saddam Hussein's first trial for the killing of 148 Shia villages is due to end next week, evidence is being gathered for an even bigger case, starting in August, involving potential genocide against Kurds." Dr. Sonny Trimble: "The bullets entered here and exited out here." McCarthy: "Dr. Sonny Trimble is director of the Iraqi mass graves program in Baghdad. With his 17 staff, he's preparing evidence for the second trial of Saddam Hussein, which will deal with the killing of up to 180,000 Kurds back in 1998. In a Kurdish documentary, which the prosecution plans to show at the trial, this woman says she lost 17 members of her family. Each day for her is a living death."

Report Describes Iraqi Police Abuses. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Moore, 958K) reports, "Brutality and corruption are rampant in Iraq's police force, with abuses including the rape of female prisoners, the release of terrorism suspects in exchange for bribes, assassinations of police officers and participation in insurgent bombings, according to confidential Iraqi government documents detailing more than 400 police corruption investigations." The report citing those documents was prepared by State Department contractors. The Times says, "Officers were punished in some instances, but the vast majority of cases are either under investigation or were dropped because of lack of evidence or witness testimony." One source calls the Interior Ministry "the most broken ministry in Iraq"; others note the failure of the Pentagon and State Department to coordinate their contradictory ideas about managing the ministry's professionalization.

Iraqi Woman Soldier Discusses Her Service. Newsweek (7/9) reports on "one of the few women" serving in Iraq's army. A Kurd who generally is upbeat in her interview, she says that sectarianism within the military "is increasing. I've seen conflicts. Things happen, and you're supposed to act out against a mosque or husseiniya [another name for a Shiite mosque]." She also acknowledges the risk of being "targeted" by insurgents, who sometimes "join the units" in order to learn officers' identities.

Baghdad Water Plant Struggles With Delivery. The AP (7/9, Gamel) reports, "After nearly three years and $45 million, a treatment plant in northern Baghdad is pumping enough drinking water for a quarter of Baghdad's people. But the trick is getting it to them because of losses to broken pipes and scavengers." Security is a problem too in infrastructure projects: "About $2.1 billion of the more than $4 billion initially allocated for water and sanitation projects was shifted in 2005 to address new priorities and security needs, according to the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad."

Los Angeles Man Detained In Iraq Sues US. The Washington Post/AP (7/9) reports, "An aspiring Iranian American filmmaker who spent nearly two months in a prison in Iraq without being charged has sued Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and other military officials, calling the government's detention policies unconstitutional." Cyrus Kar "was taken into custody in May 2005 after he visited Iraq to make a documentary film about Cyrus the Great," after "potential bomb parts" were found in the taxi he was riding. He alleges being physically abused during his incarceration. At the time of his release, Air Force Brig. Gen. Donald Alston said, "This case highlights the effectiveness of our detainee review process." News reports say Kar is a "former U.S. Navy Seal."

US Needs "Phased Redeployment" From Iraq, Says Senator. In an op-ed for the Washington Times (7/9, 90K), Sen. Jack Reed writes, "We do not need an artificial timetable for Iraq, especially not a political one, but we do need a plan from the White House on how and when we can succeed. Democrats support beginning a phased redeployment of U.S. forces from Iraq by the end of 2006. ... The days of young American soldiers manning most Iraqi checkpoints and getting caught in the cross-fire of sectarian violence must end." Senator Reed calls for American assistance to turn into "nonmilitary support" for reconstruction and reiterates, "Our national security demands we bring Iraq to a successful conclusion as quickly as possible."

Peter Galbraith Advocates Breakup Of Iraq. The New York Times (7/9, Solomon, 1.19M) interviews Peter Galbraith, author of "The End of Iraq: How American Incompetence Created a War Without End." Galbraith suggests that the administration "stop insisting that Iraq can ever be a unified nation" and "just slice Iraq into three states" -- "Kurdistan, Sunnistan, and Shiaistan."

Past British Ambitions Are Seen In Iraq. The New York Times (7/9, Filkins, 1.19M) reports on journalist Dexter Filkins's visit to graves in Baghdad of British troops dating back to World War I: "The 30,000 British dead represent a total more than 10 times the number of Americans killed in 39 months of war here." He contrasts that visit with the spare memorial service for a Marine who was killed by a sniper in Ramadi.

WPost Op-Ed Pieces Criticize War Strategy And Behavior. Several Washington Post op-ed pieces criticize conduct of the war and offer suggestions for its improvement.

US Was Heedless Of Civilian Casualties. In the Washington Post (7/9, 744K), history professor Andrew Bacevich says that "the United States has botched this war" by its initially cavalier attitude toward civilian deaths: "Any action resulting in Iraqi civilian deaths, however inadvertent, undermines the Bush administration's narrative of liberation, and swells the ranks of those resisting the U.S. presence ... there is no question that the number of Iraqi noncombatants killed by U.S. forces exceeds by an order of magnitude the number of U.S. troops killed in hostile action, which is now more than 2,000." Bacevich argues the war will fail unless the Pentagon "measure[s] in painstaking detail -- and publicly -- the mayhem we are causing as a byproduct of what we call liberation."

US Might Be Unsuited For Fighting Insurgencies. Slate columnist Fred Kaplan, in another Washington Post (7/9, 744K) piece, says that reviewing the new Army counterinsurgency manual reveals two lessons: "One is that Pentagon planning for the Iraq war's aftermath was at least as crass, inattentive to the lessons of history, and contrary to basic political and military principles as the war's harshest critics have charged. The other is that as a nation we may simply be ill-suited to fighting these kinds of wars." He gives two reasons to question whether the US might be ill-suited: "The Army has also been lowering standards lately to meet recruitment targets. Second, can Americans maintain a long-term commitment to civil or insurgent wars at a cost of hundreds of billions of dollars and perhaps thousands of lives? The issue isn't whether we should, but whether we can -- whether the political system, with its competing demands and aversion to risk, is capable of it."

Pentagon Should Tally Civilian Deaths. Rachel Dry, in the Washington Post (7/9, 744K) reports that civilian death counts in Iraq differ widely: "The civilian death toll in Iraq is either 100,000, or 50,000, or 43,273, or, as President Bush said in December, '30,000, more or less.'" It quotes an antiwar researcher as saying that the Pentagon should "take charge" of counting the deaths: "We consider it a disgrace and obscenity that the world's largest superpower leaves this job to 12 unpaid volunteers."

Many Military Medics Were "Partners" In Prisoner Abuse. In another Washington Post (7/9, 744K) piece, medical professor Steven Miles charges, "Many armed forces physicians, nurses and medics have been passive and active partners in the systematic neglect and abuse of prisoners ... These were not isolated acts of medical complicity; rather, they formed a pattern of abuse authorized (or ignored) by senior U.S. officials." Miles likens the behavior of those doctors who did not object to abuse to "the torture physicians of Argentina and Chile [who] simply went to work in the prisons. They did what was asked of them and did not report what they saw."

Afghan and Coalition Forces Attack Taliban.

NBC Nightly News (7/8, lead story, 3:00, Holt, 9.87M) reported, "It was the first front in America's declared war on terror and tonight almost five years later, American troops are still waging fierce battles far from view in the remote valleys and rugged mountains of Afghanistan. Tonight though we have a rare up-close view from the frontlines of this often forgotten battleground. An enemy ambush last night that left several U.S. troops injured. NBC's Jim Maceda was traveling with soldiers when this happened. American troops are breaking new ground in this long war in a place where the Taliban has a firm grip on the land and the people." NBC (Maceda): "Five more U.S. Soldiers wounded in a Taliban attack late last night. Images rarely seen by American viewers and caught on tape only because we were imbedded with the unit that was hit. The infantry, part of the mountain division on a frontline as remote as any in this war. ... The hardest battle, winning hearts and minds in a Taliban stronghold. In an information war, U.S. forces are handing out A.M. radios that get pro-government stations to these village elders so that afghans have something besides Taliban propaganda to listen to. Lt. Col. Sturic: "Quit the fight against a government that wants to give you education, peace, prosperity and unity." Maceda: "But after the speeches it was Lieutenant Colonel Sturic's unit that were ambushed on the way back to base. A reminder of how long this battle will last."

The New York Times (7/9, Wafa, 1.19M) reports, "Afghan police officers raided mosques across the volatile southern city of Kandahar late Thursday night and arrested more than 100 people sleeping in compounds, according to Afghan officials. The arrests appeared to be the first large-scale raids of mosques carried out by the country's American-backed government and immediately set off a backlash from Afghan religious leaders." Leaders alleged that worshippers often stayed overnight in mosques, while the Kandahar police "said [it] had received intelligence that unidentified men were meeting in mosques in Kandahar, which has experienced a sharp increase in suicide bombings this spring."

Peruvian Soldier Is Killed By Bomb. The AP (7/8) reports, "A roadside bomb killed a Peruvian soldier and wounded four other NATO troops patrolling western Afghanistan on Sunday, the Spanish Defense Ministry said. The soldiers were patrolling in an armored convoy near the city of Farah after sunset when a bomb exploded near their vehicles."

Marine Recruiter From Film Is Mourned.

The AP (7/9, Cohen) reports on Marine Staff Sgt. Raymond Plouhar, who was killed by a roadside bomb in Iraq. He "was featured in Michael Moore's antiwar documentary, 'Fahrenheit 9/11,' portrayed as an overzealous Marine recruiter who targeted poor kids." The detailed article says that despite the negative image from the film, he was actually

"a charmer, a good talker, a champion of the underdog (always defending and befriending kids picked on in school) and though he was trained to fight and kill, he preferred the role of peacemaker."

Biography Illuminates Gonzales' Relationship With Bush. The Austin American-Statesman (7/9) runs a review of "The President's Counselor," a biography of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales written by Austin journalist Bill Minutaglio. In the review, University of Texas law professor Sanford Levinson writes, "There are two major problems with 'The President's Counselor.' The first, which is no fault of Minutaglio's, is that Gonzales is an almost completely opaque subject. The second, for which Minutaglio does bear some responsibility, is that there is no evidence that Gonzales has risen to 'power' so much as 'prominence.' The two are not the same." Levinson continues, "As to the first problem, it is widely acknowledged that Gonzales is a taciturn individual. (One infers that he did not cooperate with this book inasmuch as there is no indication that Minutaglio ever interviewed Gonzales.) … Minutaglio himself describes Gonzales as displaying 'a mortician's calm' at all times. … Perhaps in this day of confessional memoirs, when millions can be made by publicizing — or even making up — childhood tales of woe, one ought to be grateful for a public figure who adamantly resists letting the public in on the emotional details of what has been an extraordinary life." Levinson adds, "Gonzales does exemplify one version of the American dream, though he appears to be notably unreflective about what is to be learned from it. … Gonzales might simply be stunningly unreflective. Or he might be remarkably self-disciplined for reasons going back to his childhood, when he seemingly developed a tendency to keep hidden what he considered problematic aspects of his life. As a child, he never invited his school friends over to his home; Minutaglio suggests that this is because he was ashamed of his family's poverty. Similarly, he seems unwilling to invite anyone — or at least anyone willing to speak to Minutaglio — into his interior life." Levinson concludes, "Gonzales has never given Bush anything other than what Bush primarily values, which is absolute loyalty, and nothing in the first year and a half of his attorney generalship suggests any deviation. Most of his time has been spent defending unrestrained presidential power, including threatening to prosecute journalists who are attempting to engage in the oversight that a Republican Congress has failed to do. … This book is no doubt as illuminating as it could be about Alberto Gonzales, which is not very, save for detailing his remarkable rise from poverty to the halls, if not the actuality, of power. It is ultimately more illuminating about George W. Bush, who has no desire to welcome into his political family anyone who will seriously challenge any of his views. He found the kind of man he was looking for in Alberto Gonzales."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Timing Probe Forces Firms To Take Action On Options. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Petruno) reports, "The investigation of companies' stock-options practices has the look of a regulatory free-for-all: The Securities and Exchange Commission, the Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service all are interested in whether executives manipulated options contracts." The Times continues, "The companies may have violated SEC rules on accounting and disclosure. They may have violated criminal statutes if deception was deliberate. And they, and their executives, may have cheated the tax man in the process. … Many companies aren't waiting for a prosecutor to knock on the door. … 'Right now boards all over the country are hiring outside counsel and forensic accounting experts to look at their option practices,' said Kevin Cameron, president of shareholder advisory firm Glass, Lewis & Co. … 'But that's not something you can do quickly,' he said. Which means it could be a long second half of the year for investors who are worried that their companies could be implicated." The Times adds, "Prosecutors don't announce their investigations, but many companies choose to disclose to shareholders if they've become a target of a civil or criminal probe. That is how most of the companies implicated so far have come to light — firms such as Irvine-based semiconductor maker Broadcom Corp., computer hardware producer Brooks Automation Inc. and tax software giant Intuit Inc. … Yet it isn't clear that some of the games played with options in the past actually broke any laws. Backdating of options, without public disclosure, may be cut-and-dried fraud. But simply timing option awards ahead of expected favorable company news makes good business sense, SEC Commissioner Paul Atkins said at a conference in Washington last week."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Seal On Jefferson Documents Expires, But Will Remain In Effect. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (7/9, Alpert) reports, "A 45-day seal on materials seized in a raid on U.S. Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office legally expires today -- but will be continued anyway, as lawyers and politicians wrangle over unprecedented constitutional issues." The Times-Picayune continues, "On May 25, President Bush ordered the seal in hopes that his Justice Department and House negotiators could "in good faith and with mutual institutional respect" resolve their disagreement over the legality of the first-ever search of a congressional office." The Times-Picayune adds, "Agents seized documents and computer hard drives as part of a federal corruption probe of the eight-term New Orleans Democrat. … The seal will remain in place consistent with a previous statement by the chief judge for the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., Thomas Hogan, that the president's directive should continue until 'further order of the court.'" The Times-Picayune notes, "On June 16, Hogan heard oral arguments during which Jefferson's lawyer and the attorney for the bipartisan leadership of the House of Representatives accused the Justice Department of an attack on the constitutionally established separation of powers. … Hogan, who had granted the government's request for a search warrant for Jefferson's office, strongly suggested during the hearing that he didn't find the legal arguments by Jefferson's lawyers and the House counsel's office convincing. He promised a quick ruling. But as of late Friday, both sides were still awaiting his ruling, which is now expected early next week."

30 In Alabama Charged With Hurricane-Related FEMA Fraud. The Birmingham News (AL) (7/9, Walton) reports, "At least 30 people have been charged in Alabama federal courts with scamming the Federal Emergency Management Agency of thousands of dollars by posing as Hurricane Katrina victims." The News continues, "As federal officials try to get a handle on the scope of FEMA aid fraud, questionable disaster-relief claims continue to mount in Alabama and across the country months after the August storm." The News adds, "In the North Alabama District, which includes the 31 northernmost counties and is based in Birmingham, nine people have been charged with FEMA-related fraud. … In the state's Middle District, based in Montgomery, 13 cases have been charged, said Retta Goss, a court spokeswoman." The News notes, "So far in the Mobile-based Southern District, eight cases have been filed, with officials expecting more. 'Many investigations are under way,' said Charlie McNichol, a spokesman for the district's U.S. attorney's office. … Nationally, prosecutors in 23 districts have charged more than 212 people with hurricane-related crime, according to the Department of Justice's Hurricane Katrina Task Force February statistics, the latest available. The task force was initiated in September 2005 by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … 'There will be consequences for those who have engaged in such fraud and deceit,' U.S. Attorney Alice Martin of north Alabama said."

Online Sex Stings On The Rise. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/9, Ove) reports, "Across America, online sex stings are booming. … Arrests have doubled since 2001, and so many cops are online that the federal Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force program is expanding its intelligence database so that police don't trip over each other in cyberspace." The Post-Gazette continues, "Cyberstings also are getting unprecedented exposure with Dateline NBC's controversial 'To Catch a Predator' series, which features a civilian group called Perverted Justice nabbing suspects while cameras roll. … The growth of this phenomenon raises big questions: … Are stings deterring predators? Or is the Internet creating more of them? And why are so many men -- almost all of them white and many well-educated -- trolling online for teens when they know they're being hunted? … The short answers: Probably, maybe and because they can't help themselves. … But as is often the case with the subject of child molestation, the issues are a good deal more complicated than that." The Post-Gazette notes, "The best evidence, for example, indicates that there has been a dramatic overall decline in sexual abuse of children in America over the past 15 years. … Yet at the same time, those who examine this sort of thing -- and those who put predators in jail for a living -- are pretty sure that Internet sex crimes are increasing. … Federal prosecutions certainly are. Cases against those who prey on children or collect kiddie porn have jumped from 344 in 1995 to 1,576 last year."

US Military Bases Grapple With Child Pornography Incidents. The Stars & Stripes (7/9, Allen) reports from Camp Foster in Okinawa, Japan, "There's an epidemic of child pornography and exploitation in the United States, the government says, and don't think you're immune if you're stationed overseas." S&S continues, "In recent months, several servicemembers on Okinawa have been court-martialed on charges of downloading child pornography on the Internet. … In one case, an Air Force technical sergeant on Kadena Air Base was found guilty of using his home computer to solicit sex from a 13-year-old girl who also lived on base. In April he was sentenced to 5 years in prison and a bad-conduct discharge for child solicitation and downloading child porn." S&S adds, "Child pornography, the images of people younger than 16 engaged in sex, is illegal 'anywhere at any time,' said Lt. Col. Janice Pegram, commander of the Air Force Office of Special Investigation's Detachment 624. … In the past year, Pegram said, there have been five cases of child pornography on Kadena and other investigations are ongoing. Most of the cases involve downloading the pictures from the Internet, she said. A few involved sharing child porn with other Internet users. … During the investigations, all computer equipment seized is sent to the Defense Computer Forensics Laboratory in Virginia, part of the Defense Cyber Crime Center. Earlier this year, center director Steven Shirley said child porn made up 50 percent of the cases the center handled."

WPost Says Abramoff Dealings Hurt Conservative Activist Norquist. The Washington Post (7/9, A1, Weisman, 744K) reports that following reports that conservative activist Grover Norquist "served as a cash conduit for disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, the irascible, combative activist is struggling to maintain his stature as some GOP lawmakers distance themselves and as enemies in the conservative movement seek to diminish his position." And, "the infighting is taking a toll on Norquist's standing. Some social conservatives who have jousted with him over his more libertarian views on the regulation of television and its depictions of violence and depravity are exploiting his weakness to press their positions on Capitol Hill. Security-minded defense hawks who for years have questioned his ties to Muslim activists are resurrecting charges that Norquist has turned a blind eye to terrorist sympathizers." Norquist is fighting back, accusing his critics "of dishonesty, personal vendettas and political gamesmanship. He has saved his choicest words for Sen. John McCain."

Cunningham Probers Eye Contractor. The Washington Times/AP (7/9) reports, "The prosecutors who sent former U.S. Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham to prison for taking bribes now are focusing their attention on his friend Brent Wilkes, a San Diego defense contractor who won nearly $100 million in contracts in the past decade." Wilkes' attorneys have confirmed that he is the "Co-Conspirator No. 1" in Cunningham's plea bargain. Prosecutors claim that Wilkes paid the ex-Congressman over $600,000 to obtain government contracts, and while no further indictments have issued since Cunningham was sentenced to over eight years in prison in March, a grand jury remains active."

CIVIL LAW:

Carnival Company Seeks To Get Back Over $100K In Loans To Tony Rodham. The Washington Times (7/9, McElhatton, 90K) reports, "A bankruptcy trustee for a carnival company whose owners received a pardon from President Clinton is seeking to garnish the bank accounts of Mr. Clinton's brother-in-law to recoup more than $100,000 in loans. Anthony D. Rodham, one of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's two brothers, got the loans from United Shows of America Inc. after its owners obtained the presidential pardon in March 2000 over the objections of the Justice Department." The owners of United Shows, Edgar Gregory Jr. and his wife, Vonna Jo Gregory, were convicted of bank fraud in 1982 on charges of illegally giving loans to friends. When President Clinton pardoned the Gregorys, Rodham "reportedly said he worked for Tennessee-based United Shows as a consultant and denied taking money to lobby for presidential favors."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Las Vegas Police Shootings Come Under Scrutiny. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (7/9, Mccabe) reports, "The image of Tarance Hall's limp body being pulled from a car onto the Strip and cuffed after he was fatally shot by Las Vegas police late Tuesday resonated across the valley and was broadcast nationwide. … And though critics wonder whether the Metropolitan Police Department is resorting to deadly force too soon, police continue to defend their use of guns because, they say, the criminal element has become less cooperative and more prone to engage officers violently." The Review-Journal continues, "Hall's shooting was the 18th officer-involved shooting this year by the police department and the 15th since police Sgt. Henry Prendes, 37, was slain by Amir Rashid Crump on Feb. 1. Hall's shooting also was the eighth fatal shooting this year. In at least three of the 18 shootings, nobody was injured. … Some national experts suggest an officer's death can play a role in the mentality of other officers to reach more quickly for their firearms." The Review-Journal adds, "Lt. Nelson Andreu, a retired detective for the Miami Police Department and an expert on officer-related shootings, said the shooting of a police officer can cause other officers to become more concerned with their own safety, which can lead to officer-related shootings. … But local police say that's not a factor. … Last year, there were 12 officer-related shootings involving Las Vegas police, nine of which were fatal. In 2004, there were 21, 10 of which were fatal. … So far, seven of the eight fatal shootings by officers this year have been found to be justified after Clark County coroner's inquests. An inquest has yet to be set for Hall's death."

Sarasota County, FL, Says Federal Disability Compliance Fine Too High. The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida) (7/9, Sword) reports, "Federal civil rights officials want to levy $5 million in fines, penalties and damages against Sarasota County as part of what would amount to the county admitting it discriminated against people with disabilities." The Tribune continues, "That was the negotiating stance of the U.S. Justice Department's Civil Rights Division before it filed a lawsuit June 30 against the county alleging violations of the federal Fair Housing Act." The Tribune adds, "County officials say the proposed penalties are too onerous and believe they can defend their 2004 actions which prevented Renaissance Manor, a nonprofit organization, from operating six group homes known as Tammi House in Warm Mineral Springs. The Justice Department, however, has been aggressive in defending the disabled in housing discrimination cases and has filed 94 such lawsuits against local governments, businesses and individuals since 2000. The federal demand from Sarasota County appears to be bigger even than a high-profile lawsuit that led last year to the housing authority in Baltimore agreeing to $1 million in penalties and spending several million dollars on housing for the disabled. … The Tammi House group homes are all near one another on Sevilla Street, and each house has up to six residents. The federal suit says Renaissance Manor lost more than $1 million in grants because of the county's actions. The county violated the Fair Housing Act, a federal law prohibiting discrimination against buyers or renters because of a handicap, the suit says. … County officials deny the allegations, saying they objected to the clustering of the six homes in one neighborhood. State law requires 'community residential homes' to be licensed and located at least 1,000 feet from each other."

Former Warner Cabinet Official Opposes Virginia Gay Marriage Ban. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (7/9, B8, 744K) Michael Schewel, Virginia's secretary of commerce and trade under Gov. Mark R. Warner, writes, " The Marshall-Newman amendment, the so-called "marriage amendment," seeks to amend Virginia's Constitution to ban gay marriage and to impose other legal limitations on unmarried couples, including heterosexual couples. The amendment is not only useless -- gay marriage has been outlawed in Virginia for 30 years -- but it is downright harmful to the state's economy in two important ways."

New Jersey May Be Next State To Weigh Gay Marriage. The New York Times (7/9, Healy, 1.19M) reports, "Now that New York's highest court declined to legalize gay marriage last week, where's the next battleground? Next door, in New Jersey. Gay rights advocates are storing hopes in that state's Supreme Court, which will most likely rule on the issue sometime this summer; a similar case is also pending in Washington State." Advocates for gay marriage are encouraged by the New Jersey court's "more flexible standard in discrimination cases," and the Times notes that in arguments earlier this year, ", the New Jersey judges did not dwell on child-rearing or the needs of parents, central issues in the New York decision." And one foe of gay marriage, Monte Stewart, president of the Marriage Law Foundation, argue that even a decision for legalization might not matter much nationally, "simply because of the reputation of the New Jersey Supreme Court."

WPost Editorial Says Public Attitudes, Not Courts, Are Key. The Washington Post (7/9, B6, 744K) writes, in a "'Gettysburg' For Gay Marriage?" editorial, that while "The decision last week by New York's highest court not to legalize same-sex marriage is being portrayed as a big defeat for gay rights activists," with the head of one traditionalist group calling the New York decision "the Gettysburg in this big contest," in fact it changes little. That's because "since the Massachusetts decision in 2003, it's become clear that democratic majorities, not judges, ultimately will decide how evenhanded state marriage laws are going to be," through ballot initiatives or state legislation. So, "the most a state court can do is change the legal baseline," and since state laws and constitutions can generally be overturned without too much difficulty, "courts cannot force same-sex marriage on an unwilling populace." So, noting its support for same-sex marriage, the Post says the task remains "to convince a majority that couples who love each ought to have the state's recognition for lifelong relationships--and that such recognition poses no threat to heterosexual marriage."

Women Look Back On 30 Years At Annapolis. The Washington Post (7/9, George, 744K) reports, 30 years after women first gained admission to the Naval Academy, "But though much has improved since women first arrived -- and many female graduates express great loyalty to the storied 161-year-old institution -- a complex and sometimes troubling portrait of student life emerges from three recent studies sponsored by the Defense Department." The Post recounts early alumnae's struggles and says that, despite progress, student life is "complex and sometimes troubling" -- "in the 2004-05 school year, 59 percent of female midshipmen and 14 percent of men reported sexual harassment, defined as crude and offensive behavior, unwanted sexual attention or sexual coercion. Sexist behavior -- put-downs and offensive comments -- was reported by 93 percent of women and 50 percent of men."

ANTITRUST:

GM Alliance Talks With Nissan, Renault Spark Speculation. The Detroit Free Press (7/9, Gallagher) reports, "As General Motors Corp. formally began Friday to explore a possible alliance with Nissan Motor Co. and Renault SA, the process seemed firmly in the hands of GM Chairman and CEO Rick Wagoner. … But in the world of corporate mergers and acquisitions, events can quickly spin out of control." The Free Press continues, "So far, there's nothing in the proffered Nissan-Renault overture to buy part of GM to indicate it's anything but friendly. But even this mild-mannered gesture could lift the lid off a box of snakes. … A rival suitor could ante up a better offer. At some point, GM's Board of Directors might launch a spirited, even ugly, defense. And talk of a GM deal might stimulate merger or takeover offers to cross-town rival Ford Motor Co." The Free Press adds, "Auto insiders doubt any of those possibilities will happen this time. Most GM watchers expect the company to politely study the Nissan-Renault overture before turning it down. … Even so, with the fate of the world's biggest automaker on the line, along with the jobs and livelihoods of tens of thousands of metro Detroiters, the unexpected becomes the expected. … Beyond a potential three-way alliance, other possibilities include: … Another suitor turns up. Once two or more companies initiate friendly discussions about a deal, it is common for another, unfriendly suitor to make a rival offer. … Ford becomes a target. … Politicians get involved. … In a way, the least likely outcome is that nothing happens -- that Nissan-Renault simply goes away after GM rejects its overture."

ENVIRONMENT:

Texas Lawsuit Charges Inaction On Water Pollution Is "Environmental Racism." The New York Times (7/9, Blumenthal, 1.19M) reports on a lawsuit filed by residents of DeBerry, Texas, a historically black enclave in East Texas oilfields whose groundwater the Environmental Protection Agency has found contaminated with pollutants including arsenic, benzene, lead and mercury. The self-styled victims of "environmental racism" in June "filed suit in federal court, accusing the Texas Railroad Commission, which regulates the state's oil and gas industry, of failing to enforce safety regulations and of 'intentionally giving citizens false information based on their race and economic status.'" They also claim that, while the state agency has for years been moving slowly and making only inconclusive inquiries on their complaints going back almost two decades, it moved quickly last summer to clean up a largely white Houston suburb. The Texas Railroad Commission said it had not yet been officially notified of the lawsuit and had no comment.

IMMIGRATION:

GOP Seen As Taking Risk On Immigration Reform. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Riccardi, Barabak, 958K) in an article titled "GOP Immigration Tactic: Blast Away, But Be Nice" reports, "Hoping to use the volatile issue of illegal immigration to avert a November election disaster, Republican candidates across the country increasingly are attacking their Democratic opponents on the subject." Yet, "mindful of a possible voter backlash, they are attempting to do so without seeming intolerant or divisive." The Times continues, "The official GOP position is that the party will not use immigration as a political bludgeon against Democrats. Karl Rove, the president's chief political advisor, has made courting Latinos a priority through his years in the White House and has avoided the harsh rhetoric used to rally partisans on other issues." Yet "many Republicans hope a tough-on-illegal-immigration platform can help overcome the political drag of an unpopular president and growing public sentiment against the war in Iraq in November's midterm election." The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Gaouette, 958K) also publishes a Q&A on immigration reform.

Bill Clinton Applauds Bush Support For Comprehensive Immigration Reform. The AP (7/9, Jablon) reports, "Former President Bill Clinton praised President Bush on Saturday for supporting reforms that would allow millions of illegal immigrants to seek citizenship but said the debate in Congress is being fomented by Republicans who want to divide America." At the National Council of La Raza annual conference Clinton said, "I'm proud of him for doing it and I thanked him for doing it." In his speech "Clinton used similar language" as Bush has in promoting comprehensive reform and that "message played well with La Raza, which opposes the House bill and whose current president, Janet Murguia, was an assistant in the Clinton White House." Karl Rove is "scheduled to address the convention on Tuesday."

The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Rabin, 958K) reports, "Former President Clinton told one of the nation's largest Latino civil rights groups Saturday that the conservative wing of the Republican Party is using the immigration issue to divide Congress and the nation." Clinton said, "It is a way of creating a divided community and distracting people from the real challenges facing the country, whether it is in Iraq and Afghanistan, or homeland security, or how to build a clean energy future, or how to solve the healthcare crisis, or how to create new jobs for America."

Rove And Brownback To Address La Raza Convention. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (7/9) writes White House adviser Karl Rove and Sen. Sam Brownback "will address the left-wing Hispanic advocacy group La Raza in Los Angeles this week. La Raza was active in increasing participation in nationwide work stoppages and demonstrations April 10 after the House passed a tough border enforcement bill. La Raza in Spanish means 'The Race.' Former President Bill Clinton heads the list of speakers for the annual meeting of La Raza's national council. The Rev. Jesse Jackson will appear on a panel."

Economic Impact Of Immigration Examined. Roger Lowenstein in an extensive 7,931 word article in the New York Times Magazine (7/9) examining the impact of immigration of the US economy and wages writes that to John F. Kennedy School of Government immigration expert George Borjas, a Cuban immigrant, "the truth is pretty obvious: immigrants hurt the economic prospects of the Americans they compete with. And now that the biggest contingent of immigrants are poorly educated Mexicans, they hurt poorer Americans, especially African-Americans, the most." But for Borjas critics like David Card, a Canadian economist at Berkeley, "from an economic standpoint, immigration is no big deal and that a lot of the opposition to it is most likely social or cultural." Lowenstein concludes, "The disconnect between Borjas's results and Card's hints that there is an alchemy that occurs when immigrants land ashore; the economy's potential for absorbing and also adapting is mysterious but powerful. Like any form of economic change, immigration causes distress and disruption to some. But America has always thrived on dynamic transformations that produce winners as well as losers." The resolution of the debate "depends on a question that Card posed but that the public has not yet come to terms with: 'What is it that immigration policy is supposed to achieve?'"

Similarly, author Tony Horwitz in an op-ed describing the historical relationship between the US and Hispanics in the New York Times (7/9, 1.19M) dismisses concerns raised about the impact of Hispanic immigrants saying "foes of immigration echo the black legend more explicitly, typecasting Hispanics as indolent, a burden on the American taxpayer, greedy for benefits and jobs, prone to criminality and alien to our values -- much like those degenerate Spaniards of the old Southwest and those gold-mad conquistadors who sought easy riches rather than honest toil. At the fringes, the vilification is baldly racist." The US "has always been a diverse and fast-changing land, home to overlapping cultures and languages. It's an homage to our history, not a betrayal of it, to welcome the latest arrivals, just as the Indians did those tardy and uninvited Pilgrims who arrived in Plymouth not so long ago."

Immigration Also Impacts Mexican Economy, Culture. ABC World News Tonight (7/8, story 9, 3:30, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "It's estimated there are more than 6 million undocumented Mexican workers in the United States, that mass migration is a source of anger and debate in this country, and it's also changing everyday life in Mexico." ABC (Quinones): "President-elect Felipe Calderon has promised jobs and a better life for the people of Mexico, but in this tiny village, they are not holding their breath. They're just waiting for the next paycheck from the US, waiting for their husbands, their fathers, their sons, to come back home, at least for a little while, before they have to leave again."

Immigration Debate Seen As Distracting From Important Issues. P.W. Singer, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, in an brief op-ed in the Washington Post (7/9, B3, Singer, 744K) "Outlook" section chides the DHS for recently issuing a "request for an 'indefinite quantity, indefinite delivery' of burritos to be stockpiled along the Texas border?" The request "came on the heels of another spicy tidbit on the same government database -- a contract for as much as $385 million awarded just a few months ago to Dick Cheney's old firm Halliburton to be on call in case the government ever needs to build 5,000-person camps for 'temporary detention and processing.'" Singer says, "That such conspiracy theories should even come to mind is a sad statement about our politics. Rather than serious public debate, we've been served a summer of faux outcries, such as describing flag burning and same-sex marriage as epidemics and treating immigration as a national security crisis. It's enough to give anyone indigestion."

LAT Faults House GOP Position On Border Security. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, 958K) editorializes, "House Republicans claim they want to first 'certify' that the border is secure. To fully do that, they will need not just 2,000 miles of fence but another 3,145 miles for the northern border, untold thousands of new port inspectors, plus homing devices attached to every foreigner who dares set foot on U.S. soil. The border would be secure, but at the expense of the land of the free becoming a police state."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Credits Tax Cuts For Sharp Rise In Tax Revenues. The New York Times (7/9, Andrews, 1.19M) in a front page article titled "Surprising Jump In Tax Revenues Is Curbing Deficit" reports, "An unexpectedly steep rise in tax revenues from corporations and the wealthy is driving down the projected budget deficit this year, even though spending has climbed sharply because of the war in Iraq and the cost of hurricane relief." The increasing "tide in tax payments has been building for months, but the increased scale is surprising even seasoned budget analysts and making it easier for both the administration and Congress to finesse the big run-up in spending over the past year." The Times notes, "Tax revenues are climbing twice as fast as the administration predicted in February, so fast that the budget deficit could actually decline this year" and "Republicans are already arguing that the revenue jump proves that their tax cuts, especially the 2003 tax cut on stock dividends, would spur the economy and ultimately increase revenues." In his radio address President Bush said, "The tax relief we delivered has helped unleash the entrepreneurial spirit of America and kept our economy the envy of the world."

The Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg (7/9) adds, "The White House Office of Management and Budget is expected to announce Tuesday that, because of the increased tax receipts, the deficit will be about $100 billion less than what was projected six months ago. President Bush pledged in his 2004 State of the Union address to halve the deficit by 2009." OMB director Rob Portman said, "We are on track to meet the president's goal."

Need For Corporate Tax Reform Questioned. Edmund Andrews in an "Economic View" analysis of the debate over the need for corporate tax reform in the New York Times (7/9, 1.19M) dismisses claims by business supporters writing, "The political danger, at least from a fiscal standpoint, is that arguments for corporate tax reform will be hijacked to justify another round of corporate tax cuts. That was what happened with the corporate tax overhaul of 2004, which became a grab bag of tax breaks to almost every corner of business, at a net cost of $60 billion over 10 years." Andrews states, "Those who see the American corporate tax as oppressive point to a striking fact: the standard corporate tax rate of 35 percent is now higher than that of most other industrialized countries. The average top rate is 25.8 percent in the European Union, where most nations have cut rates to attract investment." Yet "official tax rates are not the same as actual tax burdens. What American companies lose in high tax rates they more than make up in higher tax breaks."

Bush Calls For Senate To Increase Spending On Scientific Research. The AP (7/9, Loven) reports, "President Bush on Saturday urged the Senate to back increased government spending on basic scientific research." It "is part of Bush's initiative to boost U.S. competitiveness in the global marketplace through innovation. He also wants to train thousand of new science and math teachers and extend a popular tax credit businesses can receive for investing in research and development. The total price tag over 10 years would be $136 billion." The AP notes, "Some Democrats have expressed concern that Bush is increasing federal math and science education spending while cutting overall discretionary spending on education by trimming money in areas such as the arts, parent-resource centers and drug-free schools." Yet "Bush said in his weekly radio address that his proposals are vital for America to 'remain an innovative nation that competes with confidence' and would help ensure that every U.S. child has the math and science skills needed for the jobs of the future."

Bush Attends Nationals Baseball Game. On the front page of its sports section, a Washington Post (7/9, E1, Kilgore, 744K) article titled "Bush Can't Provide Power For Nationals" reports President Bush, First Lady Laura Bush, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, AG Alberto Gonzales, Chief of Staff Josh Bolten and Marvin Bush attened last night's baseball game at RFK Stadium between the Nationals and the Padres. When "word spread through the Nationals' dugout in the second inning that President Bush had come to his first game this season, players and coaches turned and gazed up at the owner's box, pointing and talking to each other." But Padres pitcher Chris Young stole "Bush's spotlight." The Padres win made "it 2-1 lifetime for Bush, as not even his presence could stop San Diego's dominance in D.C."

The AP (7/9) in a brief article adds, "President Bush made a low-key appearance at" the game. The AP notes, "Vice President Cheney threw out the first pitch at this year's home opener and was greeted with what seemed to be more boos than cheers as he walked on the field." There was no mention of any positive or negative reaction to Bush's appearance. The Washington Times (7/9, Wright, 90K) mentions Bush's appearance in its coverage of the game.

Chief Justice Roberts Assessed After First Term. New York Times Supreme Court reporter Linda Greenhouse (7/9) assesses Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. after the end of his first term. She writes, "Beyond John Roberts the chief justice, what has this first term revealed about John Roberts the judge?" Greenhouse finds the Chief Justice's judicial voice to be "direct, straightforward, free of legal jargon, the voice of a lawyer who made a living selling complicated ideas to busy appellate judges under tight time constraints." But, Greenhouse says, Roberts has mixed adherence to his stated goal of being a "minimalist" judge who decides only what's necessary. On the one hand, he has a clear regard for precedent and tradition. At the same time, however, he joined opinions with "Justice Antonin Scalia in environmental and criminal cases that reached beyond the specific disputes at hand to call long-settled assumptions into question" and several Roberts opinions "had a rhetorical edge."

An op-ed in the New York Times (7/9, Cohen, 1.19M) takes a harsher view. It argues that while Roberts insisted at his confirmation hearings that "he was 'not an ideologue' and that his judicial philosophy was to be 'modest,' which he defined as recognizing that judges should 'decide the cases before them' and not try to legislate or 'execute the laws,'" that is "not, however, how Chief Justice Roberts voted in his first term." Cohen argues that Roberts' "modesty" came generally in cases where "criminal defendants, Democrats and other parties conservatives dislike were asking for something. When real estate developers, wealthy campaign contributors and other powerful parties wanted help, he was more inclined to support judicial action, even if it meant trampling on Congress and the states."

War-Strapped Army Struggles With Bills At Home. The New York Times/AP (7/9) reports, "A diversion of money for the war in Iraq has helped create a $530 million shortfall for Army posts at home and abroad, leaving some of them unable to pay utility bills or even cut the grass ... Fort Bragg in North Carolina says it will not buy any office supplies until the new fiscal year starts in October." The Times observes, "The increasing cost of fuel is partly to blame, and it costs more to pay civilians in Asia and Europe ... Another major factor is the practice of financing the war through spending bills outside the annual budget." Michael O'Hanlon of the Brookings Institution "said money management seemed to be the larger problem."

Discovery Astronauts Successfully Complete 7½ Hour Spacewalk. All three network newscasts reported on the spacewalk by astronauts Piers Sellers and Michael Fossum, but while CBS and NBC devoted only ten seconds a piece to the story, ABC's segment ran for a full two minutes. After describing yesterday's maneuvers, ABC contended, "Critics say even if NASA can make in-flight fixes, it is unacceptable the shuttle keeps needing to be fixed at all." Former NASA historian Alex Roland was shown saying, "The shuttle is not getting better over time, it's getting worse over time, which is a reflection of the wear and tear of the flights it's already experienced." The CBS Evening News (7/8, story 9, 0:10, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "The Discovery shuttle astronauts took the first of three spacewalks today. Two astronauts left the International Space Station to bounce around at the end of the station's 100 foot boom testing it to see if they can repair the shuttle if need be."

NBC Nightly News (7/8, story 8, 0:10, Holt, 9.87M) reported, "They strapped themselves to an extension of the shuttle's robot arm. Their seven-hour space walk was designed to test whether the boom is safe enough to be used as a platform for emergency repairs."

ABC World News Tonight (7/8, story 6, 2:05, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "Critics say even if NASA can make in-flight fixes, it is unacceptable the shuttle keeps needing to be fixed at all." Former NASA historian Alex Roland: "The shuttle is not getting better over time, it's getting worse over time, which is a reflection of the wear and tear of the flights it's already experienced." ABC concluded, "Tonight, NASA said that only one of these dangling gap fillers could pose any kind of problem. … But at this point, they don't think any kind of repairs will be necessary. They don't think they'll need to do a dramatic spacewalk like they did last year to yank it out. In fact, they say as early as tomorrow they could give the shuttle a clean bill of health."

The AP (7/9, Borenstein) reports, "In a 7 1/2-hour spacewalk, the first of three orbital excursions planned for this mission," Sellers and Fossum "said they could do most of the mock tasks they were assigned with only moderate difficulty. And that's what NASA wanted to hear. 'It was above and beyond' what engineers expected, flight director Tony Ceccacci said after the spacewalk ended." The Los Angeles Times runs an Orlando Sentinel article (7/9, Cabbage) on the spacewalk.

Discovery May Be Cleared For Reentry Today. The Washington Post (7/9, A11, Gugliotta, 744K) reports Orbiter Project Office manager Steve Poulos "said that analysts had 'cleared' all but two blemishes on Discovery's heat shield and that the other two should be cleared Sunday. John Shannon, chairman of the mission management team, said this meant that on Sunday he could clear Discovery for reentry, guaranteeing the orbiter's soundness."

Guard And Reserve GWOT Veterans Are Denied GI Bill Benefits. The Atlanta-Journal Constitution (7/9, Martz) reports, "When military benefits were updated in 1984 through a law called the Montgomery GI Bill, members of Congress and even the military did not envision reservists being called into active duty as frequently as they are today. The law did not extend full college benefits to citizen soldiers and terminated them once they left the Guard or Reserve. But since 2001, more than 500,000 reservists and Guard troops have been deployed for homeland security duties or sent to wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Yet when they get home, they don't get the same benefits as those who were active-duty servicemembers." The article quotes a reservist who came home and could not obtain tuition funding and describe the arguments for modifying or retaining the current system, as stated by veterans' groups and the DOD Office for Reserve Affairs, respectively.

WPost Profiles Rep. Ron Paul. The Washington Post (7/9, D1, Copeland, 744K) reports, "Republican Ron Paul missed out on the 19th century, but he admires it from afar. He speaks lovingly of the good old days before things like Social Security and Medicaid existed, before the federal government outlawed drugs like heroin." Now retired from a career as an obstetrician and gynecologist, Paul delivered an estimated 4,000 babies, but refused to accept Medicare and Medicaid, and sometimes treated patients for free. In 1988, he left the Republican party and ran for president as a Libertarian. Noting Paul's consistent opposition to much of the government as intruding on personal freedom or interfering with the free market--he opposes government farm subsidies even though his TX14 district is largely agricultural--the Post finds Paul to be "a refreshing peculiarity. He continually bucks the wishes of Republican leaders--so much so, Paul recalls, that once while exhorting every other Republican to vote the party line, then-Speaker Newt Gingrich announced that Ron Paul was exempt." As a result, Paul doesn't hold a leadership post or chair a Congressional panel. Paul responds, "I never had a goal of working up the seniority ladder."

OTHER NEWS:

Social Security Reform Returns As Top Political Issue. The Washington Times (7/9, A1, Fagan, 90K) in a front page story reports, "The seemingly dead issue of Social Security reform came to life again in recent weeks, with President Bush saying it should be high on the agenda and Democrats warning that Republicans are resurrecting their plan to privatize the system." And on "a recent, unrelated event on prescription drug coverage, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi brought up Social Security twice, at one point criticizing the drug plan and adding, 'This plan was brought to you by the same people who want to privatize Social Security.'" But Bush "continues to call for a bipartisan approach." On June 27th Bush said, "We need to set politics aside when it comes to reforming Social Security and Medicare, and we need to set politics aside so that the president can work with the Congress to bring fiscal discipline to our budgets."

The AP (7/9, Wilson) reports, "The Republican plan to privatize Social Security could cause huge debt for decades, a Democratic candidate seeking a House seat in Iowa, a state with a high concentration of elderly residents, said Saturday." In the Democratic weekly radio address, Bruce Braley said, "If the Republican plan is allowed to pass, future generations both here and across the country will be saddled with decades of debt and no guaranteed retirement security." He "said Social Security is under attack, with President Bush and congressional Republicans making privatization a top priority in 2007. He also accused the Bush administration of 'plundering the Social Security trust fund while giving billions away to special interests, like big oil.'"

Iowa State Party Offers To Sell Its Voter Database To Candidates. The Washington Post (7/9, A4, Goldfarb, Cillizza, 744K) reports on how the Iowa Democratic party plans to raise some funds. "Showing its entrepreneurial spirit, the state party is offering potential candidates access to its detailed voter database--for a price. Specifically, they can mine the valuable data for $50,000 (act now, urges the party, and get a discount from the usual fee of $75,000). … For an additional $50,000 next year, candidates can secure access to a database buttressed by information derived from the 2006 primary and general elections. Or campaigns can ignore the current offer and purchase the full database next year for $85,000. Candidates have until Saturday to decide whether to take advantage of the discount."

Sen. Evan Bayh Is Looking For Way To Stand Out In Democratic Field. The Associated Press (7/8, Glover) reports, "In a quiet, methodical style reflecting his Midwestern roots, Sen. Evan Bayh is laying the foundation for a presidential campaign and prompting some Democrats to talk about a candidate with a realistic shot." Making his fifth trip to Iowa in the past year, the centrist Indiana Senator "opened a three-day swing Thursday with a fundraiser in downtown Des Moines for legislative candidates. He mingled easily with about 50 party activists for more than an hour and made a point of chatting with everyone in the room." Bayh's Midwestern roots and his success in winning five statewide races in a strongly Republican state are strengths he would bring if he enters the 2008 presidential field, and he's "assembled a solid team of advisers operating under the auspices of his political action committee, the All America PAC. He's tapped a former Democratic National Committee fundraiser, a onetime pollster for Howard Dean's presidential campaign and a chief of staff to the late Missouri Gov. Mel Carnahan."

Giuliani Reportedly Intends To Run For President In 2008. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (7/9), in an item featured prominently on the Drudge Report yesterday, writes, "Well-connected public figures report that they have been told recently by Rudolph Giuliani that, as of now, he intends to run for the Republican Presidential nomination in 2008." Giuliani "was on top of last month's national Gallup poll measuring Presidential preferences by registered Republicans, with 29 percent. Sen. John McCain's 24 percent was second, with former House Speaker Newt Gingrich third at 8 percent. National polls all year have shown Giuliani running either first or second to McCain, with the rest of the Presidential possibilities far behind. Republican insiders respond to these numbers by saying rank-and-file GOP voters will abandon Giuliani once they realize his position on abortion, gay rights and gun control. Party strategists calculate that if he actually runs, he must change on at least one of these issues."

Congressional Democrats Said To Lack Coherent Platform. The Los Angeles Times' Steve

Lopez (7/9) writes, "I'm not asking for the Democratic equivalent of a 10-point Contract With America, having lowered my expectations while on the campaign trail with Al Gore and bearing witness to his nationally televised identity crisis. I'd settle for a five-point 'Contract With Western Blue States.' Heck, I'd be happy with a warmed-over crumb of an idea or two. Instead all we get from the Democrats is the reminder that they stand for…wait, let's see, where was that platform draft? Oh, yeah. They're anti-Iraq war, or at least they are now that it's turned out so miserably."

Democrats Worried Challenge To Lieberman Could Drive Candidates Too Far Left. The CBS Evening News (7/8, story 5, 2:10, Assuras, 7.66M) reported that although the Connecticut Democratic Senate primary showdown between Sen. Joseph Lieberman and antiwar candidate Ned Lamont "is thousands of miles away, Iraq is the central campaign battle ground." CQ Politics editor Bob Benenson: "Lieberman is concerned that Lamont will turn out the activist base, the anti-war activists will want to make a statement and turn out in droves." CBS (Alfonsi): "Party leaders worry if Lieberman loses Democratic candidates in other states may court the far left just to win over anti-war activists in the primaries and end up losing more moderate voters to Republicans in November."

Lieberman Seen As Likely To Caucus With Democrats If Elected As An Independent. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (7/9) writes, "Supporters of Sen. Joseph Lieberman promise he will continue as a member of the Senate Democratic caucus even if he loses the Democratic primary in Connecticut Aug. 8 and is elected as an independent. … Lieberman's Republican Senate colleagues privately despair of the GOP picking up the Connecticut seat. But they hope Lieberman, if elected as an independent, would be more inclined to vote with Republicans than he is now, even if he still caucuses with the Democrats."

Lieberman Primary Seen As Preview Of 2008 Campaigns. In his column for the New York Times (7/9, 1.19M) David Brooks writes, "The primary battle playing out on the smiling lawns of upscale Connecticut serves as a preview for the national conflict that will dominate American politics for the next two years. This isn't a fight between left and right. It's a fight about how politics should be conducted. On the one hand are the true believers — the fundamentalists of both parties who believe that politics should be about party discipline, passion, purity, orthodoxy and clear choices. On the other side are the quasi-independents — the heterodox politicians who distrust ideological purity, who rebel against movement groupthink, who believe in bipartisanship both as a matter of principle and as a practical necessity. In 2008, heterodox politicians like John McCain, Rudy Giuliani and even Hillary Clinton are going to have to face zealous assaults from within their own parties. But for the moment that war has come to Joe Lieberman."

Corzine Approves New Budget, Ending New Jersey Government Shutdown. The New York Times (7/9, Jones, Chen, 1.19M) reports, "Gov. Jon S. Corzine signed a budget for New Jersey Saturday evening, after a seven-day government shutdown and an acidic standoff with the Legislature that paralyzed state operations, frayed nerves and cost the state millions of dollars. Mr. Corzine, in a crowded public ceremony, approved the $30.9 billion budget but also cut $51 million in proposed new spending, much of it inserted by legislators before they approved the budget. 'This crisis should never have occurred and it must never be repeated,' Mr. Corzine said. His Saturday morning executive order brings 45,000 state workers back to work, as well as another 50,000 or so in industries affected by the shutdown."

The New York Times (7/9, Fountain, 1.19M) reports in its "Week In Review" section that while state budget disputes and missed deadlines are not uncommon, "the seven-day government shutdown that resulted from the New Jersey impasse was unusual. There have only been two other shutdowns, in Minnesota and Tennessee, since 1991." It explains that, unlike most states, New Jersey lacks a law or constitutional clause allowing government to continue operating in the absence of completed appropriations. It also notes that casinos had to close because gambling inspectors were among the state workers put on leave without pay during the shutdown.

Stem Cells Could Play Key Role In Wisconsin Governor's Race. In the Washington Post (7/9, A5, 744K), David Broder reports that the issue of stem cell research is "at the center of an impassioned political debate, one that will occupy the Senate this summer and may provoke President Bush's first veto." It may also decide the outcome of a Wisconsin governor's race "and a U.S. Senate contest in Missouri, where a stem cell research referendum is on the ballot." In Wisconsin, Gov. Jim Doyle (D) is seeking re-election, while his opponent, Rep. Mark Green (R) Green "has voted to ban work on cells donated by fertility clinics or created from embryos in medical labs. The fourth-term House member supports Bush's policy of limiting work to the relatively few cell lines created before a 2001 executive order setting forth terms for government-funded research." Seeking to rally Democrats, Doyle has called Green "a relentless opponent of stem cell research," while Republicans have placed initiatives on same-sex marriage and reinstating the death penalty on the ballot in a bid to turn out their supporters.

Maryland Governor's Race Moves In Two Orbits. The Washington Post (7/9, C6, Wagner, 744K) reports, "Maryland voters who happen to live in the Baltimore region have already been treated to $850,000 worth of television ads in the governor's race, candidates appearing regularly on the nightly news and a literal parade of politicians through their streets on the Fourth of July. The view from suburban Washington is quite different. Most voters in Montgomery, Prince George's and other Maryland counties in the region have yet to see a single one of those ads. … The result is two versions of Maryland politics for voters living in the state's two dominant media markets." While the candidates are attending events in Maryland's Washington suburbs, "no one denies that Baltimore is getting more attention."

Mark Kennedy Distances Himself From Increasingly Unpopular Bush. In his column for the Washington Post (7/9, B7, 744K) David Broder writes Rep. Mark Kennedy "is carrying the hopes of the national Republican Party in one of the few Senate races in the country in which the GOP has a chance of gaining a seat. The voluntary retirement of Sen. Mark Dayton this year has opened the way for a newcomer, and Dayton's Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party has given its endorsement to Amy Klobuchar, the two-term elected attorney of Hennepin County (Minneapolis)." Broder notes President Bush "lost the state by less than 3 percent of the vote in each of his races. But now, as Gov. Tim Pawlenty put it in an interview, 'the president continues to struggle here,' with approval scores below 40 percent. When I asked Kennedy in an interview if he agreed with the opening words of his profile in the current edition of Congressional Quarterly, the authoritative source on Congress, describing him as 'a dedicated conservative and loyal Bush supporter,' he seemed surprised. 'I don't know if I'd use any of those words to describe me,' he said."

Will Column Celebrates Interstate Highways. In the Washington Post (7/9, B7, 744K), George Will traces the contribution that the Interstate Highway System, on the occasion of its 50th anniversary. He writes that "Its ribbons of concrete represent a single thread of continuity through the nation's history." He notes in passing that "No legislator more ardently supported the IHS than the Tennessee Democrat who was chairman of the Senate Public Works subcommittee on roads. … This senator who did so much to put postwar America on roads suitable to bigger, more powerful cars was Al Gore Sr."

NYTimes Editorial Urges Consumers' Rights In Debt Collection. A New York Times (7/9, 1.19M) editorial, "When A Stranger Calls," notes rising consumer complaints about third-party debt collectors. It urges legislators and regulators to "take further steps to curb the lies, harassment and intimidation coming from out-of-control collectors. At the same time, they should also look at irresponsible lending: giving additional credit cards and high-interest loans to those already deep in the red."

Trade Imbalance Means Towering Stacks Of Containers Mar LA Neighborhoods. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Schoch, 958K) reports, "To understand the trade deficit, residents of Sandison Street do not need the help of world-class economists. They can just glance across the street at the mountain of faded brown cargo containers blocking the Wilmington sky. .. Tens of thousands of containers sit empty today in Wilmington--stark testimony that America buys more from other countries than it sends overseas to sell." Although some reused for U.S. exports or returned empty, "some are forgotten, and they pile up--in Wilmington and nearby cities, in communities lining the Long Beach Freeway, near rail yards in the Inland Empire." Area residents complain that the massed containers are not only an eyesore, but shelter rats and pose a potential hazard in case of an earthquake.

US Envoy Seeks To Build International Pressure On North Korea. The US response to North Korea's nuclear provocation was featured prominently on ABC, CBS and by the wire services. ABC World News

Tonight (7/8, lead story, 2:50, Avila, 8.78M) reported that the US "has sent a top-level diplomat to respond to the North's latest overture." ABC (Harris): "The Bush administration's point man on North Korea was rushed to this region after North Korea fired off those seven missiles. And today, he had some hard words for North Korea. Today, the North Koreans offered to return to the negotiating table -- if the US Agrees to ease financial restrictions it's placed on them. An offer quickly swatted down by assistant secretary of state Christopher Hill -- in South Korea today as part of a whirlwind trip through Asia to deal with the missile crisis." Hill: "This is not a time for so-called gestures of that kind. We have a country that has fired off missiles in a truly reckless way." Harris: "Hill said the only way for North Korea to improve its future is to return to the so-called six-party talks with the US, China, Russia, Japan and the two Koreas." ABC later notes that "Kim Jong-il may have gone too far this time, angering both South Korea and China, his main sources of aid and trade. Christopher Hill is trying to capitalize on that anger by convincing both of those countries, long reluctant to get tough on their neighbor, to change their stance."

In contrast to ABC and CBS, NBC Nightly News (7/8, story 4, :30, Holt, 9.87M) only briefly noted, "The U.S. is backing China's call for informal talks with North Korea over its recent missile testing. Christopher Hill made the comment after meeting with South Korean officials. He next heads to Japan for discussions." The AP (7/9, Chang) reports that Hill said, "the Chinese have talked about putting together a six-party informal, and we both support that and we think that all countries are prepared to come to that informal meeting."

The AFP (7/9, Chan-Kyong) reports, "The United States and Japan vowed to ram through UN sanctions against North Korea, but Washington also offered an olive branch by agreeing to meet one-on-one with Pyuongyang if it joined international talks." US special envoy Christopher Hill said "Washington was ready to meet the North's envoy's eye-to-eye if he joined the six-nation table," adding "I just can't do it when they are boycotting the six-party talks."

North Korea Threatens Military Action. The AFP (7/9, Kwanwoo) reports, "North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il vowed no compromise and said he was braced for 'all-out war' as the United States and Japan pushed for the United Nations to impose new sanctions on Pyongyang for its missile tests." In the "first reported remarks since his regime lobbed seven missiles into the sea," he "pledged not to give up his weapons programs," saying "that if the United States took 'revenge,' it would mean 'all-out war.'" Kim also "mocked US assertions that his regime was on the verge of collapse."

The AP (7/9, McGuirk) reports that the North Korea ambassador to Australia, Chon Jae Hong, in a letter to The Sunday Herald Sun newspaper in the southern city of Melbourne, "warned Sunday that international attempts to halt his nation's missile tests could lead to war," saying "North Korea 'will have no option but to take stronger physical actions of other forms, should any country dare take issue with the exercises and put pressure upon it.'"

The AFP (7/9, Chan-Kyong) reports that the North "threatened to strike back with a more 'physical' response if sanctions are adopted. Its UN representative said a binding referendum would amount to 'an act of war.'" And its ambassador for diplomatic normalization with Japan, Song Il Ho, said, "If anyone tries to put us under pressure, we will have no choice but to take stronger physical measures."

The AP (7/9) notes, "Japan won't compromise on the stern wording of a U.N. resolution that would impose sanctions on North Korea and order the communist regime to stop developing ballistic missiles, Foreign Minister Taro Aso said." It will push "for a vote on the resolution Monday despite opposition from China." Bloomberg (7/9, Cho) also covers this story.

China Seen As "Only Hope" For Resolving Disagreement With North Korea. Taking a negative tone, The CBS Evening News (7/8, story 3, 2:00, Assuras, 7.66M) warned that the negotiations with North Korea were deteriorating and that China, not the US, was the sole country which could resolve the disagreement, reporting that "the US envoy expressed support for China's plan to hold six-nation talks on the nuclear threat. At the same time he offered to hold face-to-face talks with the US and North Koreans on the sidelines." CBS (Petersen): "Christopher Hill in Asia hoping to restart nuclear talks with the North says there's no pleasure in the fact that ordinary people will suffer." Hill: "People that don't have enough to ea and not enough clothing and not enough electricity and meanwhile they have regimes firing off missiles." Petersen: "Things in Asia are going from pretty bad to even worse. Japan and North Korea are trading verbal insults. South Korea has canceled a round of talks with the North. The only hope is that China can somehow ride to the rescue."

North Korean Hostility Part Of Historical Pattern. The AP (7/9, Woodward) reports, "North Korea is well practiced in getting some of what it wants through provocation. Bullying through a bullhorn has worked time and again for a small nation with an outsized military force and an even bigger capacity for bluster and threat." Its coercive diplomacy "has involved antagonizing everyone on and over the horizon, foes and allies alike, and then pulling back." Wonhyuk Lim, a Brookings Institution fellow for northeast Asian studies, says that "as twisted as the North Koreans' logic may be, it is based on their negotiating experience with the Americans." This "pattern of edging toward confrontation, then edging back, has persisted, always accompanied by tough words. More are being heard now." Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said, "We're certainly not going to overreact ... to these wild statements," adding, "We've seen them before."

South Koreans Unfazed By Launch. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Demick, 958K) reports, "Though the United States and Japan quickly elevated the missile launches to the status of crisis, for South Korea it was just another predictable annoyance among many from a bothersome neighbor." Seoul is "in a familiar position of being caught between its estranged brothers to the north and its most important ally, the United States," and "has responded with somewhat contradictory moves. On one hand, it is proceeding with a previously scheduled economic cooperation meeting," but it "also has said that further requests for humanitarian aid will be put on hold." For South Korea, "the nightmare scenario here is not that North Korea will attack … Rather, it is that United States would attempt a preemptive strike on North Korea, triggering a war in which South Korea would be caught in the middle."

International Stock Markets Rattled By North Korean Tests. The New York Times (7/9, Sommer, 1.19M) in a brief recap of last weeks stock markets notes North Korea's missile tests rattled "stock markets around the world. The next day, when Wall Street returned to work, stocks fell sharply. Despite a modest rally on Thursday, the market finished lower for the week" on bad news from 3M.

Advanced Destroyer Deployed To Japan. The AP (7/9, Greimel) reports, "A new U.S. guided missile destroyer docked in Japan on Saturday amid tensions over North Korea's missile tests, but the military said the arrival was routine and had been planned months ago." The USS Musti, "one of the most advanced [ships] in the fleet," sailed into the port of Yokosuka. "In August, Yokosuka also will welcome the USS Shiloh, which last month demonstrated its ability to shoot down missile warheads in a landmark test off Hawaii." Both ships "are equipped with radar systems that employ Aegis technology, which is geared toward tracking and shooting down enemy missiles," and "the U.S. Navy now has eight Aegis-equipped vessels at Yokosuka."

Former Officials Call For Hitting Missiles On Launch Pad. Ashton B. Carter, professor at Harvard and former Assistant Secretary of Defense, and William J. Perry, professor at Harvard and former Secretary of Defense, write in a op-ed in Time Magazine (7/9), "The Bush Administration has tried to downplay the mounting danger posed by North Korea," and that "is not prudent or safe." Yet "again North Korea has crossed a line in the sand clearly drawn by the U.S. and its partners,'" the authors anticipated, which is "why, in an opinion piece published in the Washington Post on June 22, we urged the Bush Administration to strike the Taepo Dong 2 on its launchpad before the test." Should "the U.S. is ever going to defend a line in the sand with North Korea, that is the least provocative way to do it, and next time it will only be riskier." Although "Pyongyang tries carefully to cultivate the impression that it will lash out in response to any action against it, however limited," attacking South Korea "would surely and swiftly end in the elimination of the North Korean regime." However, inaction will make Pyongyang believe it has "a shield behind which it can pursue its interests with impunity." It also "has a long history of selling its advanced weapons to countries in the Middle East," and if the economy leads to the regime's collapse, "Who then might get its loose nukes?" The US should "strike any further Taepo Dong test missiles before they can be launched," penalize the North "for defying the international community's unanimous appeal not to conduct its July 4 tests," and develop "a clear strategy." The US "outsourced the North Korea issue to regional players in the form of the 'Six Party' talks," and it "has failed to produce any results."

NYTimes Examines Possible Outcomes Of Tensions. The New York Times (7/9, Sanger, 1.19M) lists possible outcomes to the standoff with North Korea. The US could negotiate directly, but "Mr. Bush says nothing doing." There is the "big worry…that if America negotiates alone, it will be hung out to dry when talks go bad," and "China and South Korea will likely portray Washington as the obstacle." However, "the downside to Mr. Bush's approach: When six nations talk, clarity is the first victim." Another possibility is pre-emption - "destroy North Korea's nuclear facilities at Yongbyon." However, "Many believe it is too late," as "the fuel could be stored anywhere" and "t he United States has accused North Korea of starting up a second nuclear weapons program, using uranium," which "makes bombing pretty useless." The Administration could decide to "Wait out the Kim dynasty, and hope that the starving, bankrupt, gulag-ridden state of North Korea finally collapses." However, "as Dick Cheney once famously said about the North, 'time is not on our side.'" Still, North Korea selling nuclear material "worries the Bush administration the most."

Missile's Failure Usual For Testing. The New York Times (7/9, Broad, 1.19M) reports, "Experts judge that many years of testing beyond that inaugural flight on Tuesday will probably be needed before the North would entrust the new missile with anything as costly and precious as a nuclear warhead." However, arms and aerospace experts said that setbacks like the missile's crash "were a normal part of rocket and warhead science" and "that, in general, new designs typically blow up repeatedly in flight tests before engineers can find and fix all the problems." John M. Logsdon, director of the Space Policy Institute at George Washington University, said, "It would have been more surprising if they had a success." Therefore, "it's reasonable to expect that North Korea is busy learning from the failure, fixing flaws before it launches another Taepodong 2."

US To Negotiate With Russia For Civilian Nuclear Deal In Exchange For Support On Iran. The New York Times (7/9, A1, Sanger, Rutenberg, 1.19M) reports, "The Bush administration said Saturday that it would open formal negotiations with Russia on a long-discussed civilian nuclear agreement that would pave the way for Russia to become one of the world's largest repositories of spent nuclear fuel." While "President Vladimir V. Putin has been looking to expand the country's role in the multibillion nuclear power business," the US "traditionally opposed any such arrangement." However, "administration officials said that once Mr. Bush endorsed Mr. Putin's proposal last year for Iran to conduct uranium enrichment inside Russia…it made little sense to bar ordinary civilian nuclear exchanges with Russia." Also, Peter Watkins, a White House spokesman, said "We have made clear to Russia that for an agreement on peaceful nuke cooperation to go forward, we will need active cooperation in blocking Iran's attempts to obtain nuclear weapons." The AP (7/9, Loven) also covers this story.

Russian Offer To Help North Korea May Affect Anticipated Deal. The Washington Times (7/9, A1, Hirst, 90K) reports, "Russia secretly offered to sell North Korea technology that could help the rogue state protect nuclear stockpiles and safeguard weapons secrets from international scrutiny, but officials backed off after the arms flirtation was publicized." This "presents a potential obstacle to Bush administration plans to share civilian nuclear technology with Moscow." At an information technology exhibition in Pyongyang late last month "Russian officials touted the equipment to the communist regime," and "Aleksei Grigoriev, deputy director of Russia's Federal Information Technologies Agency, told a reporter for the Itar-Tass news agency that North Korea planned to buy equipment for the safe storage and transportation of nuclear materials." While "the Russian Embassy in Pyongyang immediately denied the report, saying it was 'disinformation'" and "Mr. Grigoriev subsequently denied having spoken to the Itar-Tass reporter," according to western analysts "they would not be surprised if the two countries are discussing sensitive military deals."

G-8 Seen As Not Reflecting New Reality. The AP (7/9, Raum) reports, "Critics view the" G-8 "summit as a Cold War relic that needs to be reconstituted." While "often billed as a gathering of the world's leading economic powers," it is not. "China, now the world's fourth-largest economy…is not a member. Neither is India, the world's largest democracy and one of its fastest-growing economies. Nor is South Korea, Brazil, Mexico or Spain, each with a larger economy than G-8 member Russia's." The world's "economic dynamics are far different" than at the group's foundation, as "the astonishing growth of some Asian nations and parts of Latin America have altered the math."

Putin Reasserts State Control Of Major Economic Sectors. The Washington Times/AP (7/9, Ingram) reports that Russian President Vladimir Putin "has reasserted state domination over major economic sectors -- in part by installing members of his own team, many dating back to his days in St. Petersburg, into key positions in some major state-controlled companies." His "influence in so many industries raises questions about whether politics won't trump economics in the end when business decisions are made" and puts Russia "out of step with the developed countries that make up the Group of Eight," which "have expressed concern about the state's growing role." Among his critics, "economists say state involvement is fraught with negative consequences," while others believe "Putin and his circle are motivated less by patriotism than by the desire to spin power into personal wealth."

India Tests Nuclear Capable Missile. The AP (7/9, Rabinowitz) reports, "India test-fired its nuclear-capable Agni III missile Sunday for the first time," but it "has been viewed as a routine test — not saber-rattling with the country's nuclear-armed archrival and neighbor, Pakistan." The AFP (7/9) notes this is India's "first test of a nuclear-capable ballistic missile with a range of 4,000 kilometres." In May Defence Minister Pranab Mukherjee had said they were "was observing 'self-imposed restraint' before testing" the missile, but this provoked criticism that "esting was being delayed because of pressure from the United States."

Asia Embracing Nuclear Power. The AP (7/9, Casey) reports, "Led by fast-growing China and India, Asia is going nuclear in a big way to feed its ravenous appetite for energy." Both "say their future growth is at risk unless they diversify their energy mix," as "does South Korea." Greenpeace "continues to lead the charge against nuclear power, warning that Asian countries about to embrace the atom need to think hard about the potential consequences," and "Asia's biggest problem" is "what to do with the spent fuel." Still, "Asia's plans hold out the promise of a bonanza for American companies such as Westinghouse Electric Co. and General Electric Co. which already have a strong presence in the region."

Israel Withdraws From Northern Gaza, Rejects Ceasefire. All three network news programs described the violence in Iraq as escalating, while major papers noted Isreali pulled out of Northern Gaza. However, there was no mention of US diplomatic involvement in either. ABC World News Tonight (7/8, story 5, 0:20, Avila, 8.78M) noted, "Staying in the Middle East, dozens of Americans fled the Gaza Strip today. Many had been visiting relatives. But escalating violence drove them out."

The CBS Evening News (7/8, story 2, 2:00, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "The Palestinian prime minister called for a cease fire with Israel after 11 days of fighting in Gaza. Israel rejected the plea saying they will not negotiate with hostage takers in reference to the Israeli soldier whose abduction ignited the crisis." After describing the increasing violence, CBS (MacVicar) said: "Rather than breaking Palestinian resolve, attitudes here have hardened. This is a new altercation, they say, and militants are now heroes."

NBC Nightly News (7/8, story 3, 2:00, Fletcher, 9.87M) reported, "Israel answered no ceasefire, no negotiations until Palestinian militants free an Israeli soldier they kidnapped two weeks ago. And they say Palestinians must stop firing rockets at Israeli cities." Israel withdrew some force to create a buffer zone, but "Israeli military officers said they plan to expand their operation into other parts of Gaza and they'll continue fighting until they get their kidnapped soldier back."

The New York Times (7/9, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports that Palestinian prime minister from Hamas, Ismail Haniya's call for a mutual cease-fire came "after Israeli forces pulled out of most of the northern Gaza Strip" and was "perhaps responding to Israeli hints that a package deal might be possible to end a military and political crisis." This came in the form of Israeli cabinet minister Ophir Pines-Paz suggesting "that the crisis could end through a package deal of the kind that Egypt had been trying to promote -- the release of Corporal Shalit, coupled with a more formal cease-fire and an Israeli promise to release a number of Palestinian prisoners as the cease-fire is shown to have taken hold" by saying "If we reach a situation in which there are no kidnappings, no rockets, no tunnels, no raids into our territory, certainly Israel will have to reciprocate." The AP (7/9, Wagner) notes "Hamas often sends out conflicting signals…in part because of divisions between its more militant leaders in Syria and more pragmatic politicians in Gaza."

The Washington Post (7/9, A12, Wilson, 744K) adds, "The Israelis' abrupt pullback from the northern end of the Gaza Strip sharply reduced the overall intensity of their military operations" and "may signal the government's desire to pursue talks to win the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit." Still, "more Israeli armor entered the strip very early Saturday" and "the military stepped up its activity" along Gaza's eastern border. The AFP (7/9, El Oun), reports, "Haniya stressed that his Hamas government was determined to solve the problem through diplomatic channels in a 'peaceful' manner." Meanwhile, "UN Secretary General Kofi Annan…demanded immediate access for UN workers and humanitarian relief supplies to the Gaza Strip, saying he was 'extremely concerned about the dangerous situation in the occupied Palestinian Territory.'"

With a headline "Calls For Truce Fuel Hope In Gaza Standoff" the Los Angeles Times (7/9, King, 958K) takes a more hopeful tone reporting, "Both Israel and the Hamas-led Palestinian government expressed hope Saturday of arranging a cease-fire" on "the second consecutive day that a senior Israeli official had spoken publicly of the prospect of a compromise in the standoff." The Times adds, "Both sides have powerful incentives for finding a negotiated solution, but serious obstacles remain to any agreement."

Palestinians See Rockets As Creating "Balance Of Fear. The New York Times (7/9, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "the Palestinians persist in firing the crude, inaccurate rockets when there is virtual certainty that the damage they inflict will be far less than the punishment they will suffer" due to "a host of reasons, all based on the emotion of the conflict rather than the logic of warfare." They "often talk about their rockets and suicide bombings creating a 'balance of fear' with Israel, even if they cannot match Israel's weaponry," and "see the rockets as retaliation for Israeli airstrikes, or an act of solidarity with West Bank Palestinians when fighting heats up on that front." Now, "with tensions boiling over, support for the rockets is widespread in the northern towns, even if it means local communities will endure another heavy assault from the Israelis." Palestinian president Mahmoud Abbas "has sharply criticized the Palestinian rocket fire as counterproductive," but "never made a concerted push with the Palestinian security forces," and "the Hamas-led government has not sought to stop the rockets." During a ceasefire it "shared its technology and rockets with other factions" and "recently resumed its own attacks after Israeli airstrikes in Gaza that killed many militants and civilians."

Bush Congratulates Mexican Presidential Candidate. The CBS Evening News (7/8, lead story, 2:40, Whitaker, 7.66M) in its coverage of the dispute over the Mexican presidential election notes that "conservative free-market candidate Philip Calderon says he won fair and square. International election observers back him up. Today he received calls of congratulations from President Bush and other heads of state."

Obrador Accuses Calderón Of Fraud In Election, Calls For Protests. NBC Nightly News (7/8, story 9, 2:30, Holt, 9.87M) reported, "Now to a massive demonstration underway in Mexico City." NBC (Lewis): "These people are angry because they believe the election was stolen from their candidate, the leftist andres Manuel Lopez Obrador. He has called for peaceful protests, but many here worry things could get out of hand. Lopez Obrador is calling for protests all over Mexico. As his supporters converged on Mexico City's main square for today's huge rally, the U.S. embassy urged Americans to stay away from the area, warning that, 'even demonstrations intended to be peaceful can turn confrontational and escalate into violence.' That's the fear of many observers here -- that Lopez Obrador will not hold his followers in check. He insisted to reporters today that he is the winner, that the election was rigged." Lewis added, "Lopez Obrador is demanding a total recount, taking his case to the courts and to the streets. Asked today if the official judicial tribunal rules against him and declares Calderon the winner will he concede for the sake of peace in Mexico, he replied, 'we'll wait and see.'"

The Washington Post (7/9, A1, Roig-Franzia, 744K) reports that failed populist candidate Andrés Manuel López Obrador hopes to "overturn the results of Mexico's presidential election;" he is "alleging for the first time that Mexico's electoral commission had rigged its computers before the July 2 election to ensure the half-percentage-point victory of Felipe Calderón." Obrador will "attempt to have the election declared illegal by Mexico's Supreme Court," which "presages a constitutional confrontation because according to many legal experts the special elections court is the only body that can hear election challenges." On Saturday, Obrador "gave a mega-display of street power" with a rally in Mexico City, and, "during his 40-minute address, López Obrador stressed Mexico's class divide, accusing 'powerful interests' of trying to deny democratic freedoms to 'us, the poor.'" He appeals to "anger…from decades of perceived indignities and a sense of persecution by a succession of ruling parties."

The New York Times (7/9, McKinley, Thompson, 1.19M) adds that Obrador "suggested there would be civil unrest without a vote-by-vote recount," saying, "If there is not democracy, there will be instability." Meanwhile, "Calderón's campaign cited the volatile protests Mr. López Obrador led after his 1994 loss in arguing that he could be a danger to Mexico." However, Obrado also said, "This is a peaceful movement," although he "declined to answer several times when asked what he would do if the courts refused a recount." Calderón "effectively ceded the day's spotlight to Mr. López Obrador." The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Boudreaux, 958K) calls the crowd Obrador addressed "rowdy but peaceful," although it notes, "Many in the crowd said they were ready for a fight if Lopez Obrador did not prevail." The AP (7/9, Stevenson) notes, "The likelihood of continuing demonstrations suggests how difficult it will be for Calderon to unify Mexicans, many of whom believe the nation has yet to overcome the decades of institutional corruption and fraud that kept its leaders in power." Knight Ridder (7/9, Hall) and Knight Ridder (7/9, Hall) also cover this story.

Election Signals Shift In Mexico To Two Party System. The New York Times (7/9, McKinley, 1.19M) reports that "voters have pulled the curtain back on a new political landscape for" Mexico, and "who won may not be nearly as important as who lost." The Institutional Revolutionary Party "did not win a single state" and "lost its hold on Congress … In short, the declining former ruling party finally crashed and burned." Now there are "two invigorated, growing — and quite evenly matched -- parties" that "look a lot like the Republicans and Democrats or Britain's Tories and Labor."

Former GOP Counsel Gives Recount Advice. Benjamin L. Ginsberg, a partner at Patton Boggs and national counsel to the Bush-Cheney campaigns in 2000 and 2004, writes an op-ed in the Washington Post (7/9, B1, 744K) with advice for Calderon and Obrador: "get the right people." – "the smartest, ablest, toughest ones you can find." Next, "be sure they're committed to your candidate -- that commitment makes it possible to manage all that talent." Organize immediately, and "get a good caterer and some extra phone lines. I n other words, pay attention to logistics." You need to "line up top lawyers, which in a recount are a necessary (and underappreciated) evil," as well as "communications specialists." You must "just debunk the allegations as best you can."

Former Gore Counsel Says Recount Is Best For Calderon, Advises Obrador To Be Bush, & Not "Dignified, Responsible, Reasonable." Ronald Klain, general counsel for the Gore-Lieberman Recount Committee in 2000 and a lawyer in Washington, writes in an op-ed in the Washington Post (7/9, B1, 744K) that for Obrador "The good news is that he has avoided the two biggest problems that confronted Al Gore in Recount 2000: being forced to contest the election in a jurisdiction where the governor was his opponent's brother, and being tormented by a chief election official who was a partisan operative with a bizarre Queen Esther complex." The bad news he's "more than 200,000 votes behind" and "the clock is ticking loudly. If he wants to keep his candidacy alive, he must take decisive -- and quite divisive -- action." He must "bring meaningful and documented claims of fraud in the election," get "his supporters to the streets and question the legitimacy of the vote casting and counting process," and "demand that, notwithstanding Mexican law, every ballot be recounted, by hand, to ensure an accurate tally."

Former Mexican President's Genocide Charges Thrown Out. The AP (7/9, Grillo) reports that in "the latest blow to" Mexican "prosecutors' attempts to bring" former President Luis Echeverria "to justice for alleged crimes committed during Mexico's 'dirty war,' a violent crack down on leftist dissidents in the 1960s and 1970s," a "judge threw out genocide charges on Saturday against ruling that a 30-year statute of limitations had run out" He "had been under house arrest for more than a week on charges that he organized a student massacre as interior secretary in 1968." Still, "Prosecutors still can appeal the decision."

Venezuelan Government Elucidates Labor Policies With Chaplin Film. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Kraul, 958K) reports, "For President Hugo Chavez's socialist government," Charlie Chaplin's film "Modern Times" is "more than just entertainment: It's become a teaching tool. Since January, in a bid to expose the evils of 'savage capitalism,' the Labor Ministry has shown the Chaplin film to thousands of workers in places such as this rundown industrial suburb of Caracas. When the screenings at factories or meeting halls end, Labor Ministry officials then take their cue, and use Chaplin's plight to spell out worker rights under occupational safety laws passed last year and now being applied. They are part of Chavez's sweeping reform agenda that he calls Socialism for the 21st Century."

Ambassador From Finland Agrees UN Reforms Needed. Kirsti Lintonen, Finland's ambassador to the United Nations, writes in a letter to the editor of the New York Times (7/9, 1.19M), "The European Union concurs with your view on the importance and necessity of United Nations reform." It "is the single largest contributor to the United Nations budget. We attach great importance to reforms that would bring about efficiencies under budget and management rules," and "management reform is also central."

Pakistani Press Minister Objects To NYTimes Editorial For UN Reforms. Mansoor Suhail, press minister of the Pakistan Mission to the U.N., writes in a letter to the editor of the New York Times (7/9, 1.19M) that the Times' "editorial unfairly tends to stereotype developing countries as blockers of United Nations reform." The "vast majority of the United Nations membership" considers "progress on development resolution and implementation of agreed development commitments…a matter of the highest priority." However, Pakistan and other members of Group of 77 "believe that delegation of authority must be accompanied by robust accountability mechanisms."

Breaking Vow, Polish President's Twin To Become Prime Minister. NBC Nightly News (7/8, story 10, 0:10, Holt, 9.87M) reported, "In Poland political history is about to be made and that's why the two men are you seeing here are smiling. They are set to become the first identical twins to hold power at the same time. On the left is Poland's current president and on the left his brother who has been tapped by the ruling party to become Poland's prime minister."

The Washington Post (7/9, A12, Whitlock, 744K) reports that "there is no longer any doubt that the 57-year-old, chubby-faced twins are in charge of the eastern European country." Jaroslaw "replaces Kazimierz Marcinkiewicz, who unexpectedly announced his resignation on Friday." Although Marcinkiewicz "insisted that the Kaczynskis, who had put him in the job last year, did not maneuver him out the door," a number of "Poles were skeptical of the official explanation," that "he was giving up the prime minister's post so he could run for mayor of Warsaw in November," considering that "Marcinkiewicz had among the highest approval ratings of any politician in Poland." Jaroslaw had "promised voters he would not take the job if his brother won the upcoming presidential race," which he did, but the promise "sounded as if it was made grudgingly" and the twins "did little to dispel the perception that they were controlling the government behind the scenes."

The AFP (7/9) adds, "analysts were unconvinced" by the official explanation, as well. "Political scientist Kazimierz Kik said Marcinkiewicz's departure was forced by Jaroslaw Kaczynski, annoyed by the increasingly independent and high-profile stance the premier was taking." the AP (7/9, Gera) also covers this story.

Chad's Oil Money Not Reaching Those In Need. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Sanders, 958K) reports that three years after "poor, landlocked" Chad "joined the league of oil-producing nations, there are growing — and familiar — complaints that petroleum money is not getting to those most in need. For most of this year, Chad's oil wealth has been frozen in London bank accounts after a dispute with the World Bank." The Times writes, "Thanks to decades of internal strife and its reputation as one of the world's most corrupt countries, this former French colony was unable to attract investment partners to develop its oil fields until the World Bank agreed in 2000 to back a $4-billion deal to build a pipeline from Chad to the Atlantic coastline of neighboring Cameroon. … By the end of 2005, the government of Chad had received about $420 million, nearly doubling its annual income. But tracking where the money went is not so simple." The Times reports that aside from new roads, "government officials are hard-pressed to describe large-scale benefits of the oil funds." They talk about smaller projects: a new school fence and some renovated classrooms in the capital, HIV testing clinics, a water tower in the southern city of Doba.

Cellphones Used To Streamline Peace Program In The Congo. The Washington Post (7/9, A1, Sullivan, 744K) reports that cellphone use is upon in Africa. They "have also created a new kind of corruption in a country rife with it: People here tell of government officials demanding bribes in the form of airtime transferred to their cellphones. Local officials said they believe armed rebel groups use cellphones and texts to coordinate their operations in the country's eastern provinces." However, "But the technology is also being used to create peace." The World Bank, Britain, France and other big donors have put $200 million into a "year-old program, designed to turn Congo's warriors into wage earners. So far more than 75,000 people have handed over their guns in exchange for job training and a cash incentive: an initial $110 payment, followed by monthly $25 payments for a year." However, "clerks using thick account books with handwritten entries were having trouble making the thousands of payments efficiently. So, in February the program contracted with Celpay to modernize the process," which now takes minutes instead of hours.

Controversial Rape Law Divides Pakistanis. The New York Times (7/9, Masood, 1.19M) reports that Pakistan's Hudood ordinance, "introduced in 1979 and criticized internationally since, include a clause stating that to prove rape, a woman must have at least four male witnesses. If the woman fails to provide proof, she herself faces the charge of adultery." Critics say this "flaw … has put many women behind bars." The Times notes, "Pakistani society has remained bitterly divided over the laws. Orthodox clergymen have often portrayed the laws as divine. … Rights advocates have demanded absolute repeal since 1980's."

Russian Jet Crashes, Likely Killing 150. CNN (7/9) on its web site reports, "An Airbus A-310 passenger jet with 200 people on board left the runway early Sunday while landing at Irkutsk Airport in eastern Siberia, crashed into a concrete barrier and burst into flames, killing 150 people, according to the Russian news agency Interfax. The front of the plane was crushed, and more than 40 people were hospitalized with burns, the agency said, quoting emergency officials." The AP (7/9, Meyer) reports, "The regional prosecutor's office said a preliminary count showed that more than 150 people died, the Interfax news agency reported.

Cuban Woman Dies As Coast Guard Intercepts Migrants' Boat. The AP (7/9, Kennedy) reports, "A boat overloaded with Cubans being smuggled into the U.S. tried to ram a Coast Guard vessel in rough seas early Saturday, and a woman aboard the boat died, authorities said. The 36-foot, go-fast boat ignored orders to stop when the Coast Guard tried to intercept it 4 miles south of Boca Chica around 6:30 a.m., said Petty Officer James Judge, a spokesman for the Coast Guard. Coast Guard crew then fired two shots into the vessel's engine to disable it, he said." The AP adds, "The remaining migrants were still aboard the Coast Guard cutter and will be processed as usual, he said. Under the 'wet foot/dry foot' policy, most Cubans who reach U.S. soil are allowed to remain, while those intercepted at sea are generally sent home."

Ramos-Horta Named East Timorese Premier. The New York Times (7/9, Perlez, 1.19M) reports, "In a move designed to bring stability to East Timor after months of unrest, the Nobel peace laureate José Ramos-Horta was named prime minister on Saturday. President Xanana Gusmão selected Mr. Ramos-Horta to lead a new government after Mari Alkatiri was forced to resign as prime minister two weeks ago amid allegations that he had helped to organize and arm a civilian militia. … The selection was praised by the Australian government, which sent more than 1,000 soldiers to East Timor in late May to lead an international peacekeeping force in putting down an insurrection among members of the army and the police." The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Paddock, 958K) also notes Ramos-Horta's appointment.

Kristof Sees No Optimists On Darfur. In his column in the New York Times (7/9, 1.19M) Nicholas Kristof writes, "The Darfur Peace Agreement, signed on May 5, signaled a ray of hope in a desperate land. But on the ground, its deadlines are not being met, security is deteriorating, and the violence is rippling from Sudan ever wider into both Chad and the Central African Republic. One measure of how awful the situation has become in eastern Chad is that at least 15,000 villagers have fled ... into Darfur!" Kristoff adds, "The two most important Bush administration officials on Darfur, Robert Zoellick and Michael Gerson (who has been the conscience of the White House), have both announced their resignations, so there is a vacuum in Washington as well. President Bush should address this vacuum by appointing a top-level envoy for the crisis. Mr. President, how about calling in James Baker, or else Colin Powell? In talking to experts about Darfur over the last three years, I usually have encountered both optimists and pessimists. These days, I just can't find an optimist."

Hoagland Says Bush Provoking New International Law – Without US Input. Jim Hoagland writes in his column in the Washington Post (7/9, B7, 744K), "In spite of itself, the Bush administration is reshaping and revitalizing international law as a governing concept and a force in world politics." Their "highhanded policies in the war on global terrorist networks and the occupation of Iraq have provoked sharp reaction at home and abroad" that "has turned into a search by others for legal and political frameworks to contain President Bush's campaign to concentrate national security power in his hands and shield it from even cursory scrutiny and consultation." Both "Bush and Cheney underestimate the costs of their policies and the countervailing forces they inevitably trigger," and now "a new framework for international law is being developed in reaction to Bush's global policies -- without other significant American input. That is the message from America's allies, from Congress and now from the Supreme Court that the president should finally heed."

Iranian Student Movement Said To Have Stalled. Fotini Christia, a fellow at the Weatherhead Center for International Affairs at Harvard and currently at the International Center for Persian Studies, University of Tehran, writes in an op-ed the Washington Post (7/9, B7, 744K), "Today marks the seventh anniversary of the student protests that took post-revolutionary Iran by storm," but Iran's opposition "will not celebrate today's anniversary," as "the Iranian student movement is a shambles -- divided, confused and lacking any cause for celebration." While "the 1999 protests sought reform within the existing regime," it "didn't happen, and now, under President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's leadership, the process has been completely sidelined." While "the student movement very much wants a reemergence of the reform process…it has no good ideas on how to make it happen," and "has found no place in Iran's new political reality." Instead, "its stance has moved from the politics of realistic change to the politics of survival through inaction."

Bush's Foreign Doctrine Said To Have Backfired, Shifted Significantly. Time (7/9, Allen, Ratnesar) reports, that President Bush has found "himself in a world of hurt" with "no relief in sight." In the last " four years, the Administration has been forced to rethink the doctrine with which it hoped to remake the world as the strategy's ineffectiveness is exposed by the very policies it prescribed" as "the Bush Doctrine foundered in the principal place the U.S. tried to apply it." While "the White House insists that Bush's goals have not changed," the "strategic makeover is evident in the ascendancy of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who has tried to repair the Administration's relations with allies and has persuaded Bush to join multilateral negotiations aimed at defusing the standoffs with North Korea and Iran." Having used "so much energy and so many resources on al-Qaeda and the war in Iraq, the Administration is finding that other global challenges…have grown beyond its ability to do anything about them." The Administration's "miscalculations have come back to haunt it," as "Instead of deterring the rulers in Tehran and Pyongyang, the travails of the U.S. occupation may have emboldened those regimes in their quest to obtain nuclear weapons while constraining the U.S. military's ability to deter them." Meanwhile, "the complexity of global politics has caused the U.S. to struggle in its goal to spread democracy as a defense against terrorism" and ultimately resulted in "a broader dimming of the Administration's commitment to the ideals of its once proactive freedom agenda." Finally, "the practical costs of the last plank of the Bush Doctrine—unilateralism—may have finally persuaded the Administration to jettison that too."

LATimes Criticizes New China Censorship Law. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, 958K) editorializes, "In China, the National People's Congress is on the verge of approving a law that would forbid the media from reporting on breaking news without permission from government officials. The draft law plumbs new depths of censorship even in China, already among the most regressive countries when it comes to press freedoms." It is "particularly unusual" because it would "apparently" affect "foreign as well as domestic media. Though reporters for papers such as The Times are closely monitored, the government seldom tries to censor stories meant for outside consumption. Yet an official involved in preparing the legislation recently said he thought it should apply to all news organizations operating in China." The Times adds, "If there's a silver lining to this naked attempt at repression, it's that China's media and public are strongly resisting it."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Rep. Hoekstra Raises Concerns Over Congressional Oversight Of Intelligence. Highlighting what it characterizes as a "rift" between the White House and GOP lawmakers the New York Times (7/9, A1, Lichtblau, Shane, 1.19M) in a front page story reports, "In a sharply worded letter to President Bush in May, an important Congressional ally charged that the administration might have violated the law by failing to inform Congress of some secret intelligence programs and risked losing Republican support on national security matters." House Intelligence Chairman Peter Hoesktra's letter "did not specify the intelligence activities that he believed had been hidden from Congress." He "clearly was referring to programs that have not been publicly revealed." Administration officials have recently briefed Rep. Hoekstra, which appears "to have eased but not erased the concerns of Mr. Hoekstra and other lawmakers about whether the administration is sharing information on all of its intelligence operations." Hoekstra's letter "appears" to be linked to the selection of Gen. Michael Hayden to lead the CIA with Stephen Kappes as his deputy."

Like the New York Times, the Washington Post (7/9, A6, Babington, 744K) highlights the significance of Hoektra's "sharply worded letter" because it represents rare GOP criticism of Administration national security policies before noting, "Much of Hoekstra's letter to Bush outlined the chairman's objections -- which were widely known -- to the appointment of Stephen R. Kappes as CIA deputy director under Hayden. Kappes quit the CIA in 2004 in a dispute with then-Director Porter J. Goss. Goss preceded Hoekstra as House intelligence committee chairman, and many Republicans remain loyal to him." Hoekstra wrote, "Regrettably…the appointment of Mr. Kappes sends a clear signal that the days of collaborative reform between the White House and this committee may be over."

Journalism Deans Advocate Publishing National Security Secrets As Counterbalance To "Extraordinary Power Of The Presidency." A letter from four deans of leading US journalism schools is published in the Washington Post (7/9, B2, 744K) Outlook section. Annenberg School for Communication dean Geoffrey Cowan, dean, University of Southern California, Harvard University Shorenstein Center director Alex Jones, Northwestern University Medill School of Journalism dean John Lavine, Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism dean Nicholas Lemann and UCal Berkeley Graduate School of Journalism dean Orville Schell write, "It is the business -- and the responsibility -- of the press to reveal secrets." The deans maintain "Despite the rhetoric of their fiercest critics, most journalists take secrets seriously." They "believe that the extraordinary power of the presidency at this moment mandates more scrutiny rather than less. Yet Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales has said he would consider prosecuting journalists for publishing classified information. Such an action would threaten to tilt the balance between disclosure and secrecy in a direction that would weaken watchdog reporting at a time when it is badly needed."

Columnist Accuses Administration Of Intimidating Media. Frank Rich in his column in the New York Times (7/9, 1.19M) warns the Administration has an "insidious game plan" to "reboot its intimidation of the press, hoping journalists will pull punches in an election year." Rich claims that strategy worked for the Administration after the 9/11 attacks citing the "chilling words articulated at the get-go by Ari Fleischer (Americans must 'watch what they say') carried over to the run-up to the Iraq war, when the administration's W.M.D. claims went unchallenged by most news organizations."

Notes May Have Aided Gitmo Suicides. The CBS Evening News (7/8, story 6, 0:10, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "US officials say three inmates who killed themselves last month at the Guantanamo prison may have had help from other inmates. In a court filing officials found instructions for tying knots in the cell of other detainees who may have been planning suicides."

Following a Washington Post story yesterday, the New York Times (7/9, Cave, 1.19M) reports, "Detainees at the Guantánamo Bay detention center in Cuba may have planned three suicides there last month by exchanging messages on note paper that was provided by lawyers and generally not scrutinized by guards because of confidentiality rules." The Times adds, "Because all three of the men who died had never been visited by attorneys, government lawyers said the evidence 'indicated the passing of materials and messages between detainees and that some level of planning or coordination of the suicides had taken place.'"

The AP (7/9, Fox) adds, "The detention center's commander, Navy Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris, said in an affidavit that investigators believe 'the suicides may have been part of a larger plan or pact for more suicides that day or in the immediate future.'" The detainees lawyers "have condemned the confiscation of the legal papers" and one note on the suicides "did not appear to be written by the prisoner, or another of the detainees who committed suicide, and it was written on paper provided by lawyers stamped with the words 'Attorney-Client Privilege.'"

NYT, WPost Accuse Bush Administration Of Failing To Create "Fair" Legal Process For Terrorists. The New York Times (7/9, 1.19M) in an editorial writes that as Congress prepares to debate the Administration's detainee policies the debate "is not between people who want to win the war on terror and those who for some unfathomable reason do not. It is between an executive branch that seems bent on proving that the president has unlimited power and those who believe that the Constitution and the rule of law did not crumble along with the World Trade Center." The Times adds, "We would not be in this mess if Mr. Bush had followed the rules. If he had allowed the screening of captives on the battlefield, which the military wanted and the Geneva Conventions require, hundreds of innocent men would never have been sent to Gitmo. If he had asked Congress to create tribunals, instead of fashioning extralegal ones, some of those prisoners who really are terrorists might have been convicted by now in full view of the world."

And the Washington Post (7/9, B6, 744K) editorializes, "Having allowed President Bush to assert extralegal powers for nearly five years, some in Congress now want to rush through legislation that would rubber-stamp the regime that the court rejected. There is talk of completing a bill by summer's end. Some Republicans appear eager to turn what ought to be a serious debate about balancing national security and human rights into an election issue -- by labeling as soft on terrorism anyone who opposes Mr. Bush's unworkable scheme for trying Guantanamo inmates." But the Post finds it "encouraging" that "the Armed Services Committee under the chairmanship of Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) will take the legislative lead in the Senate. Mr. Warner's committee was the source last year of the sole piece of responsible legislation on foreign detainees since 2001, the ban on cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment of prisoners authored by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.)."

San Antonio Express News Urges Adherence To Rule Of Law In GWOT. The San Antonio Express News (7/9) editorializes, "Even in times of war, the United States is a nation of laws. When those laws are ill-suited to the conflict at hand, the commander in chief can work with Congress and the courts to modify them or create new laws. He may not simply ignore them. ... The Hamdan decision is the latest effort to restore a new equilibrium in this contentious debate."

Suspected Al Qaeda Arrested In Germany. The New York Times/AP (7/9) reports, "A German citizen of Moroccan descent" identified as Redouane E. H. "has been arrested in Hamburg on suspicion that he is a member of Al Qaeda with contacts to a man close to the Sept. 11 hijackers, federal prosecutors said Saturday." The man "is suspected of being in contact with Said Bahaji, who had close ties to the three Sept. 11 hijackers who lived and studied in Hamburg -- Mohamed Atta, Marwan al-Shehhi and Ziad al-Jarrah, Ms. Scheuten said. Mr. Bahaji is suspected of providing logistical support for the Hamburg cell but fled before the attacks and is thought to be in Pakistan. Ms. Scheuten said there was no evidence of direct contact between Redouane E. H. and the hijackers." He was arrested after officials gathered "information largely drawn from monitoring the suspect's conversations in online chat rooms."

19 Accused Of Plotting To Kill Westerners Acquitted In Yemen. The AP (7/9, Al-Haj) reports, "Nineteen alleged al-Qaida members accused of plotting to assassinate Westerners and blow up a hotel used by Americans were acquitted Saturday by a judge who also exonerated some of fighting U.S. troops in Iraq." They "were accused of forming a gang to assassinate Americans and Westerners in Yemen, and of joining the so-called holy war against the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq." But the judge ruled "the prosecution failed to provide 'adequate evidence that the defendants were plotting attacks against foreigners or planning to assassinate Americans in Yemen.'" Yemen Islamist affairs expert Mohammed al-Maqaleh "described the verdict as a 'shock' and a sign that President Ali Abdullah Saleh was trying to drum up support from Muslim radicals ahead of the coming presidential elections."

Rice Expresses Sorrow, Solidarity On Anniversary Of London Bombings. The AFP (7/9) reports, "The United States has expressed sorrow and solidarity with Britons in memory of the 52 people killed in London bombings a year ago, a day after the grim anniversary." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in a statement, "On the anniversary of their death we again mourn their loss and extend our condolences to their families." She also "recalled the United States shares with the people of Britain 'a deep bond of friendship that has stood the test of time.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Civil Rights Advocates Criticize US Pre-Emptive Terrorist Arrests. While government officials have used the recent terrorist-related arrests in Miami and New York as examples of success in pre-empting terrorist attacks, the New York Times (7/9, Lipton, 1.19M) says they "are inspiring a new round of skepticism from some lawyers who are openly questioning whether the government, in its zeal to stop terrorism, is forgetting an element central to any case: the actual intent to commit a crime." In an interview Friday Rep. Peter King "said that the cases also demonstrate that the authorities cannot always delay charges until they have built airtight criminal cases." King said, "It was essential that the F.B.I. get rid of its pre-9/11 mentality of not making an arrest until they have enough evidence to convict." But

University of Richmond professor Carl Tobias, "who tracks terrorism cases, said the modest evidence disclosed so far in some recent cases in relation to the ability of the suspects to deliver on their threats has caused him to wonder if politics might be a factor." Tobias said, "There is some kind of public relations gained by making Americans on the one hand feel concerned that the Sears Tower in Chicago or some tunnel in Manhattan is targeted yet on the other hand feel comforted that the government is on top of it."

Terror Suspects Considered NY And CA Targets. Newsday (7/9, Bazzi) reports, "Before Assem Hammoud and his associates decided to try to bomb New York's PATH trains, they had considered several other targets: the Brooklyn Bridge, the Golden Gate Bridge and the forests of California, where they would set a huge fire, Lebanese security officials told Newsday." Lebanese police "found maps and other information about the two bridges and California forests when they raided Hammoud's home in Beirut." The article said of Hammoud, "In militant chat rooms, he was instructed not to grow a beard, wear Islamic clothing or show any outward sign of religious devotion. He was told to act like a typical Lebanese young man so he could avoid suspicions." He "did not disappoint his militant handlers, living a fast life in Beirut."

Lack Of Funding Leaves US Mass Transit Vulnerable To Terrorism. NBC Nightly News (7/8, story 5, 2:00, Holt, 9.87M) noted the revelation of a terrorist plot to attack New York City's tunnels "is raising questions about what if they had made it here and how vulnerable the nation's mass transit networks really are to attack." Rep. Peter King: "The subways and the commuter trains are always going to be the most difficult to provide security for." NBC (Allen): "Since the attacks in London and Madrid, US transit officials have been warning the nation needs to take more of the $18 billion spent to improve aviation security since 9/11 and spend more of it on the ground." Matt Bettenhausen, Director of California Homeland Security: "If they spent just 10% that they used in aviation security, we would be further along in meeting those needs."

Antiwar Protestors Arrested At NSA. The Washington Times/AP (7/9, Ben Nuckols) reports, "Thirteen anti-war activists were given citations yesterday for protesting outside the National Security Agency headquarters at Fort Meade." The AP adds, "Twenty-five persons participated in the protest, but only 13 who refused to stop carrying signs were cited, said Max Obuszewski, one of those cited and a member of the group Pledge of Resistance -- Baltimore. They carried a banner reading 'NSA = Crime Scene' and other signs protesting the agency's involvement in the war in Iraq."

New Orleans Real Estate Market Is Booming. The New York Times (7/9, Saulny, 1.19M) reports, "In a market spurred by speculators and bargain hunters, an extraordinarily large number of houses in the flood-ravaged metropolitan area here are being sold, according to real estate analysts, who say volume and sales prices exceed levels before Hurricane Katrina." While higher prices stem mostly from rising values in suburban areas or city sections which escaped flooding, flooded New Orleans houses are also selling, often at discounts of up to $50 a square foot. In the nine-parish area that includes New Orleans, 7,506 single-family homes were sold in the first half of this year, compared to 6,449 in the same period last year, while the average price this year is $221,244, up from $193,097 last year.

WAR NEWS:

Military Prepares For Onslaught Of Trials. The press gave heavy coverage to the oncoming series of trials for alleged war crimes of US military personnel. NBC Nightly News (7/8, story 2, 2:30, Holt, 9.87M) reported that "the military's first report into the alleged murders of Iraqi civilians in Haditha, by American troops may be reverberating up the chain of command." NBC (Colt): "U.S. military officials tell NBC News, this investigation found some of the Marines filed false reports and that their commanders failed to follow-up when initially information did not match the evidence. The suggestion that some officers were derelict in their duty, already some battalion and company officers have been relieved of command and the investigation is not over." Gen. Barry McCaffrey (Ret.), NBC News military analyst: "Do we deal with it with transparency? Do we investigate and take corrective action? Then we reassure both the armed forces and the civilian population that we're going to do the right thing." Iraqi PM Nouri Al-Maliki: "Our people cannot tolerate this. Every day we are faced with heinous crimes causing distress. We must put an end to such practices." Colt: "There are at least five investigations underway into allegations of killings by American troops."

The New York Times (7/9, Worth, 1.19M) reports, "In the past month, new cases in Iraq have led to charges against 12 American servicemen who may face the death penalty in connection with the killing of Iraqi civilians," calling the succession of cases "an extraordinary flurry in a conflict that has had relatively few serious criminal cases so far." Experts attribute the increase to "a confluence of two factors: an increasingly chaotic and violent war with no clear end in sight, and a newly vigilant attitude among American commanders about civilian deaths." The Times reports of previously charged service members, "Of the 16 American servicemen known to have been previously charged with murder [in Iraq], only six were convicted or pleaded guilty to that charge, and none received the death penalty."

Military Confirms Failures In Haditha Matter. The Washington Post (7/9, A13, Ricks, 744K) reports that Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli's investigation of the alleged Haditha massacre "has concluded that Marine leadership failed multiple times, including in pre-deployment training, in the tone set by commanders, and in how information was reported up the chain of command." Most of Chiarelli's findings "endorse the conclusions of an investigation led by Army Maj. Gen. Eldon A. Bargewell." Sources "say they expect charges of homicide, making a false statement and dereliction of duty." The Post adds, "Some of the details of Chiarelli's findings were reported Friday night by CBS News and the New York Times."

US Seeks To Exhume Iraqi Girl's Body. The AP (7/9, Lenz) reports, "U.S. investigators have asked Iraqi authorities to help them navigate cultural sensitivities to exhume the body of a teenager allegedly raped and murdered with her family by American soldiers." An uncle says the family is "eager to cooperate with investigators" and would give permission to exhume the remains. The AP writes that many troops "remain convinced that the alleged rape and killings in Mahmoudiya were aberrations and that most American service members respect the rules of war." The Washington Times (7/9, 90K) reported similar details.

Revised Marine Training Reflects Alleged Crimes. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Perry and Miller, 958K) reports, "Even before the investigation of the killing of 24 civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha is complete, the Marine Corps has taken action, stressing accountability and sternly reminding officers that they must investigate all civilian deaths." The Times notes statements and trips taken by Marine commanders and describes apparent Marine resolve "to seeing that it never happens again."

Rules of War Are Taught To Troops. The AP (7/8, Tanner) reports on concerns about ethical behavior in wartime and describes a Naval Academy course on the "Code of the Warrior." It also quotes a former sniper who says that even though he was "ferocious in combat," he followed his "ingrained" training and never targeted civilians or killed prisoners.

Causes Of Misbehavior Are Contemplated. The New York Times (7/9, Carey, 1.19M) reports that the Mahmoudiyah incident "raises a question: How does someone with a personality disorder — a significant, disabling, and dangerous condition — manage the stress of combat? Wouldn't a person with a serious mental problem drop out, or be identified and quickly discharged? The answer, usually, is yes. People with paranoid, borderline or compulsive personality disorders, for instance, are hobbled by anxieties and delusional fears, experts say: two months of boot camp would typically be overwhelming for them." The Times also notes, "A person with psychopathic tendencies may appear to others as clearheaded as an elite soldier when under fire, or when on the attack. But the internal psychological reality is much different, research suggests."

Photograph Moves Senator To Help. The Washington Post (7/9, B5, 744K) reports on the photograph that "captured the scene when a car carrying the Hassan family home in time for curfew didn't stop soon enough at the soldiers' command. They fired into the vehicle, killing Hussein and Kamila Hassan. Five of the couple's children and a young cousin were in the back seat." Senator Edward Kennedy "helped arrange" medical treatment in Boston for the 12-year-old son. The orphaned children now live with their oldest sister and her husband.

Three US Soldiers Are Killed In Anbar Despite Armor. ABC World News Tonight (7/8, story 3, 0:15, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "In Iraq, the deadly dateline for today's violence is the hostile western Anbar province where more American troops have died. The Pentagon says three US soldiers were killed fighting insurgents there." The CBS Evening News (7/8, story 4, 0:15, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "In the battle for Iraq, three US soldiers were killed today in combat with insurgents. The fighting was in the violent Anbar providence west of Baghdad. A US military official says US Marine commanders will go through a day of pain once the top US general reviews reports they failed to investigate or covered up a massacre of Iraqi civilians in Haditha by Marines. US officials say a sweep of the predominantly Shiite Sadr City area of Baghdad killed or wounded more than 30 rebels."

The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Barnes, Daragahi, 958K) reports that the three "were killed by a massive roadside bomb that destroyed their heavily protected vehicle," a Cougar. Some Marines said that insurgents had "been placing larger roadside bombs to take out the [1st Armored Division]'s fleet of armored tanks and Bradley fighting vehicles." The AP (7/9, Yacoub) reports, "Three U.S. soldiers and an Iraqi woman translator were killed in separate incidents Saturday." The translator "was slain in a drive-by shooting" in Baghdad. In other news, the pro-Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party "said U.S. and Iraqi troops had surrounded 15 mostly Sunni villages near Muqdadiyah, about 60 miles northeast of Baghdad, making it difficult for civilians to move around." The article describes a succession of sectarian murders and the guardedly optimistic impressions of Sens. Jack Reed and Joe Biden after meeting the prime minister. The AFP (7/9) also notes the combat deaths.

considering withdrawing from executive offices in the Shiite-led government because militiamen have yet to free a Sunni legislator kidnapped this month." The bloc is already boycotting the Parliament; "the Sunni Arab boycott of Parliament just weeks after the government began to operate has underscored the fragility of the ethnic and sectarian power-sharing agreement." The Times notes, "The Sunni Arabs, increasingly anxious over the power accrued by Iranian-backed Shiites, have temporarily withdrawn from the political process in the past." Tayseer Najah al-Mashhadani was kidnapped on July 1.

Saddam's Victims Are Unearthed. ABC World News Tonight (7/8, story 4, 2:20, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "Now to the deaths of the past in Iraq. The tens of thousands of Kurds murdered during Saddam Hussein's regime may finally be getting revenge from the grave, mass graves two decades after they were murdered. Today, ABC's Terry McCarthy in Baghdad was shown evidence of the last desperate acts that could doom the former Iraqi dictator in his next trial." ABC (McCarthy): "Even as Saddam Hussein's first trial for the killing of 148 Shia villages is due to end next week, evidence is being gathered for an even bigger case, starting in August, involving potential genocide against Kurds." Dr. Sonny Trimble: "The bullets entered here and exited out here." McCarthy: "Dr. Sonny Trimble is director of the Iraqi mass graves program in Baghdad. With his 17 staff, he's preparing evidence for the second trial of Saddam Hussein, which will deal with the killing of up to 180,000 Kurds back in 1998. In a Kurdish documentary, which the prosecution plans to show at the trial, this woman says she lost 17 members of her family. Each day for her is a living death."

Report Describes Iraqi Police Abuses. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Moore, 958K) reports, "Brutality and corruption are rampant in Iraq's police force, with abuses including the rape of female prisoners, the release of terrorism suspects in exchange for bribes, assassinations of police officers and participation in insurgent bombings, according to confidential Iraqi government documents detailing more than 400 police corruption investigations." The report citing those documents was prepared by State Department contractors. The Times says, "Officers were punished in some instances, but the vast majority of cases are either under investigation or were dropped because of lack of evidence or witness testimony." One source calls the Interior Ministry "the most broken ministry in Iraq"; others note the failure of the Pentagon and State Department to coordinate their contradictory ideas about managing the ministry's professionalization.

Iraqi Woman Soldier Discusses Her Service. Newsweek (7/9) reports on "one of the few women" serving in Iraq's army. A Kurd who generally is upbeat in her interview, she says that sectarianism within the military "is increasing. I've seen conflicts. Things happen, and you're supposed to act out against a mosque or husseiniya [another name for a Shiite mosque]." She also acknowledges the risk of being "targeted" by insurgents, who sometimes "join the units" in order to learn officers' identities.

Baghdad Water Plant Struggles With Delivery. The AP (7/9, Gamel) reports, "After nearly three years and $45 million, a treatment plant in northern Baghdad is pumping enough drinking water for a quarter of Baghdad's people. But the trick is getting it to them because of losses to broken pipes and scavengers." Security is a problem too in infrastructure projects: "About $2.1 billion of the more than $4 billion initially allocated for water and sanitation projects was shifted in 2005 to address new priorities and security needs, according to the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad."

Los Angeles Man Detained In Iraq Sues US. The Washington Post/AP (7/9) reports, "An aspiring Iranian American filmmaker who spent nearly two months in a prison in Iraq without being charged has sued Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and other military officials, calling the government's detention policies unconstitutional." Cyrus Kar "was taken into custody in May 2005 after he visited Iraq to make a documentary film about Cyrus the Great," after "potential bomb parts" were found in the taxi he was riding. He alleges being physically abused during his incarceration. At the time of his release, Air Force Brig. Gen. Donald Alston said, "This case highlights the effectiveness of our detainee review process." News reports say Kar is a "former U.S. Navy Seal."

US Needs "Phased Redeployment" From Iraq, Says Senator. In an op-ed for the Washington Times (7/9, 90K), Sen. Jack Reed writes, "We do not need an artificial timetable for Iraq, especially not a political one, but we do need a plan from the White House on how and when we can succeed. Democrats support beginning a phased redeployment of U.S. forces from Iraq by the end of 2006. ... The days of young American soldiers manning most Iraqi checkpoints and getting caught in the cross-fire of sectarian violence must end." Senator Reed calls for American assistance to turn into "nonmilitary support" for reconstruction and reiterates, "Our national security demands we bring Iraq to a successful conclusion as quickly as possible."

Peter Galbraith Advocates Breakup Of Iraq. The New York Times (7/9, Solomon, 1.19M) interviews Peter Galbraith, author of "The End of Iraq: How American

Incompetence Created a War Without End." Galbraith suggests that the administration "stop insisting that Iraq can ever be a unified nation" and "just slice Iraq into three states" -- "Kurdistan, Sunnistan, and Shiaistan."

Past British Ambitions Are Seen In Iraq. The New York Times (7/9, Filkins, 1.19M) reports on journalist Dexter Filkins's visit to graves in Baghdad of British troops dating back to World War I: "The 30,000 British dead represent a total more than 10 times the number of Americans killed in 39 months of war here." He contrasts that visit with the spare memorial service for a Marine who was killed by a sniper in Ramadi.

WPost Op-Ed Pieces Criticize War Strategy And Behavior. Several Washington Post op-ed pieces criticize conduct of the war and offer suggestions for its improvement.

US Was Heedless Of Civilian Casualties. In the Washington Post (7/9, 744K), history professor Andrew Bacevich says that "the United States has botched this war" by its initially cavalier attitude toward civilian deaths: "Any action resulting in Iraqi civilian deaths, however inadvertent, undermines the Bush administration's narrative of liberation, and swells the ranks of those resisting the U.S. presence ... there is no question that the number of Iraqi noncombatants killed by U.S. forces exceeds by an order of magnitude the number of U.S. troops killed in hostile action, which is now more than 2,000." Bacevich argues the war will fail unless the Pentagon "measure[s] in painstaking detail -- and publicly -- the mayhem we are causing as a byproduct of what we call liberation."

US Might Be Unsuited For Fighting Insurgencies. Slate columnist Fred Kaplan, in another Washington Post (7/9, 744K) piece, says that reviewing the new Army counterinsurgency manual reveals two lessons: "One is that Pentagon planning for the Iraq war's aftermath was at least as crass, inattentive to the lessons of history, and contrary to basic political and military principles as the war's harshest critics have charged. The other is that as a nation we may simply be ill-suited to fighting these kinds of wars." He gives two reasons to question whether the US might be ill-suited: "The Army has also been lowering standards lately to meet recruitment targets. Second, can Americans maintain a long-term commitment to civil or insurgent wars at a cost of hundreds of billions of dollars and perhaps thousands of lives? The issue isn't whether we should, but whether we can -- whether the political system, with its competing demands and aversion to risk, is capable of it."

Pentagon Should Tally Civilian Deaths. Rachel Dry, in the Washington Post (7/9, 744K) reports that civilian death counts in Iraq differ widely: "The civilian death toll in Iraq is either 100,000, or 50,000, or 43,273, or, as President Bush said in December, '30,000, more or less.'" It quotes an antiwar researcher as saying that the Pentagon should "take charge" of counting the deaths: "We consider it a disgrace and obscenity that the world's largest superpower leaves this job to 12 unpaid volunteers."

Many Military Medics Were "Partners" In Prisoner Abuse. In another Washington Post (7/9, 744K) piece, medical professor Steven Miles charges, "Many armed forces physicians, nurses and medics have been passive and active partners in the systematic neglect and abuse of prisoners ... These were not isolated acts of medical complicity; rather, they formed a pattern of abuse authorized (or ignored) by senior U.S. officials." Miles likens the behavior of those doctors who did not object to abuse to "the torture physicians of Argentina and Chile [who] simply went to work in the prisons. They did what was asked of them and did not report what they saw."

Afghan and Coalition Forces Attack Taliban. NBC Nightly News (7/8, lead story, 3:00, Holt, 9.87M) reported, "It was the first front in America's declared war on terror and tonight almost five years later, American troops are still waging fierce battles far from view in the remote valleys and rugged mountains of Afghanistan. Tonight though we have a rare up-close view from the frontlines of this often forgotten battleground. An enemy ambush last night that left several U.S. troops injured. NBC's Jim Maceda was traveling with soldiers when this happened. American troops are breaking new ground in this long war in a place where the Taliban has a firm grip on the land and the people." NBC (Maceda): "Five more U.S. Soldiers wounded in a Taliban attack late last night. Images rarely seen by American viewers and caught on tape only because we were imbedded with the unit that was hit. The infantry, part of the mountain division on a frontline as remote as any in this war. ... The hardest battle, winning hearts and minds in a Taliban stronghold. In an information war, U.S. forces are handing out A.M. radios that get pro-government stations to these village elders so that afghans have something besides Taliban propaganda to listen to. Lt. Col. Sturic: "Quit the fight against a government that wants to give you education, peace, prosperity and unity." Maceda: "But after the speeches it was Lieutenant Colonel Sturic's unit that were ambushed on the way back to base. A reminder of how long this battle will last."

The New York Times (7/9, Wafa, 1.19M) reports, "Afghan police officers raided mosques across the volatile southern city of Kandahar late Thursday night and arrested more than 100 people sleeping in compounds, according to Afghan officials. The arrests appeared to be the first large-scale raids of mosques carried out by the country's American-backed government and immediately set off a backlash from Afghan religious leaders." Leaders alleged that worshippers often stayed overnight in mosques, while the Kandahar police

"said [it] had received intelligence that unidentified men were meeting in mosques in Kandahar, which has experienced a sharp increase in suicide bombings this spring."

Peruvian Soldier Is Killed By Bomb. The AP (7/8) reports, "A roadside bomb killed a Peruvian soldier and wounded four other NATO troops patrolling western Afghanistan on Sunday, the Spanish Defense Ministry said. The soldiers were patrolling in an armored convoy near the city of Farah after sunset when a bomb exploded near their vehicles."

Marine Recruiter From Film Is Mourned. The AP (7/9, Cohen) reports on Marine Staff Sgt. Raymond Plouhar, who was killed by a roadside bomb in Iraq. He "was featured in Michael Moore's antiwar documentary, 'Fahrenheit 9/11,' portrayed as an overzealous Marine recruiter who targeted poor kids." The detailed article says that despite the negative image from the film, he was actually "a charmer, a good talker, a champion of the underdog (always defending and befriending kids picked on in school) and though he was trained to fight and kill, he preferred the role of peacemaker."

Biography Illuminates Gonzales' Relationship With Bush. The Austin American-Statesman (7/9) runs a review of "The President's Counselor," a biography of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales written by Austin journalist Bill Minutaglio. In the review, University of Texas law professor Sanford Levinson writes, "There are two major problems with 'The President's Counselor.' The first, which is no fault of Minutaglio's, is that Gonzales is an almost completely opaque subject. The second, for which Minutaglio does bear some responsibility, is that there is no evidence that Gonzales has risen to 'power' so much as 'prominence.' The two are not the same." Levinson continues, "As to the first problem, it is widely acknowledged that Gonzales is a taciturn individual. (One infers that he did not cooperate with this book inasmuch as there is no indication that Minutaglio ever interviewed Gonzales.) … Minutaglio himself describes Gonzales as displaying 'a mortician's calm' at all times. … Perhaps in this day of confessional memoirs, when millions can be made by publicizing — or even making up — childhood tales of woe, one ought to be grateful for a public figure who adamantly resists letting the public in on the emotional details of what has been an extraordinary life." Levinson adds, "Gonzales does exemplify one version of the American dream, though he appears to be notably unreflective about what is to be learned from it. … Gonzales might simply be stunningly unreflective. Or he might be remarkably self-disciplined for reasons going back to his childhood, when he seemingly developed a tendency to keep hidden what he considered problematic aspects of his life. As a child, he never invited his school friends over to his home; Minutaglio suggests that this is because he was ashamed of his family's poverty. Similarly, he seems unwilling to invite anyone — or at least anyone willing to speak to Minutaglio — into his interior life." Levinson concludes, "Gonzales has never given Bush anything other than what Bush primarily values, which is absolute loyalty, and nothing in the first year and a half of his attorney generalship suggests any deviation. Most of his time has been spent defending unrestrained presidential power, including threatening to prosecute journalists who are attempting to engage in the oversight that a Republican Congress has failed to do. … This book is no doubt as illuminating as it could be about Alberto Gonzales, which is not very, save for detailing his remarkable rise from poverty to the halls, if not the actuality, of power. It is ultimately more illuminating about George W. Bush, who has no desire to welcome into his political family anyone who will seriously challenge any of his views. He found the kind of man he was looking for in Alberto Gonzales."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Timing Probe Forces Firms To Take Action On Options. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Petruno) reports, "The investigation of companies' stock-options practices has the look of a regulatory free-for-all: The Securities and Exchange Commission, the Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service all are interested in whether executives manipulated options contracts." The Times continues, "The companies may have violated SEC rules on accounting and disclosure. They may have violated criminal statutes if deception was deliberate. And they, and their executives, may have cheated the tax man in the process. … Many companies aren't waiting for a prosecutor to knock on the door. … 'Right now boards all over the country are hiring outside counsel and forensic accounting experts to look at their option practices,' said Kevin Cameron, president of shareholder advisory firm Glass, Lewis & Co. … 'But that's not something you can do quickly,' he said. Which means it could be a long second half of the year for investors who are worried that their companies could be implicated." The Times adds, "Prosecutors don't announce their investigations, but many companies choose to disclose to shareholders if they've become a target of a civil or criminal probe. That is how most of the companies implicated so far have come to light — firms such as Irvine-based semiconductor maker Broadcom Corp., computer hardware producer Brooks Automation Inc. and tax software giant Intuit Inc. … Yet it isn't clear that some of the games played with options in the past actually broke any laws. Backdating of options, without public disclosure, may be cut-and-dried fraud. But simply timing option awards ahead of expected favorable company news makes good business sense, SEC Commissioner Paul Atkins said at a conference in Washington last week."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Seal On Jefferson Documents Expires, But Will Remain In Effect. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (7/9, Alpert) reports, "A 45-day seal on materials seized in a raid on U.S. Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office legally expires today -- but will be continued anyway, as lawyers and politicians wrangle over unprecedented constitutional issues." The Times-Picayune continues, "On May 25, President Bush ordered the seal in hopes that his Justice Department and House negotiators could "in good faith and with mutual institutional respect" resolve their disagreement over the legality of the first-ever search of a congressional office." The Times-Picayune adds, "Agents seized documents and computer hard drives as part of a federal corruption probe of the eight-term New Orleans Democrat. … The seal will remain in place consistent with a previous statement by the chief judge for the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., Thomas Hogan, that the president's directive should continue until 'further order of the court.'" The Times-Picayune notes, "On June 16, Hogan heard oral arguments during which Jefferson's lawyer and the attorney for the bipartisan leadership of the House of Representatives accused the Justice Department of an attack on the constitutionally established separation of powers. … Hogan, who had granted the government's request for a search warrant for Jefferson's office, strongly suggested during the hearing that he didn't find the legal arguments by Jefferson's lawyers and the House counsel's office convincing. He promised a quick ruling. But as of late Friday, both sides were still awaiting his ruling, which is now expected early next week."

30 In Alabama Charged With Hurricane-Related FEMA Fraud. The Birmingham News (AL) (7/9, Walton) reports, "At least 30 people have been charged in Alabama federal courts with scamming the Federal Emergency Management Agency of thousands of dollars by posing as Hurricane Katrina victims." The News continues, "As federal officials try to get a handle on the scope of FEMA aid fraud, questionable disaster-relief claims continue to mount in Alabama and across the country months after the August storm." The News adds, "In the North Alabama District, which includes the 31 northernmost counties and is based in Birmingham, nine people have been charged with FEMA-related fraud. … In the state's Middle District, based in Montgomery, 13 cases have been charged, said Retta Goss, a court spokeswoman." The News notes, "So far in the Mobile-based Southern District, eight cases have been filed, with officials expecting more. 'Many investigations are under way,' said Charlie McNichol, a spokesman for the district's U.S. attorney's office. … Nationally, prosecutors in 23 districts have charged more than 212 people with hurricane-related crime, according to the Department of Justice's Hurricane Katrina Task Force February statistics, the latest available. The task force was initiated in September 2005 by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … 'There will be consequences for those who have engaged in such fraud and deceit,' U.S. Attorney Alice Martin of north Alabama said."

Online Sex Stings On The Rise. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/9, Ove) reports, "Across America, online sex stings are booming. … Arrests have doubled since 2001, and so many cops are online that the federal Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force program is expanding its intelligence database so that police don't trip over each other in cyberspace." The Post-Gazette continues, "Cyberstings also are getting unprecedented exposure with Dateline NBC's controversial 'To Catch a Predator' series, which features a civilian group called Perverted Justice nabbing suspects while cameras roll. … The growth of this phenomenon raises big questions: … Are stings deterring predators? Or is the Internet creating more of them? And why are so many men -- almost all of them white and many well-educated -- trolling online for teens when they know they're being hunted? … The short answers: Probably, maybe and because they can't help themselves. … But as is often the case with the subject of child molestation, the issues are a good deal more complicated than that." The Post-Gazette notes, "The best evidence, for example, indicates that there has been a dramatic overall decline in sexual abuse of children in America over the past 15 years. … Yet at the same time, those who examine this sort of thing -- and those who put predators in jail for a living -- are pretty sure that Internet sex crimes are increasing. … Federal prosecutions certainly are. Cases against those who prey on children or collect kiddie porn have jumped from 344 in 1995 to 1,576 last year."

US Military Bases Grapple With Child Pornography Incidents. The Stars & Stripes (7/9, Allen) reports from Camp Foster in Okinawa, Japan, "There's an epidemic of child pornography and exploitation in the United States, the government says, and don't think you're immune if you're stationed overseas." S&S continues, "In recent months, several servicemembers on Okinawa have been court-martialed on charges of downloading child pornography on the Internet. … In one case, an Air Force technical sergeant on Kadena Air Base was found guilty of using his home computer to solicit sex from a 13-year-old girl who also lived on base. In April he was sentenced to 5 years in prison and a bad-conduct discharge for child solicitation and downloading child porn." S&S adds, "Child pornography, the images of people younger than 16 engaged in sex, is illegal 'anywhere at any time,' said Lt. Col. Janice Pegram, commander of the Air Force Office of Special Investigation's Detachment 624. … In the past year, Pegram said, there have been five cases of child pornography on Kadena and other investigations are ongoing. Most of the cases involve downloading the pictures from the Internet, she said. A few involved sharing child porn with other Internet users. … During the investigations, all computer equipment seized is sent to the Defense Computer Forensics Laboratory in Virginia, part of the Defense Cyber Crime Center. Earlier this year, center director Steven Shirley said child porn made up 50 percent of the cases the center handled."

WPost Says Abramoff Dealings Hurt Conservative Activist Norquist. The Washington Post (7/9, A1, Weisman, 744K) reports that following reports that conservative activist Grover Norquist "served as a cash conduit for disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, the irascible, combative activist is struggling to maintain his stature as some GOP lawmakers distance themselves and as enemies in the conservative movement seek to diminish his position." And, "the infighting is taking a toll on Norquist's standing. Some social conservatives who have jousted with him over his more libertarian views on the regulation of television and its depictions of violence and depravity are exploiting his weakness to press their positions on Capitol Hill. Security-minded defense hawks who for years have questioned his ties to Muslim activists are resurrecting charges that Norquist has turned a blind eye to terrorist sympathizers." Norquist is fighting back, accusing his critics "of dishonesty, personal vendettas and political gamesmanship. He has saved his choicest words for Sen. John McCain."

Cunningham Probers Eye Contractor. The Washington Times/AP (7/9) reports, "The prosecutors who sent former U.S. Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham to prison for taking bribes now are focusing their attention on his friend Brent Wilkes, a San Diego defense contractor who won nearly $100 million in contracts in the past decade." Wilkes' attorneys have confirmed that he is the "Co-Conspirator No. 1" in Cunningham's plea bargain. Prosecutors claim that Wilkes paid the ex-Congressman over $600,000 to obtain government contracts, and while no further indictments have issued since Cunningham was sentenced to over eight years in prison in March, a grand jury remains active."

CIVIL LAW:

Carnival Company Seeks To Get Back Over $100K In Loans To Tony Rodham. The Washington Times (7/9, McElhatton, 90K) reports, "A bankruptcy trustee for a carnival company whose owners received a pardon from President Clinton is seeking to garnish the bank accounts of Mr. Clinton's brother-in-law to recoup more than $100,000 in loans. Anthony D. Rodham, one of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's two brothers, got the loans from United Shows of America Inc. after its owners obtained the presidential pardon in March 2000 over the objections of the Justice Department." The owners of United Shows, Edgar Gregory Jr. and his wife, Vonna Jo Gregory, were convicted of bank fraud in 1982 on charges of illegally giving loans to friends. When President Clinton pardoned the Gregorys, Rodham "reportedly said he worked for Tennessee-based United Shows as a consultant and denied taking money to lobby for presidential favors."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Las Vegas Police Shootings Come Under Scrutiny. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (7/9, Mccabe) reports, "The image of Tarance Hall's limp body being pulled from a car onto the Strip and cuffed after he was fatally shot by Las Vegas police late Tuesday resonated across the valley and was broadcast nationwide. … And though critics wonder whether the Metropolitan Police Department is resorting to deadly force too soon, police continue to defend their use of guns because, they say, the criminal element has become less cooperative and more prone to engage officers violently." The Review-Journal continues, "Hall's shooting was the 18th officer-involved shooting this year by the police department and the 15th since police Sgt. Henry Prendes, 37, was slain by Amir Rashid Crump on Feb. 1. Hall's shooting also was the eighth fatal shooting this year. In at least three of the 18 shootings, nobody was injured. … Some national experts suggest an officer's death can play a role in the mentality of other officers to reach more quickly for their firearms." The Review-Journal adds, "Lt. Nelson Andreu, a retired detective for the Miami Police Department and an expert on officer-related shootings, said the shooting of a police officer can cause other officers to become more concerned with their own safety, which can lead to officer-related shootings. … But local police say that's not a factor. … Last year, there were 12 officer-related shootings involving Las Vegas police, nine of which were fatal. In 2004, there were 21, 10 of which were fatal. … So far, seven of the eight fatal shootings by officers this year have been found to be justified after Clark County coroner's inquests. An inquest has yet to be set for Hall's death."

Sarasota County, FL, Says Federal Disability Compliance Fine Too High. The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida) (7/9, Sword) reports, "Federal civil rights officials want to levy $5 million in fines, penalties and damages against Sarasota County as part of what would amount to the county admitting it discriminated against people with disabilities." The Tribune continues, "That was the negotiating stance of the U.S. Justice Department's Civil Rights Division before it filed a lawsuit June 30 against the county alleging violations of the federal Fair Housing Act." The Tribune adds, "County officials say the proposed penalties are too onerous and believe they can defend their 2004 actions which prevented Renaissance Manor, a nonprofit organization, from operating six group homes known as Tammi House in Warm Mineral Springs. The Justice Department, however, has been aggressive in defending the disabled in housing discrimination cases and has filed 94 such lawsuits against local governments, businesses and individuals since 2000. The federal demand from Sarasota County appears to be bigger even than a high-profile lawsuit that led last year to the housing authority in Baltimore agreeing to $1 million in penalties and spending several million dollars on housing for the disabled. … The Tammi House group homes are all near one another on Sevilla Street, and each house has up to six residents. The federal suit says Renaissance Manor lost more than $1 million in grants because of the county's actions. The county violated the Fair Housing Act, a federal law prohibiting discrimination against buyers or renters because of a handicap, the suit says. … County officials deny the allegations, saying they objected to the clustering of the six homes in one neighborhood. State law requires 'community residential homes' to be licensed and located at least 1,000 feet from each other."

Former Warner Cabinet Official Opposes Virginia Gay Marriage Ban. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (7/9, B8, 744K) Michael Schewel, Virginia's secretary of commerce and trade under Gov. Mark R. Warner, writes, " The Marshall-Newman amendment, the so-called "marriage amendment," seeks to amend Virginia's Constitution to ban gay marriage and to impose other legal limitations on unmarried couples, including heterosexual couples. The amendment is not only useless -- gay marriage has been outlawed in Virginia for 30 years -- but it is downright harmful to the state's economy in two important ways."

New Jersey May Be Next State To Weigh Gay Marriage. The New York Times (7/9, Healy, 1.19M) reports, "Now that New York's highest court declined to legalize gay marriage last week, where's the next battleground? Next door, in New Jersey. Gay rights advocates are storing hopes in that state's Supreme Court, which will most likely rule on the issue sometime this summer; a similar case is also pending in Washington State." Advocates for gay marriage are encouraged by the New Jersey court's "more flexible standard in discrimination cases," and the Times notes that in arguments earlier this year, ", the New Jersey judges did not dwell on child-rearing or the needs of parents, central issues in the New York decision." And one foe of gay marriage, Monte Stewart, president of the Marriage Law Foundation, argue that even a decision for legalization might not matter much nationally, "simply because of the reputation of the New Jersey Supreme Court."

WPost Editorial Says Public Attitudes, Not Courts, Are Key. The Washington Post (7/9, B6, 744K) writes, in a "'Gettysburg' For Gay Marriage?" editorial, that while "The decision last week by New York's highest court not to legalize same-sex marriage is being portrayed as a big defeat for gay rights activists," with the head of one traditionalist group calling the New York decision "the Gettysburg in this big contest," in fact it changes little. That's because "since the Massachusetts decision in 2003, it's become clear that democratic majorities, not judges, ultimately will decide how evenhanded state marriage laws are going to be," through ballot initiatives or state legislation. So, "the most a state court can do is change the legal baseline," and since state laws and constitutions can generally be overturned without too much difficulty, "courts cannot force same-sex marriage on an unwilling populace." So, noting its support for same-sex marriage, the Post says the task remains "to convince a majority that couples who love each ought to have the state's recognition for lifelong relationships--and that such recognition poses no threat to heterosexual marriage."

Women Look Back On 30 Years At Annapolis. The Washington Post (7/9, George, 744K) reports, 30 years after women first gained admission to the Naval Academy, "But though much has improved since women first arrived -- and many female graduates express great loyalty to the storied 161-year-old institution -- a complex and sometimes troubling portrait of student life emerges from three recent studies sponsored by the Defense Department." The Post recounts early alumnae's struggles and says that, despite progress, student life is "complex and sometimes troubling" -- "in the 2004-05 school year, 59 percent of female midshipmen and 14 percent of men reported sexual harassment, defined as crude and offensive behavior, unwanted sexual attention or sexual coercion. Sexist behavior -- put-downs and offensive comments -- was reported by 93 percent of women and 50 percent of men."

explore a possible alliance with Nissan Motor Co. and Renault SA, the process seemed firmly in the hands of GM Chairman and CEO Rick Wagoner. … But in the world of corporate mergers and acquisitions, events can quickly spin out of control." The Free Press continues, "So far, there's nothing in the proffered Nissan-Renault overture to buy part of GM to indicate it's anything but friendly. But even this mild-mannered gesture could lift the lid off a box of snakes. … A rival suitor could ante up a better offer. At some point, GM's Board of Directors might launch a spirited, even ugly, defense. And talk of a GM deal might stimulate merger or takeover offers to cross-town rival Ford Motor Co." The Free Press adds, "Auto insiders doubt any of those possibilities will happen this time. Most GM watchers expect the company to politely study the Nissan-Renault overture before turning it down. … Even so, with the fate of the world's biggest automaker on the line, along with the jobs and livelihoods of tens of thousands of metro Detroiters, the unexpected becomes the expected. … Beyond a potential three-way alliance, other possibilities include: … Another suitor turns up. Once two or more companies initiate friendly discussions about a deal, it is common for another, unfriendly suitor to make a rival offer. … Ford becomes a target. … Politicians get involved. … In a way, the least likely outcome is that nothing happens -- that Nissan-Renault simply goes away after GM rejects its overture."

ENVIRONMENT:

Texas Lawsuit Charges Inaction On Water Pollution Is "Environmental Racism." The New York Times (7/9, Blumenthal, 1.19M) reports on a lawsuit filed by residents of DeBerry, Texas, a historically black enclave in East Texas oilfields whose groundwater the Environmental Protection Agency has found contaminated with pollutants including arsenic, benzene, lead and mercury. The self-styled victims of "environmental racism" in June "filed suit in federal court, accusing the Texas Railroad Commission, which regulates the state's oil and gas industry, of failing to enforce safety regulations and of 'intentionally giving citizens false information based on their race and economic status.'" They also claim that, while the state agency has for years been moving slowly and making only inconclusive inquiries on their complaints going back almost two decades, it moved quickly last summer to clean up a largely white Houston suburb. The Texas Railroad Commission said it had not yet been officially notified of the lawsuit and had no comment.

IMMIGRATION:

GOP Seen As Taking Risk On Immigration Reform. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Riccardi, Barabak, 958K) in an article titled "GOP Immigration Tactic: Blast Away, But Be Nice" reports, "Hoping to use the volatile issue of illegal immigration to avert a November election disaster, Republican candidates across the country increasingly are attacking their Democratic opponents on the subject." Yet, "mindful of a possible voter backlash, they are attempting to do so without seeming intolerant or divisive." The Times continues, "The official GOP position is that the party will not use immigration as a political bludgeon against Democrats. Karl Rove, the president's chief political advisor, has made courting Latinos a priority through his years in the White House and has avoided the harsh rhetoric used to rally partisans on other issues." Yet "many Republicans hope a tough-on-illegal-immigration platform can help overcome the political drag of an unpopular president and growing public sentiment against the war in Iraq in November's midterm election." The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Gaouette, 958K) also publishes a Q&A on immigration reform.

Bill Clinton Applauds Bush Support For Comprehensive Immigration Reform. The AP (7/9, Jablon) reports, "Former President Bill Clinton praised President Bush on Saturday for supporting reforms that would allow millions of illegal immigrants to seek citizenship but said the debate in Congress is being fomented by Republicans who want to divide America." At the National Council of La Raza annual conference Clinton said, "I'm proud of him for doing it and I thanked him for doing it." In his speech "Clinton used similar language" as Bush has in promoting comprehensive reform and that "message played well with La Raza, which opposes the House bill and whose current president, Janet Murguia, was an assistant in the Clinton White House." Karl Rove is "scheduled to address the convention on Tuesday."

The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Rabin, 958K) reports, "Former President Clinton told one of the nation's largest Latino civil rights groups Saturday that the conservative wing of the Republican Party is using the immigration issue to divide Congress and the nation." Clinton said, "It is a way of creating a divided community and distracting people from the real challenges facing the country, whether it is in Iraq and Afghanistan, or homeland security, or how to build a clean energy future, or how to solve the healthcare crisis, or how to create new jobs for America."

Rove And Brownback To Address La Raza Convention. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (7/9) writes White House adviser Karl Rove and Sen. Sam Brownback "will address the left-wing Hispanic advocacy group La Raza in Los Angeles this week. La Raza was active in increasing participation in nationwide work stoppages and demonstrations April 10 after the House passed a tough border enforcement bill. La Raza in Spanish means 'The Race.' Former President Bill Clinton heads the list of speakers for the annual meeting of La Raza's national council. The Rev. Jesse Jackson will appear on a panel."

Economic Impact Of Immigration Examined. Roger Lowenstein in an extensive 7,931 word article in the New York Times Magazine (7/9) examining the impact of immigration of the US economy and wages writes that to John F. Kennedy School of Government immigration expert George Borjas, a Cuban immigrant, "the truth is pretty obvious: immigrants hurt the economic prospects of the Americans they compete with. And now that the biggest contingent of immigrants are poorly educated Mexicans, they hurt poorer Americans, especially African-Americans, the most." But for Borjas critics like David Card, a Canadian economist at Berkeley, "from an economic standpoint, immigration is no big deal and that a lot of the opposition to it is most likely social or cultural." Lowenstein concludes, "The disconnect between Borjas's results and Card's hints that there is an alchemy that occurs when immigrants land ashore; the economy's potential for absorbing and also adapting is mysterious but powerful. Like any form of economic change, immigration causes distress and disruption to some. But America has always thrived on dynamic transformations that produce winners as well as losers." The resolution of the debate "depends on a question that Card posed but that the public has not yet come to terms with: 'What is it that immigration policy is supposed to achieve?'"

Similarly, author Tony Horwitz in an op-ed describing the historical relationship between the US and Hispanics in the New York Times (7/9, 1.19M) dismisses concerns raised about the impact of Hispanic immigrants saying "foes of immigration echo the black legend more explicitly, typecasting Hispanics as indolent, a burden on the American taxpayer, greedy for benefits and jobs, prone to criminality and alien to our values -- much like those degenerate Spaniards of the old Southwest and those gold-mad conquistadors who sought easy riches rather than honest toil. At the fringes, the vilification is baldly racist." The US "has always been a diverse and fast-changing land, home to overlapping cultures and languages. It's an homage to our history, not a betrayal of it, to welcome the latest arrivals, just as the Indians did those tardy and uninvited Pilgrims who arrived in Plymouth not so long ago."

Immigration Also Impacts Mexican Economy, Culture. ABC World News Tonight (7/8, story 9, 3:30, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "It's estimated there are more than 6 million undocumented Mexican workers in the United States, that mass migration is a source of anger and debate in this country, and it's also changing everyday life in Mexico." ABC (Quinones): "President-elect Felipe Calderon has promised jobs and a better life for the people of Mexico, but in this tiny village, they are not holding their breath. They're just waiting for the next paycheck from the US, waiting for their husbands, their fathers, their sons, to come back home, at least for a little while, before they have to leave again."

Immigration Debate Seen As Distracting From Important Issues. P.W. Singer, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, in an brief op-ed in the Washington Post (7/9, B3, Singer, 744K) "Outlook" section chides the DHS for recently issuing a "request for an 'indefinite quantity, indefinite delivery' of burritos to be stockpiled along the Texas border?" The request "came on the heels of another spicy tidbit on the same government database -- a contract for as much as $385 million awarded just a few months ago to Dick Cheney's old firm Halliburton to be on call in case the government ever needs to build 5,000-person camps for 'temporary detention and processing.'" Singer says, "That such conspiracy theories should even come to mind is a sad statement about our politics. Rather than serious public debate, we've been served a summer of faux outcries, such as describing flag burning and same-sex marriage as epidemics and treating immigration as a national security crisis. It's enough to give anyone indigestion."

LAT Faults House GOP Position On Border Security. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, 958K) editorializes, "House Republicans claim they want to first 'certify' that the border is secure. To fully do that, they will need not just 2,000 miles of fence but another 3,145 miles for the northern border, untold thousands of new port inspectors, plus homing devices attached to every foreigner who dares set foot on U.S. soil. The border would be secure, but at the expense of the land of the free becoming a police state."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Credits Tax Cuts For Sharp Rise In Tax Revenues. The New York Times (7/9, Andrews, 1.19M) in a front page article titled "Surprising Jump In Tax Revenues Is Curbing Deficit" reports, "An unexpectedly steep rise in tax revenues from corporations and the wealthy is driving down the projected budget deficit this year, even though spending has climbed sharply because of the war in Iraq and the cost of hurricane relief." The increasing "tide in tax payments has been building for months, but the increased scale is surprising even seasoned budget analysts and making it easier for both the administration and Congress to finesse the big run-up in spending over the past year." The Times notes, "Tax revenues are climbing twice as fast as the administration predicted in February, so fast that the budget deficit could actually decline this year" and "Republicans are already arguing that the revenue jump proves that their tax cuts, especially the 2003 tax cut on stock dividends, would spur the economy and ultimately increase revenues." In his radio address President Bush said, "The tax relief we delivered has helped unleash the entrepreneurial spirit of America and kept our economy the envy of the world."

The Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg (7/9) adds, "The White House Office of Management and Budget is expected to announce Tuesday that, because of the increased tax receipts, the deficit will be about $100 billion less than what was projected six months ago. President Bush pledged in his 2004 State of the Union address to halve the deficit by 2009." OMB director Rob Portman said, "We are on track to meet the president's goal."

Need For Corporate Tax Reform Questioned. Edmund Andrews in an "Economic View" analysis of the debate over the need for corporate tax reform in the New York Times (7/9, 1.19M) dismisses claims by business supporters writing, "The political danger, at least from a fiscal standpoint, is that arguments for corporate tax reform will be hijacked to justify another round of corporate tax cuts. That was what happened with the corporate tax overhaul of 2004, which became a grab bag of tax breaks to almost every corner of business, at a net cost of $60 billion over 10 years." Andrews states, "Those who see the American corporate tax as oppressive point to a striking fact: the standard corporate tax rate of 35 percent is now higher than that of most other industrialized countries. The average top rate is 25.8 percent in the European Union, where most nations have cut rates to attract investment." Yet "official tax rates are not the same as actual tax burdens. What American companies lose in high tax rates they more than make up in higher tax breaks."

Bush Calls For Senate To Increase Spending On Scientific Research. The AP (7/9, Loven) reports, "President Bush on Saturday urged the Senate to back increased government spending on basic scientific research." It "is part of Bush's initiative to boost U.S. competitiveness in the global marketplace through innovation. He also wants to train thousand of new science and math teachers and extend a popular tax credit businesses can receive for investing in research and development. The total price tag over 10 years would be $136 billion." The AP notes, "Some Democrats have expressed concern that Bush is increasing federal math and science education spending while cutting overall discretionary spending on education by trimming money in areas such as the arts, parent-resource centers and drug-free schools." Yet "Bush said in his weekly radio address that his proposals are vital for America to 'remain an innovative nation that competes with confidence' and would help ensure that every U.S. child has the math and science skills needed for the jobs of the future."

Bush Attends Nationals Baseball Game. On the front page of its sports section, a Washington Post (7/9, E1, Kilgore, 744K) article titled "Bush Can't Provide Power For Nationals" reports President Bush, First Lady Laura Bush, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, AG Alberto Gonzales, Chief of Staff Josh Bolten and Marvin Bush attened last night's baseball game at RFK Stadium between the Nationals and the Padres. When "word spread through the Nationals' dugout in the second inning that President Bush had come to his first game this season, players and coaches turned and gazed up at the owner's box, pointing and talking to each other." But Padres pitcher Chris Young stole "Bush's spotlight." The Padres win made "it 2-1 lifetime for Bush, as not even his presence could stop San Diego's dominance in D.C."

The AP (7/9) in a brief article adds, "President Bush made a low-key appearance at" the game. The AP notes, "Vice President Cheney threw out the first pitch at this year's home opener and was greeted with what seemed to be more boos than cheers as he walked on the field." There was no mention of any positive or negative reaction to Bush's appearance. The Washington Times (7/9, Wright, 90K) mentions Bush's appearance in its coverage of the game.

Chief Justice Roberts Assessed After First Term. New York Times Supreme Court reporter Linda Greenhouse (7/9) assesses Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. after the end of his first term. She writes, "Beyond John Roberts the chief justice, what has this first term revealed about John Roberts the judge?" Greenhouse finds the Chief Justice's judicial voice to be "direct, straightforward, free of legal jargon, the voice of a lawyer who made a living selling complicated ideas to busy appellate judges under tight time constraints." But, Greenhouse says, Roberts has mixed adherence to his stated goal of being a "minimalist" judge who decides only what's necessary. On the one hand, he has a clear regard for precedent and tradition. At the same time, however, he joined opinions with "Justice Antonin Scalia in environmental and criminal cases that reached beyond the specific disputes at hand to call long-settled assumptions into question" and several Roberts opinions "had a rhetorical edge."

An op-ed in the New York Times (7/9, Cohen, 1.19M) takes a harsher view. It argues that while Roberts insisted at his confirmation hearings that "he was 'not an ideologue' and that his judicial philosophy was to be 'modest,' which he defined as recognizing that judges should 'decide the cases before them' and not try to legislate or 'execute the laws,'" that is "not, however, how Chief Justice Roberts voted in his first term." Cohen argues that Roberts' "modesty" came generally in cases where "criminal defendants, Democrats and other parties conservatives dislike were asking for something. When real estate developers, wealthy campaign contributors and other powerful parties wanted help, he was more inclined to support judicial action, even if it meant trampling on Congress and the states."

War-Strapped Army Struggles With Bills At Home. The New York Times/AP (7/9) reports, "A diversion of money for the war in Iraq has helped create a $530 million shortfall for Army posts at home and abroad, leaving some of them unable to pay utility bills or even cut the grass ... Fort Bragg in North Carolina says it will not buy any office supplies until the new fiscal year starts in October." The Times observes, "The increasing cost of fuel is partly to blame, and it costs more to pay civilians in Asia and Europe ... Another major factor is the practice of financing the war through spending bills outside the annual budget." Michael O'Hanlon of the Brookings Institution "said money management seemed to be the larger problem."

Discovery Astronauts Successfully Complete 7½ Hour Spacewalk. All three network newscasts reported on the spacewalk by astronauts Piers Sellers and Michael Fossum, but while CBS and NBC devoted only ten seconds a piece to the story, ABC's segment ran for a full two minutes. After describing yesterday's maneuvers, ABC contended, "Critics say even if NASA can make in-flight fixes, it is unacceptable the shuttle keeps needing to be fixed at all." Former NASA historian Alex Roland was shown saying, "The shuttle is not getting better over time, it's getting worse over time, which is a reflection of the wear and tear of the flights it's already experienced." The CBS Evening News (7/8, story 9, 0:10, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "The Discovery shuttle astronauts took the first of three spacewalks today. Two astronauts left the International Space Station to bounce around at the end of the station's 100 foot boom testing it to see if they can repair the shuttle if need be."

NBC Nightly News (7/8, story 8, 0:10, Holt, 9.87M) reported, "They strapped themselves to an extension of the shuttle's robot arm. Their seven-hour space walk was designed to test whether the boom is safe enough to be used as a platform for emergency repairs."

ABC World News Tonight (7/8, story 6, 2:05, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "Critics say even if NASA can make in-flight fixes, it is unacceptable the shuttle keeps needing to be fixed at all." Former NASA historian Alex Roland: "The shuttle is not getting better over time, it's getting worse over time, which is a reflection of the wear and tear of the flights it's already experienced." ABC concluded, "Tonight, NASA said that only one of these dangling gap fillers could pose any kind of problem. … But at this point, they don't think any kind of repairs will be necessary. They don't think they'll need to do a dramatic spacewalk like they did last year to yank it out. In fact, they say as early as tomorrow they could give the shuttle a clean bill of health."

The AP (7/9, Borenstein) reports, "In a 7 1/2-hour spacewalk, the first of three orbital excursions planned for this mission," Sellers and Fossum "said they could do most of the mock tasks they were assigned with only moderate difficulty. And that's what NASA wanted to hear. 'It was above and beyond' what engineers expected, flight director Tony Ceccacci said after the spacewalk ended." The Los Angeles Times runs an Orlando Sentinel article (7/9, Cabbage) on the spacewalk.

Discovery May Be Cleared For Reentry Today. The Washington Post (7/9, A11, Gugliotta, 744K) reports Orbiter Project Office manager Steve Poulos "said that analysts had 'cleared' all but two blemishes on Discovery's heat shield and that the other two should be cleared Sunday. John Shannon, chairman of the mission management team, said this meant that on Sunday he could clear Discovery for reentry, guaranteeing the orbiter's soundness."

Guard And Reserve GWOT Veterans Are Denied GI Bill Benefits. The Atlanta-Journal Constitution (7/9, Martz) reports, "When military benefits were updated in 1984 through a law called the Montgomery GI Bill, members of Congress and even the military did not envision reservists being called into active duty as frequently as they are today. The law did not extend full college benefits to citizen soldiers and terminated them once they left the Guard or Reserve. But since 2001, more than 500,000 reservists and Guard troops have been deployed for homeland security duties or sent to wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Yet when they get home, they don't get the same benefits as those who were active-duty servicemembers." The article quotes a reservist who came home and could not obtain tuition funding and describe the arguments for modifying or retaining the current system, as stated by veterans' groups and the DOD Office for Reserve Affairs, respectively.

WPost Profiles Rep. Ron Paul. The Washington Post (7/9, D1, Copeland, 744K) reports, "Republican Ron Paul missed out on the 19th century, but he admires it from afar. He speaks lovingly of the good old days before things like Social Security and Medicaid existed, before the federal government outlawed drugs like heroin." Now retired from a career as an obstetrician and gynecologist, Paul delivered an estimated 4,000 babies, but refused to accept Medicare and Medicaid, and sometimes treated patients for free. In 1988, he left the Republican party and ran for president as a Libertarian. Noting Paul's consistent opposition to much of the government as intruding on personal freedom or interfering with the free market--he opposes government farm subsidies even though his TX14 district is largely agricultural--the Post finds Paul to be "a refreshing peculiarity. He continually bucks the wishes of Republican leaders--so much so, Paul recalls, that once while exhorting every other Republican to vote the party line, then-Speaker Newt Gingrich announced that Ron Paul was exempt." As a result, Paul doesn't hold a leadership post or chair a Congressional panel. Paul responds, "I never had a goal of working up the seniority ladder."

OTHER NEWS:

Social Security Reform Returns As Top Political Issue. The Washington Times (7/9, A1, Fagan, 90K) in a front page story reports, "The seemingly dead issue of Social Security reform came to life again in recent weeks, with President Bush saying it should be high on the agenda and Democrats warning that Republicans are resurrecting their plan to privatize the system." And on "a recent, unrelated event on prescription drug coverage, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi brought up Social Security twice, at one point criticizing the drug plan and adding, 'This plan was brought to you by the same people who want to privatize Social Security.'" But Bush "continues to call for a bipartisan approach." On June 27th Bush said, "We need to set politics aside when it comes to reforming Social Security and Medicare, and we need to set politics aside so that the president can work with the Congress to bring fiscal discipline to our budgets."

The AP (7/9, Wilson) reports, "The Republican plan to privatize Social Security could cause huge debt for decades, a Democratic candidate seeking a House seat in Iowa, a state with a high concentration of elderly residents, said Saturday." In the Democratic weekly radio address, Bruce Braley said, "If the Republican plan is allowed to pass, future generations both here and across the country will be saddled with decades of debt and no guaranteed retirement security." He "said Social Security is under attack, with President Bush and congressional Republicans making privatization a top priority in 2007. He also accused the Bush administration of 'plundering the Social Security trust fund while giving billions away to special interests, like big oil.'"

Iowa State Party Offers To Sell Its Voter Database To Candidates. The Washington Post (7/9, A4, Goldfarb, Cillizza, 744K) reports on how the Iowa Democratic party plans to raise some funds. "Showing its entrepreneurial spirit, the state party is offering potential candidates access to its detailed voter database--for a price. Specifically, they can mine the valuable data for $50,000 (act now, urges the party, and get a discount from the usual fee of $75,000). … For an additional $50,000 next year, candidates can secure access to a database buttressed by information derived from the 2006 primary and general elections. Or campaigns can ignore the current offer and purchase the full database next year for $85,000. Candidates have until Saturday to decide whether to take advantage of the discount."

Sen. Evan Bayh Is Looking For Way To Stand Out In Democratic Field. The Associated Press (7/8, Glover) reports, "In a quiet, methodical style reflecting his Midwestern roots, Sen. Evan Bayh is laying the foundation for a presidential campaign and prompting some Democrats to talk about a candidate with a realistic shot." Making his fifth trip to Iowa in the past year, the centrist Indiana Senator "opened a three-day swing Thursday with a fundraiser in downtown Des Moines for legislative candidates. He mingled easily with about 50 party activists for more than an hour and made a point of chatting with everyone in the room." Bayh's Midwestern roots and his success in winning five statewide races in a strongly Republican state are strengths he would bring if he enters the 2008 presidential field, and he's "assembled a solid team of advisers operating under the auspices of his political action committee, the All America PAC. He's tapped a former Democratic National Committee fundraiser, a onetime pollster for Howard Dean's presidential campaign and a chief of staff to the late Missouri Gov. Mel Carnahan."

Giuliani Reportedly Intends To Run For President In 2008. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (7/9), in an item featured prominently on the Drudge Report yesterday, writes, "Well-connected public figures report that they have been told recently by Rudolph Giuliani that, as of now, he intends to run for the Republican Presidential nomination in 2008." Giuliani "was on top of last month's national Gallup poll measuring Presidential preferences by registered Republicans, with 29 percent. Sen. John McCain's 24 percent was second, with former House Speaker Newt Gingrich third at 8 percent. National polls all year have shown Giuliani running either first or second to McCain, with the rest of the Presidential possibilities far behind. Republican insiders respond to these numbers by saying rank-and-file GOP voters will abandon Giuliani once they realize his position on abortion, gay rights and gun control. Party strategists calculate that if he actually runs, he must change on at least one of these issues."

Congressional Democrats Said To Lack Coherent Platform. The Los Angeles Times' Steve Lopez (7/9) writes, "I'm not asking for the Democratic equivalent of a 10-point Contract With America, having lowered my expectations while on the campaign trail with Al Gore and bearing witness to his nationally televised identity crisis. I'd settle for a five-point 'Contract With Western Blue States.' Heck, I'd be happy with a warmed-over crumb of an idea or two. Instead all we get from the Democrats is the reminder that they stand for…wait, let's see, where was that platform draft? Oh, yeah. They're anti-Iraq war, or at least they are now that it's turned out so miserably."

Democrats Worried Challenge To Lieberman Could Drive Candidates Too Far Left. The CBS Evening News (7/8, story 5, 2:10, Assuras, 7.66M) reported that although the Connecticut Democratic Senate primary showdown between Sen. Joseph Lieberman and antiwar candidate Ned Lamont "is thousands of miles away, Iraq is the central campaign battle ground." CQ Politics editor Bob Benenson: "Lieberman is concerned that Lamont will turn out the activist base, the anti-war activists will want to make a statement and turn out in droves." CBS (Alfonsi): "Party leaders worry if Lieberman loses Democratic candidates in other states may court the far left just to win over anti-war activists in the primaries and end up losing more moderate voters to Republicans in November."

Lieberman Seen As Likely To Caucus With Democrats If Elected As An Independent. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (7/9) writes, "Supporters of Sen. Joseph Lieberman promise he will continue as a member of the Senate Democratic caucus even if he loses the Democratic primary in Connecticut Aug. 8 and is elected as an independent. … Lieberman's Republican Senate colleagues privately despair of the GOP picking up the Connecticut seat. But they hope Lieberman, if elected as an independent, would be more inclined to vote with Republicans than he is now, even if he still caucuses with the Democrats."

Lieberman Primary Seen As Preview Of 2008 Campaigns. In his column for the New York Times (7/9, 1.19M) David Brooks writes, "The primary battle playing out on the smiling lawns of upscale Connecticut serves as a preview for the national conflict that will dominate American politics for the next two years. This isn't a fight between left and right. It's a fight about how politics should be conducted. On the one hand are the true believers — the fundamentalists of both parties who believe that politics should be about party discipline, passion, purity, orthodoxy and clear choices. On the other side are the quasi-independents — the heterodox politicians who distrust ideological purity, who rebel against movement groupthink, who believe in bipartisanship both as a matter of principle and as a practical necessity. In 2008, heterodox politicians like John McCain, Rudy Giuliani and even Hillary Clinton are going to have to face zealous assaults from within their own parties. But for the moment that war has come to Joe Lieberman."

Corzine Approves New Budget, Ending New Jersey Government Shutdown. The New York Times (7/9, Jones, Chen, 1.19M) reports, "Gov. Jon S. Corzine signed a budget for New Jersey Saturday evening, after a seven-day government shutdown and an acidic standoff with the Legislature that paralyzed state operations, frayed nerves and cost the state millions of dollars. Mr. Corzine, in a crowded public ceremony, approved the $30.9 billion budget but also cut $51 million in proposed new spending, much of it inserted by legislators before they approved the budget. 'This crisis should never have occurred and it must never be repeated,' Mr. Corzine said. His Saturday morning executive order brings 45,000 state workers back to work, as well as another 50,000 or so in industries affected by the shutdown."

The New York Times (7/9, Fountain, 1.19M) reports in its "Week In Review" section that while state budget disputes and missed deadlines are not uncommon, "the seven-day government shutdown that resulted from the New Jersey impasse was unusual. There have only been two other shutdowns, in Minnesota and Tennessee, since 1991." It explains that, unlike most states, New Jersey lacks a law or constitutional clause allowing government to continue operating in the absence of completed appropriations. It also notes that casinos had to close because gambling inspectors were among the state workers put on leave without pay during the shutdown.

Stem Cells Could Play Key Role In Wisconsin Governor's Race. In the Washington Post (7/9, A5, 744K), David Broder reports that the issue of stem cell research is "at the center of an impassioned political debate, one that will occupy the Senate this summer and may provoke President Bush's first veto." It may also decide the outcome of a Wisconsin governor's race "and a U.S. Senate contest in Missouri, where a stem cell research referendum is on the ballot." In Wisconsin, Gov. Jim Doyle (D) is seeking re-election, while his opponent, Rep. Mark Green (R) Green "has voted to ban work on cells donated by fertility clinics or created from embryos in medical labs. The fourth-term House member supports Bush's policy of limiting work to the relatively few cell lines created before a 2001 executive order setting forth terms for government-funded research." Seeking to rally Democrats, Doyle has called Green "a relentless opponent of stem cell research," while Republicans have placed initiatives on same-sex marriage and reinstating the death penalty on the ballot in a bid to turn out their supporters.

Maryland Governor's Race Moves In Two Orbits. The Washington Post (7/9, C6, Wagner, 744K) reports, "Maryland voters who happen to live in the Baltimore region have already been treated to $850,000 worth of television ads in the governor's race, candidates appearing regularly on the nightly news and a literal parade of politicians through their streets on the Fourth of July. The view from suburban Washington is quite different. Most voters in Montgomery, Prince George's and other Maryland counties in the region have yet to see a single one of those ads. … The result is two versions of Maryland politics for voters living in the state's two dominant media markets." While the candidates are attending events in Maryland's Washington suburbs, "no one denies that Baltimore is getting more attention."

Mark Kennedy Distances Himself From Increasingly Unpopular Bush. In his column for the Washington Post (7/9, B7, 744K) David Broder writes Rep. Mark Kennedy "is carrying the hopes of the national Republican Party in one of the few Senate races in the country in which the GOP has a chance of gaining a seat. The voluntary retirement of Sen. Mark Dayton this year has opened the way for a newcomer, and Dayton's Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party has given its endorsement to Amy Klobuchar, the two-term elected attorney of Hennepin County (Minneapolis)." Broder notes President Bush "lost the state by less than 3 percent of the vote in each of his races. But now, as Gov. Tim Pawlenty put it in an interview, 'the president continues to struggle here,' with approval scores below 40 percent. When I asked Kennedy in an interview if he agreed with the opening words of his profile in the current edition of Congressional Quarterly, the authoritative source on Congress, describing him as 'a dedicated conservative and loyal Bush supporter,' he seemed surprised. 'I don't know if I'd use any of those words to describe me,' he said."

Will Column Celebrates Interstate Highways. In the Washington Post (7/9, B7, 744K), George Will traces the contribution that the Interstate Highway System, on the occasion of its 50th anniversary. He writes that "Its ribbons of concrete represent a single thread of continuity through the nation's history." He notes in passing that "No legislator more ardently supported the IHS than the Tennessee Democrat who was chairman of the Senate Public Works subcommittee on roads. … This senator who did so much to put postwar America on roads suitable to bigger, more powerful cars was Al Gore Sr."

NYTimes Editorial Urges Consumers' Rights In Debt Collection. A New York Times (7/9, 1.19M) editorial, "When A Stranger Calls," notes rising consumer complaints about third-party debt collectors. It urges legislators and regulators to "take further steps to curb the lies, harassment and intimidation coming from out-of-control collectors. At the same time, they should also look at irresponsible lending: giving additional credit cards and high-interest loans to those already deep in the red."

Trade Imbalance Means Towering Stacks Of Containers Mar LA Neighborhoods. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Schoch, 958K) reports, "To understand the trade deficit, residents of Sandison Street do not need the help of world-class economists. They can just glance across the street at the mountain of faded brown cargo containers blocking the Wilmington sky. .. Tens of thousands of containers sit empty today in Wilmington--stark testimony that America buys more from other countries than it sends overseas to sell." Although some reused for U.S. exports or returned empty, "some are forgotten, and they pile up--in Wilmington and nearby cities, in communities lining the Long Beach Freeway, near rail yards in the Inland Empire." Area residents complain that the massed containers are not only an eyesore, but shelter rats and pose a potential hazard in case of an earthquake.

US Envoy Seeks To Build International Pressure On North Korea. The US response to North Korea's nuclear provocation was featured prominently on ABC, CBS and by the wire services. ABC World News Tonight (7/8, lead story, 2:50, Avila, 8.78M) reported that the US "has sent a top-level diplomat to respond to the North's latest overture." ABC (Harris): "The Bush administration's point man on North Korea was rushed to this region after North Korea fired off those seven missiles. And today, he had some hard words for North Korea. Today, the North Koreans offered to return to the negotiating table -- if the US Agrees to ease financial restrictions it's placed on them. An offer quickly swatted down by assistant secretary of state Christopher Hill -- in South Korea today as part of a whirlwind trip through Asia to deal with the missile crisis." Hill: "This is not a time for so-called gestures of that kind. We have a country that has fired off missiles in a truly reckless way." Harris: "Hill said the only way for North Korea to improve its future is to return to the so-called six-party talks with the US, China, Russia, Japan and the two Koreas." ABC later notes that "Kim Jong-il may have gone too far this time, angering both South Korea and China, his main sources of aid and trade. Christopher Hill is trying to capitalize on that anger by convincing both of those countries, long reluctant to get tough on their neighbor, to change their stance."

In contrast to ABC and CBS, NBC Nightly News (7/8, story 4, :30, Holt, 9.87M) only briefly noted, "The U.S. is backing China's call for informal talks with North Korea over its recent missile testing. Christopher Hill made the comment after meeting with South Korean officials. He next heads to Japan for discussions." The AP (7/9, Chang) reports that Hill said, "the Chinese have talked about putting together a six-party informal, and we both support that and we think that all countries are prepared to come to that informal meeting."

The AFP (7/9, Chan-Kyong) reports, "The United States and Japan vowed to ram through UN sanctions against North Korea, but Washington also offered an olive branch by agreeing to meet one-on-one with Pyuongyang if it joined international talks." US special envoy Christopher Hill said "Washington was ready to meet the North's envoy's eye-to-eye if he joined the six-nation table," adding "I just can't do it when they are boycotting the six-party talks."

North Korea Threatens Military Action. The AFP (7/9, Kwanwoo) reports, "North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il vowed no compromise and said he was braced for 'all-out war' as the United States and Japan pushed for the United Nations to impose new sanctions on Pyongyang for its missile tests." In the "first reported remarks since his regime lobbed seven missiles into the sea," he "pledged not to give up his weapons programs," saying "that if the United States took 'revenge,' it would mean 'all-out war.'" Kim also "mocked US assertions that his regime was on the verge of collapse."

The AP (7/9, McGuirk) reports that the North Korea ambassador to Australia, Chon Jae Hong, in a letter to The Sunday Herald Sun newspaper in the southern city of Melbourne, "warned Sunday that international attempts to halt his nation's missile tests could lead to war," saying "North Korea 'will have no option but to take stronger physical actions of other forms, should any country dare take issue with the exercises and put pressure upon it.'"

The AFP (7/9, Chan-Kyong) reports that the North "threatened to strike back with a more 'physical' response if sanctions are adopted. Its UN representative said a binding referendum would amount to 'an act of war.'" And its ambassador for diplomatic normalization with Japan, Song Il Ho, said, "If anyone tries to put us under pressure, we will have no choice but to take stronger physical measures."

The AP (7/9) notes, "Japan won't compromise on the stern wording of a U.N. resolution that would impose sanctions on North Korea and order the communist regime to stop developing ballistic missiles, Foreign Minister Taro Aso said." It will push "for a vote on the resolution Monday despite opposition from China." Bloomberg (7/9, Cho) also covers this story.

China Seen As "Only Hope" For Resolving Disagreement With North Korea. Taking a negative tone, The CBS Evening News (7/8, story 3, 2:00, Assuras, 7.66M) warned that the negotiations with North Korea were deteriorating and that China, not the US, was the sole country which could resolve the disagreement, reporting that "the US envoy expressed support for China's plan to hold six-nation talks on the nuclear threat. At the same time he offered to hold face-to-face talks with the US and North Koreans on the sidelines." CBS (Petersen): "Christopher Hill in Asia hoping to restart nuclear talks with the North says there's no pleasure in the fact that ordinary people will suffer." Hill: "People that don't have enough to ea and not enough clothing and not enough electricity and meanwhile they have regimes firing off missiles." Petersen: "Things in Asia are going from pretty bad to even worse. Japan and North Korea are trading verbal insults. South Korea has canceled a round of talks with the North. The only hope is that China can somehow ride to the rescue."

North Korean Hostility Part Of Historical Pattern. The AP (7/9, Woodward) reports, "North Korea is well practiced in getting some of what it wants through provocation. Bullying through a bullhorn has worked time and again for a small nation with an outsized military force and an even bigger capacity for bluster and threat." Its coercive diplomacy "has involved antagonizing everyone on and over the horizon, foes and allies alike, and then pulling back." Wonhyuk Lim, a Brookings Institution fellow for northeast Asian studies, says that "as twisted as the North Koreans' logic may be, it is based on their negotiating experience with the Americans." This "pattern of edging toward confrontation, then edging back, has persisted, always accompanied by tough words. More are being heard now." Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said, "We're certainly not going to overreact ... to these wild statements," adding, "We've seen them before."

South Koreans Unfazed By Launch. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Demick, 958K) reports, "Though the United States and Japan quickly elevated the missile launches to the status of crisis, for South Korea it was just another predictable annoyance among many from a bothersome neighbor." Seoul is "in a familiar position of being caught between its estranged brothers to the north and its most important ally, the United States," and "has responded with somewhat contradictory moves. On one hand, it is proceeding with a previously scheduled economic cooperation meeting," but it "also has said that further requests for humanitarian aid will be put on hold." For South Korea, "the nightmare scenario here is not that North Korea will attack … Rather, it is that United States would attempt a preemptive strike on North Korea, triggering a war in which South Korea would be caught in the middle."

International Stock Markets Rattled By North Korean Tests. The New York Times (7/9, Sommer, 1.19M) in a brief recap of last weeks stock markets notes North Korea's missile tests rattled "stock markets around the world. The next day, when Wall Street returned to work, stocks fell sharply. Despite a modest rally on Thursday, the market finished lower for the week" on bad news from 3M.

Advanced Destroyer Deployed To Japan. The AP (7/9, Greimel) reports, "A new U.S. guided missile destroyer docked in Japan on Saturday amid tensions over North Korea's missile tests, but the military said the arrival was routine and had been planned months ago." The USS Musti, "one of the most advanced [ships] in the fleet," sailed into the port of Yokosuka. "In August, Yokosuka also will welcome the USS Shiloh, which last month demonstrated its ability to shoot down missile warheads in a landmark test off Hawaii." Both ships "are equipped with radar systems that employ Aegis technology, which is geared toward tracking and shooting down enemy missiles," and "the U.S. Navy now has eight Aegis-equipped vessels at Yokosuka."

Former Officials Call For Hitting Missiles On Launch Pad. Ashton B. Carter, professor at Harvard and former Assistant Secretary of Defense, and William J. Perry, professor at Harvard and former Secretary of Defense, write in a op-ed in Time Magazine (7/9), "The Bush Administration has tried to downplay the mounting danger posed by North Korea," and that "is not prudent or safe." Yet "again North Korea has crossed a line in the sand clearly drawn by the U.S. and its partners,'" the authors anticipated, which is "why, in an opinion piece published in the Washington Post on June 22, we urged the Bush Administration to strike the Taepo Dong 2 on its launchpad before the test." Should "the U.S. is ever going to defend a line in the sand with North Korea, that is the least provocative way to do it, and next time it will only be riskier." Although "Pyongyang tries carefully to cultivate the impression that it will lash out in response to any action against it, however limited," attacking South Korea "would surely and swiftly end in the elimination of the North Korean regime." However, inaction will make Pyongyang believe it has "a shield behind which it can pursue its interests with impunity." It also "has a long history of selling its advanced weapons to countries in the Middle East," and if the economy leads to the regime's collapse, "Who then might get its loose nukes?" The US should "strike any further Taepo Dong test missiles before they can be launched," penalize the North "for defying the international community's unanimous appeal not to conduct its July 4 tests," and develop "a clear strategy." The US "outsourced the North Korea issue to regional players in the form of the 'Six Party' talks," and it "has failed to produce any results."

NYTimes Examines Possible Outcomes Of Tensions. The New York Times (7/9, Sanger, 1.19M) lists possible outcomes to the standoff with North Korea. The US could negotiate directly, but "Mr. Bush says nothing doing." There is the "big worry…that if America negotiates alone, it will be hung out to dry when talks go bad," and "China and South Korea will likely portray Washington as the obstacle." However, "the downside to Mr. Bush's approach: When six nations talk, clarity is the first victim." Another possibility is pre-emption - "destroy North Korea's nuclear facilities at Yongbyon." However, "Many believe it is too late," as "the fuel could be stored anywhere" and "t he United States has accused North Korea of starting up a second nuclear weapons program, using uranium," which "makes bombing pretty useless." The Administration could decide to "Wait out the Kim dynasty, and hope that the starving, bankrupt, gulag-ridden state of North Korea finally collapses." However, "as Dick Cheney once famously said about the North, 'time is not on our side.'" Still, North Korea selling nuclear material "worries the Bush administration the most."

Missile's Failure Usual For Testing. The New York Times (7/9, Broad, 1.19M) reports, "Experts judge that many years of testing beyond that inaugural flight on Tuesday will probably be needed before the North would entrust the new missile with anything as costly and precious as a nuclear warhead." However, arms and aerospace experts said that setbacks like the missile's crash "were a normal part of rocket and warhead science" and "that, in general, new designs typically blow up repeatedly in flight tests before engineers can find and fix all the problems." John M. Logsdon, director of the Space Policy Institute at George Washington University, said, "It would have been more surprising if they had a success." Therefore, "it's reasonable to expect that North Korea is busy learning from the failure, fixing flaws before it launches another Taepodong 2."

US To Negotiate With Russia For Civilian Nuclear Deal In Exchange For Support On Iran.

The New York Times (7/9, A1, Sanger, Rutenberg, 1.19M) reports, "The Bush administration said Saturday that it would open formal negotiations with Russia on a long-discussed civilian nuclear agreement that would pave the way for Russia to become one of the world's largest repositories of spent nuclear fuel." While "President Vladimir V. Putin has been looking to expand the country's role in the multibillion nuclear power business," the US "traditionally opposed any such arrangement." However, "administration officials said that once Mr. Bush endorsed Mr. Putin's proposal last year for Iran to conduct uranium enrichment inside Russia…it made little sense to bar ordinary civilian nuclear exchanges with Russia." Also, Peter Watkins, a White House spokesman, said "We have made clear to Russia that for an agreement on peaceful nuke cooperation to go forward, we will need active cooperation in blocking Iran's attempts to obtain nuclear weapons." The AP (7/9, Loven) also covers this story.

Russian Offer To Help North Korea May Affect Anticipated Deal. The Washington Times (7/9, A1, Hirst, 90K) reports, "Russia secretly offered to sell North Korea technology that could help the rogue state protect nuclear stockpiles and safeguard weapons secrets from international scrutiny, but officials backed off after the arms flirtation was publicized." This "presents a potential obstacle to Bush administration plans to share civilian nuclear technology with Moscow." At an information technology exhibition in Pyongyang late last month "Russian officials touted the equipment to the communist regime," and "Aleksei Grigoriev, deputy director of Russia's Federal Information Technologies Agency, told a reporter for the Itar-Tass news agency that North Korea planned to buy equipment for the safe storage and transportation of nuclear materials." While "the Russian Embassy in Pyongyang immediately denied the report, saying it was 'disinformation'" and "Mr. Grigoriev subsequently denied having spoken to the Itar-Tass reporter," according to western analysts "they would not be surprised if the two countries are discussing sensitive military deals."

G-8 Seen As Not Reflecting New Reality. The AP (7/9, Raum) reports, "Critics view the" G-8 "summit as a Cold War relic that needs to be reconstituted." While "often billed as a gathering of the world's leading economic powers," it is not. "China, now the world's fourth-largest economy…is not a member. Neither is India, the world's largest democracy and one of its fastest-growing economies. Nor is South Korea, Brazil, Mexico or Spain, each with a larger economy than G-8 member Russia's." The world's "economic dynamics are far different" than at the group's foundation, as "the astonishing growth of some Asian nations and parts of Latin America have altered the math."

Putin Reasserts State Control Of Major Economic Sectors. The Washington Times/AP (7/9, Ingram) reports that Russian President Vladimir Putin "has reasserted state domination over major economic sectors -- in part by installing members of his own team, many dating back to his days in St. Petersburg, into key positions in some major state-controlled companies." His "influence in so many industries raises questions about whether politics won't trump economics in the end when business decisions are made" and puts Russia "out of step with the developed countries that make up the Group of Eight," which "have expressed concern about the state's growing role." Among his critics, "economists say state involvement is fraught with negative consequences," while others believe "Putin and his circle are motivated less by patriotism than by the desire to spin power into personal wealth."

India Tests Nuclear Capable Missile. The AP (7/9, Rabinowitz) reports, "India test-fired its nuclear-capable Agni III missile Sunday for the first time," but it "has been viewed as a routine test — not saber-rattling with the country's nuclear-armed archrival and neighbor, Pakistan." The AFP (7/9) notes this is India's "first test of a nuclear-capable ballistic missile with a range of 4,000 kilometres." In May Defence Minister Pranab Mukherjee had said they were "was observing 'self-imposed restraint' before testing" the missile, but this provoked criticism that "esting was being delayed because of pressure from the United States."

Asia Embracing Nuclear Power. The AP (7/9, Casey) reports, "Led by fast-growing China and India, Asia is going nuclear in a big way to feed its ravenous appetite for energy." Both "say their future growth is at risk unless they diversify their energy mix," as "does South Korea." Greenpeace "continues to lead the charge against nuclear power, warning that Asian countries about to embrace the atom need to think hard about the potential consequences," and "Asia's biggest problem" is "what to do with the spent fuel." Still, "Asia's plans hold out the promise of a bonanza for American companies such as Westinghouse Electric Co. and General Electric Co. which already have a strong presence in the region."

Israel Withdraws From Northern Gaza, Rejects Ceasefire. All three network news programs described the violence in Iraq as escalating, while major papers noted Isreali pulled out of Northern Gaza. However, there was no mention of US diplomatic involvement in either. ABC World News Tonight (7/8, story 5, 0:20, Avila, 8.78M) noted, "Staying in the Middle East, dozens of Americans fled the Gaza Strip today. Many had been visiting relatives. But escalating violence drove them out."

The CBS Evening News (7/8, story 2, 2:00, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "The Palestinian prime minister called for a cease fire with Israel after 11 days of fighting in Gaza. Israel rejected the plea saying they will not negotiate with hostage takers in reference to the Israeli soldier whose abduction ignited the crisis." After describing the increasing violence, CBS (MacVicar) said: "Rather than breaking Palestinian resolve, attitudes here have hardened. This is a new altercation, they say, and militants are now heroes."

NBC Nightly News (7/8, story 3, 2:00, Fletcher, 9.87M) reported, "Israel answered no ceasefire, no negotiations until Palestinian militants free an Israeli soldier they kidnapped two weeks ago. And they say Palestinians must stop firing rockets at Israeli cities." Israel withdrew some force to create a buffer zone, but "Israeli military officers said they plan to expand their operation into other parts of Gaza and they'll continue fighting until they get their kidnapped soldier back."

The New York Times (7/9, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports that Palestinian prime minister from Hamas, Ismail Haniya's call for a mutual cease-fire came "after Israeli forces pulled out of most of the northern Gaza Strip" and was "perhaps responding to Israeli hints that a package deal might be possible to end a military and political crisis." This came in the form of Israeli cabinet minister Ophir Pines-Paz suggesting "that the crisis could end through a package deal of the kind that Egypt had been trying to promote -- the release of Corporal Shalit, coupled with a more formal cease-fire and an Israeli promise to release a number of Palestinian prisoners as the cease-fire is shown to have taken hold" by saying "If we reach a situation in which there are no kidnappings, no rockets, no tunnels, no raids into our territory, certainly Israel will have to reciprocate." The AP (7/9, Wagner) notes "Hamas often sends out conflicting signals…in part because of divisions between its more militant leaders in Syria and more pragmatic politicians in Gaza."

The Washington Post (7/9, A12, Wilson, 744K) adds, "The Israelis' abrupt pullback from the northern end of the Gaza Strip sharply reduced the overall intensity of their military operations" and "may signal the government's desire to pursue talks to win the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit." Still, "more Israeli armor entered the strip very early Saturday" and "the military stepped up its activity" along Gaza's eastern border. The AFP (7/9, El Oun), reports, "Haniya stressed that his Hamas government was determined to solve the problem through diplomatic channels in a 'peaceful' manner." Meanwhile, "UN Secretary General Kofi Annan…demanded immediate access for UN workers and humanitarian relief supplies to the Gaza Strip, saying he was 'extremely concerned about the dangerous situation in the occupied Palestinian Territory.'"

With a headline "Calls For Truce Fuel Hope In Gaza Standoff" the Los Angeles Times (7/9, King, 958K) takes a more hopeful tone reporting, "Both Israel and the Hamas-led Palestinian government expressed hope Saturday of arranging a cease-fire" on "the second consecutive day that a senior Israeli official had spoken publicly of the prospect of a compromise in the standoff." The Times adds, "Both sides have powerful incentives for finding a negotiated solution, but serious obstacles remain to any agreement."

Palestinians See Rockets As Creating "Balance Of Fear. The New York Times (7/9, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "the Palestinians persist in firing the crude, inaccurate rockets when there is virtual certainty that the damage they inflict will be far less than the punishment they will suffer" due to "a host of reasons, all based on the emotion of the conflict rather than the logic of warfare." They "often talk about their rockets and suicide bombings creating a 'balance of fear' with Israel, even if they cannot match Israel's weaponry," and "see the rockets as retaliation for Israeli airstrikes, or an act of solidarity with West Bank Palestinians when fighting heats up on that front." Now, "with tensions boiling over, support for the rockets is widespread in the northern towns, even if it means local communities will endure another heavy assault from the Israelis." Palestinian president Mahmoud Abbas "has sharply criticized the Palestinian rocket fire as counterproductive," but "never made a concerted push with the Palestinian security forces," and "the Hamas-led government has not sought to stop the rockets." During a ceasefire it "shared its technology and rockets with other factions" and "recently resumed its own attacks after Israeli airstrikes in Gaza that killed many militants and civilians."

Bush Congratulates Mexican Presidential Candidate. The CBS Evening News (7/8, lead story, 2:40, Whitaker, 7.66M) in its coverage of the dispute over the Mexican presidential election notes that "conservative free-market candidate Philip Calderon says he won fair and square. International election observers back him up. Today he received calls of congratulations from President Bush and other heads of state."

Obrador Accuses Calderón Of Fraud In Election, Calls For Protests. NBC Nightly News (7/8, story 9, 2:30, Holt, 9.87M) reported, "Now to a massive demonstration underway in Mexico City." NBC (Lewis): "These people are angry because they believe the election was stolen from their candidate, the leftist andres Manuel Lopez Obrador. He has called for peaceful protests, but many here worry things could get out of hand. Lopez Obrador is calling for protests all over Mexico. As his supporters converged on Mexico City's main square for today's huge rally, the U.S. embassy urged Americans to stay away from the area, warning that, 'even demonstrations intended to be peaceful can turn confrontational and escalate into violence.' That's the fear of many observers here -- that Lopez Obrador will not hold his followers in check. He insisted to reporters today that he is the winner, that the election was rigged." Lewis added, "Lopez Obrador is demanding a total recount, taking his case to the courts and to the streets. Asked today if the official judicial tribunal rules against him and declares Calderon the winner will he concede for the sake of peace in Mexico, he replied, 'we'll wait and see.'"

The Washington Post (7/9, A1, Roig-Franzia, 744K) reports that failed populist candidate Andrés Manuel López Obrador hopes to "overturn the results of Mexico's presidential election;" he is "alleging for the first time that Mexico's electoral commission had rigged its computers before the July 2 election to ensure the half-percentage-point victory of Felipe Calderón." Obrador will "attempt to have the election declared illegal by Mexico's Supreme Court," which "presages a constitutional confrontation because according to many legal experts the special elections court is the only body that can hear election challenges." On Saturday, Obrador "gave a mega-display of street power" with a rally in Mexico City, and, "during his 40-minute address, López Obrador stressed Mexico's class divide, accusing 'powerful interests' of trying to deny democratic freedoms to 'us, the poor.'" He appeals to "anger…from decades of perceived indignities and a sense of persecution by a succession of ruling parties."

The New York Times (7/9, McKinley, Thompson, 1.19M) adds that Obrador "suggested there would be civil unrest without a vote-by-vote recount," saying, "If there is not democracy, there will be instability." Meanwhile, "Calderón's campaign cited the volatile protests Mr. López Obrador led after his 1994 loss in arguing that he could be a danger to Mexico." However, Obrado also said, "This is a peaceful movement," although he "declined to answer several times when asked what he would do if the courts refused a recount." Calderón "effectively ceded the day's spotlight to Mr. López Obrador." The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Boudreaux, 958K) calls the crowd Obrador addressed "rowdy but peaceful," although it notes, "Many in the crowd said they were ready for a fight if Lopez Obrador did not prevail." The AP (7/9, Stevenson) notes, "The likelihood of continuing demonstrations suggests how difficult it will be for Calderon to unify Mexicans, many of whom believe the nation has yet to overcome the decades of institutional corruption and fraud that kept its leaders in power." Knight Ridder (7/9, Hall) and Knight Ridder (7/9, Hall) also cover this story.

Election Signals Shift In Mexico To Two Party System. The New York Times (7/9, McKinley, 1.19M) reports that "voters have pulled the curtain back on a new political landscape for" Mexico, and "who won may not be nearly as important as who lost." The Institutional Revolutionary Party "did not win a single state" and "lost its hold on Congress … In short, the declining former ruling party finally crashed and burned." Now there are "two invigorated, growing — and quite evenly matched -- parties" that "look a lot like the Republicans and Democrats or Britain's Tories and Labor."

Former GOP Counsel Gives Recount Advice. Benjamin L. Ginsberg, a partner at Patton Boggs and national counsel to the Bush-Cheney campaigns in 2000 and 2004, writes an op-ed in the Washington Post (7/9, B1, 744K) with advice for Calderon and Obrador: "get the right people." – "the smartest, ablest, toughest ones you can find." Next, "be sure they're committed to your candidate -- that commitment makes it possible to manage all that talent." Organize immediately, and "get a good caterer and some extra phone lines. I n other words, pay attention to logistics." You need to "line up top lawyers, which in a recount are a necessary (and underappreciated) evil," as well as "communications specialists." You must "just debunk the allegations as best you can."

Former Gore Counsel Says Recount Is Best For Calderon, Advises Obrador To Be Bush, & Not "Dignified, Responsible, Reasonable." Ronald Klain, general counsel for the Gore-Lieberman Recount Committee in 2000 and a lawyer in Washington, writes in an op-ed in the Washington Post (7/9, B1, 744K) that for Obrador "The good news is that he has avoided the two biggest problems that confronted Al Gore in Recount 2000: being forced to contest the election in a jurisdiction where the governor was his opponent's brother, and being tormented by a chief election official who was a partisan operative with a bizarre Queen Esther complex." The bad news he's "more than 200,000 votes behind" and "the clock is ticking loudly. If he wants to keep his candidacy alive, he must take decisive -- and quite divisive -- action." He must "bring meaningful and documented claims of fraud in the election," get "his supporters to the streets and question the legitimacy of the vote casting and counting process," and "demand that, notwithstanding Mexican law, every ballot be recounted, by hand, to ensure an accurate tally."

Former Mexican President's Genocide Charges Thrown Out. The AP (7/9, Grillo) reports that in "the latest blow to" Mexican "prosecutors' attempts to bring" former President Luis Echeverria "to justice for alleged crimes committed during Mexico's 'dirty war,' a violent crack down on leftist dissidents in the 1960s and 1970s," a "judge threw out genocide charges on Saturday against ruling that a 30-year statute of limitations had run out" He "had been under house arrest for more than a week on charges that he organized a student massacre as interior secretary in 1968." Still, "Prosecutors still can appeal the decision."

Venezuelan Government Elucidates Labor Policies With Chaplin Film. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Kraul, 958K) reports, "For President Hugo Chavez's socialist government," Charlie Chaplin's film "Modern Times" is "more than just entertainment: It's become a teaching tool. Since January, in a bid to expose the evils of 'savage capitalism,' the Labor Ministry has shown the Chaplin film to thousands of workers in places such as this rundown industrial suburb of Caracas. When the screenings at factories or meeting halls end, Labor Ministry officials then take their cue, and use Chaplin's plight to spell out worker rights under occupational safety laws passed last year and now being applied. They are part of Chavez's sweeping reform agenda that he calls Socialism for the 21st Century."

Ambassador From Finland Agrees UN Reforms Needed. Kirsti Lintonen, Finland's ambassador to the United Nations, writes in a letter to the editor of the New York Times (7/9, 1.19M), "The European Union concurs with your view on the importance and necessity of United Nations reform." It "is the single largest contributor to the United Nations budget. We attach great importance to reforms that would bring about efficiencies under budget and management rules," and "management reform is also central."

Pakistani Press Minister Objects To NYTimes Editorial For UN Reforms. Mansoor Suhail, press minister of the Pakistan Mission to the U.N., writes in a letter to the editor of the New York Times (7/9, 1.19M) that the Times' "editorial unfairly tends to stereotype developing countries as blockers of United Nations reform." The "vast majority of the United Nations membership" considers "progress on development resolution and implementation of agreed development commitments…a matter of the highest priority." However, Pakistan and other members of Group of 77 "believe that delegation of authority must be accompanied by robust accountability mechanisms."

Breaking Vow, Polish President's Twin To Become Prime Minister. NBC Nightly News (7/8, story 10, 0:10, Holt, 9.87M) reported, "In Poland political history is about to be made and that's why the two men are you seeing here are smiling. They are set to become the first identical twins to hold power at the same time. On the left is Poland's current president and on the left his brother who has been tapped by the ruling party to become Poland's prime minister."

The Washington Post (7/9, A12, Whitlock, 744K) reports that "there is no longer any doubt that the 57-year-old, chubby-faced twins are in charge of the eastern European country." Jaroslaw "replaces Kazimierz Marcinkiewicz, who unexpectedly announced his resignation on Friday." Although Marcinkiewicz "insisted that the Kaczynskis, who had put him in the job last year, did not maneuver him out the door," a number of "Poles were skeptical of the official explanation," that "he was giving up the prime minister's post so he could run for mayor of Warsaw in November," considering that "Marcinkiewicz had among the highest approval ratings of any politician in Poland." Jaroslaw had "promised voters he would not take the job if his brother won the upcoming presidential race," which he did, but the promise "sounded as if it was made grudgingly" and the twins "did little to dispel the perception that they were controlling the government behind the scenes."

The AFP (7/9) adds, "analysts were unconvinced" by the official explanation, as well. "Political scientist Kazimierz Kik said Marcinkiewicz's departure was forced by Jaroslaw Kaczynski, annoyed by the increasingly independent and high-profile stance the premier was taking." the AP (7/9, Gera) also covers this story.

Chad's Oil Money Not Reaching Those In Need. The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Sanders, 958K) reports that three years after "poor, landlocked" Chad "joined the league of oil-producing nations, there are growing — and familiar — complaints that petroleum money is not getting to those most in need. For most of this year, Chad's oil wealth has been frozen in London bank accounts after a dispute with the World Bank." The Times writes, "Thanks to decades of internal strife and its reputation as one of the world's most corrupt countries, this former French colony was unable to attract investment partners to develop its oil fields until the World Bank agreed in 2000 to back a $4-billion deal to build a pipeline from Chad to the Atlantic coastline of neighboring Cameroon. … By the end of 2005, the government of Chad had received about $420 million, nearly doubling its annual income. But tracking where the money went is not so simple." The Times reports that aside from new roads, "government officials are hard-pressed to describe large-scale benefits of the oil funds." They talk about smaller projects: a new school fence and some renovated classrooms in the capital, HIV testing clinics, a water tower in the southern city of Doba.

Cellphones Used To Streamline Peace Program In The Congo. The Washington Post (7/9, A1, Sullivan, 744K) reports that cellphone use is upon in Africa. They "have also created a new kind of corruption in a country rife with it: People here tell of government officials demanding bribes in the form of airtime transferred to their cellphones. Local officials said they believe armed rebel groups use cellphones and texts to coordinate their operations in the country's eastern provinces." However, "But the technology is also being used to create peace." The World Bank, Britain, France and other big donors have put $200 million into a "year-old program, designed to turn Congo's warriors into wage earners. So far more than 75,000 people have handed over their guns in exchange for job training and a cash incentive: an initial $110 payment, followed by monthly $25 payments for a year." However, "clerks using thick account books with handwritten entries were having trouble making the thousands of payments efficiently. So, in February the program contracted with Celpay to modernize the process," which now takes minutes instead of hours.

Controversial Rape Law Divides Pakistanis. The New York Times (7/9, Masood, 1.19M) reports that Pakistan's Hudood ordinance, "introduced in 1979 and criticized internationally since, include a clause stating that to prove rape, a woman must have at least four male witnesses. If the woman fails to provide proof, she herself faces the charge of adultery." Critics say this "flaw … has put many women behind bars." The Times notes, "Pakistani society has remained bitterly divided over the laws. Orthodox clergymen have often portrayed the laws as divine. … Rights advocates have demanded absolute repeal since 1980's."

Russian Jet Crashes, Likely Killing 150. CNN (7/9) on its web site reports, "An Airbus A-310 passenger jet with 200 people on board left the runway early Sunday while landing at Irkutsk Airport in eastern Siberia, crashed into a concrete barrier and burst into flames, killing 150 people, according to the Russian news agency Interfax. The front of the plane was crushed, and more than 40 people were hospitalized with burns, the agency said, quoting emergency officials." The AP (7/9, Meyer) reports, "The regional prosecutor's office said a preliminary count showed that more than 150 people died, the Interfax news agency reported.

Cuban Woman Dies As Coast Guard Intercepts Migrants' Boat. The AP (7/9, Kennedy) reports, "A boat overloaded with Cubans being smuggled into the U.S. tried to ram a Coast Guard vessel in rough seas early Saturday, and a woman aboard the boat died, authorities said. The 36-foot, go-fast boat ignored orders to stop when the Coast Guard tried to intercept it 4 miles south of Boca Chica around 6:30 a.m., said Petty Officer James Judge, a spokesman for the Coast Guard. Coast Guard crew then fired two shots into the vessel's engine to disable it, he said." The AP adds, "The remaining migrants were still aboard the Coast Guard cutter and will be processed as usual, he said. Under the 'wet foot/dry foot' policy, most Cubans who reach U.S. soil are allowed to remain, while those intercepted at sea are generally sent home."

Ramos-Horta Named East Timorese Premier. The New York Times (7/9, Perlez, 1.19M) reports, "In a move designed to bring stability to East Timor after months of unrest, the Nobel peace laureate José Ramos-Horta was named prime minister on Saturday. President Xanana Gusmão selected Mr. Ramos-Horta to lead a new government after Mari Alkatiri was forced to resign as prime minister two weeks ago amid allegations that he had helped to organize and arm a civilian militia. … The selection was praised by the Australian government, which sent more than 1,000 soldiers to East Timor in late May to lead an international peacekeeping force in putting down an insurrection among members of the army and the police." The Los Angeles Times (7/9, Paddock, 958K) also notes Ramos-Horta's appointment.

Kristof Sees No Optimists On Darfur. In his column in the New York Times (7/9, 1.19M) Nicholas Kristof writes, "The Darfur Peace Agreement, signed on May 5, signaled a ray of hope in a desperate land. But on the ground, its deadlines are not being met, security is deteriorating, and the violence is rippling from Sudan ever wider into both Chad and the Central African Republic. One measure of how awful the situation has become in eastern Chad is that at least 15,000 villagers have fled ... into Darfur!" Kristoff adds, "The two most important Bush administration officials on Darfur, Robert Zoellick and Michael Gerson (who has been the conscience of the White House), have both announced their resignations, so there is a vacuum in Washington as well. President Bush should address this vacuum by appointing a top-level envoy for the crisis. Mr. President, how about calling in James Baker, or else Colin Powell? In talking to experts about Darfur over the last three years, I usually have encountered both optimists and pessimists. These days, I just can't find an optimist."

Hoagland Says Bush Provoking New International Law – Without US Input. Jim Hoagland writes in his column in the Washington Post (7/9, B7, 744K), "In spite of itself, the Bush administration is reshaping and revitalizing international law as a governing concept and a force in world politics." Their "highhanded policies in the war on global terrorist networks and the occupation of Iraq have provoked sharp reaction at home and abroad" that "has turned into a search by others for legal and political frameworks to contain President Bush's campaign to concentrate national security power in his hands and shield it from even cursory scrutiny and consultation." Both "Bush and Cheney underestimate the costs of their policies and the countervailing forces they inevitably trigger," and now "a new framework for international law is being developed in reaction to Bush's global policies -- without other significant American input. That is the message from America's allies, from Congress and now from the Supreme Court that the president should finally heed."

Iranian Student Movement Said To Have Stalled. Fotini Christia, a fellow at the Weatherhead Center for International Affairs at Harvard and currently at the International Center for Persian Studies, University of Tehran, writes in an op-ed the Washington Post (7/9, B7, 744K), "Today marks the seventh anniversary of the student protests that took post-revolutionary Iran by storm," but Iran's opposition "will not celebrate today's anniversary," as "the Iranian student movement is a shambles -- divided, confused and lacking any cause for celebration." While "the 1999 protests sought reform within the existing regime," it "didn't happen, and now, under President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's leadership, the process has been completely sidelined." While "the student movement very much wants a reemergence of the reform process…it has no good ideas on how to make it happen," and "has found no place in Iran's new political reality." Instead, "its stance has moved from the politics of realistic change to the politics of survival through inaction."

Bush's Foreign Doctrine Said To Have Backfired, Shifted Significantly. Time (7/9, Allen, Ratnesar) reports, that President Bush has found "himself in a world of hurt" with "no relief in sight." In the last " four years, the Administration has been forced to rethink the doctrine with which it hoped to remake the world as the strategy's ineffectiveness is exposed by the very policies it prescribed" as "the Bush Doctrine foundered in the principal place the U.S. tried to apply it." While "the White House insists that Bush's goals have not changed," the "strategic makeover is evident in the ascendancy of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who has tried to repair the Administration's relations with allies and has persuaded Bush to join multilateral negotiations aimed at defusing the standoffs with North Korea and Iran." Having used "so much energy and so many resources on al-Qaeda and the war in Iraq, the Administration is finding that other global challenges…have grown beyond its ability to do anything about them." The Administration's "miscalculations have come back to haunt it," as "Instead of deterring the rulers in Tehran and Pyongyang, the travails of the U.S. occupation may have emboldened those regimes in their quest to obtain nuclear weapons while constraining the U.S. military's ability to deter them." Meanwhile, "the complexity of global politics has caused the U.S. to struggle in its goal to spread democracy as a defense against terrorism" and ultimately resulted in "a broader dimming of the Administration's commitment to the ideals of its once proactive freedom agenda." Finally, "the practical costs of the last plank of the Bush Doctrine—unilateralism—may have finally persuaded the Administration to jettison that too."

LATimes Criticizes New China Censorship Law.

The Los Angeles Times (7/9, 958K) editorializes, "In China, the National People's Congress is on the verge of approving a law that would forbid the media from reporting on breaking news without permission from government officials. The draft law plumbs new depths of censorship even in China, already among the most regressive countries when it comes to press freedoms." It is "particularly unusual" because it would "apparently" affect "foreign as well as domestic media. Though reporters for papers such as The Times are closely monitored, the government seldom tries to censor stories meant for outside consumption. Yet an official involved in preparing the legislation recently said he thought it should apply to all news organizations operating in China." The Times adds, "If there's a silver lining to this naked attempt at repression, it's that China's media and public are strongly resisting it."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Ally Warned Bush On Keeping Spying From Congress (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau And Scott Shane

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 8 — In a sharply worded letter to President Bush in May, an important Congressional ally charged that the administration might have violated the law by failing to inform Congress of some secret intelligence programs and risked losing Republican support on national security matters.

The letter from Representative Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, the Republican chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, did not specify the intelligence activities that he believed had been hidden from Congress.

But Mr. Hoekstra, who was briefed on and supported the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program and the Treasury Department's tracking of international banking transactions, clearly was referring to programs that have not been publicly revealed.

Recently, after the harsh criticism from Mr. Hoekstra, intelligence officials have appeared at two closed committee briefings to answer questions from the chairman and other members. The briefings appear to have eased but not erased the concerns of Mr. Hoekstra and other lawmakers about whether the administration is sharing information on all of its intelligence operations.

A copy of the four-page letter dated May 18, which has not been previously disclosed, was obtained by The New York Times.

"I have learned of some alleged intelligence community activities about which our committee has not been briefed," Mr. Hoesktra wrote. "If these allegations are true, they may represent a breach of responsibility by the administration, a violation of the law, and, just as importantly, a direct affront to me and the members of this committee who have so ardently supported efforts to collect information on our enemies."

He added: "The U.S. Congress simply should not have to play Twenty Questions to get the information that it deserves under our Constitution."

Frederick Jones, a White House spokesman, declined to comment on the concerns raised by Mr. Hoekstra but said that "we will continue to work closely with the chairman and other Congressional leaders on important national security issues."

A spokesman for Mr. Hoekstra, Jamal D. Ware, said he could not discuss the activities allegedly withheld from Congress. But he said that Mr. Hoekstra remained adamant that no intelligence programs could be hidden from oversight committees.

"Chairman Hoekstra has raised these issues with the administration to ensure that the Intelligence Committee is able to conduct its job of oversight," Mr. Ware said. "Intelligence officials have committed to being forthcoming with Congress, and Chairman Hoekstra is going to hold them to their word."

Mr. Hoekstra's blunt letter is evidence of a rift between the White House and House Republican leaders over the administration's perceived indifference to Congressional oversight and input on intelligence matters. Mr. Hoekstra wrote that he had shared his complaints with House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois, and that the speaker "concurs with my concerns."

A spokesman for Mr. Hastert declined to comment.

The letter appears to have resulted at least in part from the White House's decision, made early in May, to name Gen. Michael V. Hayden to lead the Central Intelligence Agency, with Stephen R. Kappes as his deputy. The letter was sent the day of General Hayden's confirmation hearing before the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Mr. Hoekstra (pronounced HOOK-stra) complained publicly about the choices when they were announced, but his private letter to Mr. Bush was much harsher. He warned that the choice of Mr. Kappes, who he said was part of a group at the C.I.A. that "intentionally undermined the administration," sends "a clear signal that the days of collaborative reform between the White House and this committee may be over."

Mr. Hoekstra also expressed concern about the intelligence reorganization under John D. Negroponte, the first director of national intelligence, who he said was creating "a large, bureaucratic and hierarchical structure that will be less flexible and agile than our adversaries."

Mr. Hoekstra's views on oversight appear to be shared by some other Intelligence Committee members.

DOJ_NMG_0039145

"I think the executive branch has been insufficiently forthcoming on a number of important programs," Representative Heather A. Wilson, Republican of New Mexico, said in an interview. She would not discuss any programs on which the committee had not been briefed, but she said that in the Bush administration, "there's a presumption that if they don't tell anybody, a problem may get better or it will solve itself."

Ms. Wilson said she shared "deep concerns" about the pace and direction of intelligence reforms overseen by Mr. Negroponte's office. "We have some troubled programs," she said.

American intelligence agencies routinely conduct many secret programs, but under the National Security Act, the agencies are required to keep the Congressional intelligence committees "fully and currently informed of all intelligence activities." Even in the case of especially sensitive covert actions, the law requires briefings for at least the leaders from both parties of the committees and the House and Senate.

As the administration has asserted broad presidential authority to fight terrorism, concerns about Congressional oversight and checks and balances between the branches of government have become increasingly heated. Democrats complained that the administration's failure to brief the full Intelligence Committees on the N.S.A. warrantless eavesdropping, which focuses on the international communications of Americans and others inside the United States, was a violation of the National Security law. Some members of Congress said they had been briefed on the Treasury Department's bank monitoring program, which examines international money transfers through a Brussels-based consortium, only after The New York Times began making inquiries in recent months.

But the assertion that other intelligence activities had been hidden from Congress is particularly surprising coming from Mr. Hoekstra, who defended the administration's limited briefings on the N.S.A. program against Democratic criticism.

An official familiar with recent exchanges between the intelligence agencies and the House committee said Friday that General Hayden had twice briefed the full committee and had addressed Mr. Hoekstra's questions about the intelligence activities referred to in the letter. The C.I.A. director promised "a free flow of information," and Mr. Hoekstra, who initially objected to placing a military officer in charge of the C.I.A., said he would work closely with the agency's new leadership.

The official, who spoke of the briefings only when granted anonymity because they were classified, declined to say anything about what the activities were or which agencies they involved.

Officials with both Mr. Negroponte's office and the C.I.A. declined to comment specifically on Mr. Hoekstra's letter. But Carl Kropf, a spokesman for Mr. Negroponte, said that over the past year his office had "engaged in hundreds of briefings, meetings and discussions with Congressional committees."

He added, "We value this dialogue with Congress, and we will continue to provide the committee with the information they need to fulfill their responsibilities."

Jennifer Millerwise Dyck, a spokeswoman for General Hayden, said that "the director believes in the important oversight role Congress plays, and he will continue regular and transparent interactions with members."

Since his appointment as committee chairman in August 2004, Mr. Hoekstra has been a critical ally of the White House on intelligence matters. He has supported the administration's most controversial policies, including its treatment of terrorist suspects, and he has balked at Democratic demands for an investigation of pre-war intelligence on Iraq. He has defended the legality and necessity of the N.S.A. program and the bank monitoring.

Mr. Hoekstra has been one of the strongest advocates in Congress for a crackdown on leaks of classified information to the media, a cause championed by both Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney.

But in recent months, Mr. Hoekstra has begun to express some disaffection. In March, he joined the top Democrat on the Intelligence Committee, Representative Jane Harman of California, in a public critique of Mr. Negroponte's performance. He criticized intelligence officials for initially resisting his demand that thousands of captured Iraqi documents be posted on the Web. Like other House Republicans, he bristled when Porter J. Goss, a former House colleague, was forced out as C.I.A. director in early May.

Most recently, Mr. Hoekstra strongly criticized a news briefing arranged by Mr. Negroponte's office on an Army report that 500 pre-Gulf War chemical shells had been found scattered around Iraq. On June 29, Mr. Hoekstra, who had said the finding established that there were weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, made public an angry letter to Mr. Negroponte calling the briefing "inaccurate, incomplete and occasionally misleading" and asserting that "attempts were made to downplay the significance of relevant facts."

A spokesman for Mr. Negroponte's office said he had not yet replied to the complaint.

Bush Is Pressed On Reporting Domestic Surveillance (WP)

By Charles Babington

DOJ_NMG_0039146

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

In a sharply worded letter, the Republican chairman of the House intelligence committee has told President Bush that the administration is angering lawmakers, and possibly violating the law, by giving Congress too little information about domestic surveillance programs.

Rep. Peter Hoekstra (Mich.) has been a staunch defender of the administration's anti-terrorism tactics. But seven weeks ago, he wrote to Bush to report that he had heard of "alleged Intelligence Community activities" not outlined to committee members in classified briefings.

"If these allegations are true," he wrote, "they may represent a breach of responsibility by the Administration, a violation of law and . . . a direct affront to me and the Members of this committee."

Hoekstra's four-page letter of May 18 was posted yesterday on the New York Times' Web site. His staff confirmed the letter's authenticity but said it was meant to remain private. Spokesman Jamal D. Ware said Hoekstra "has raised these concerns, and they are being addressed. He will continue to push for full disclosure so the committee can conduct vigorous oversight."

The letter is significant because few congressional Republicans have complained publicly about Bush's surveillance programs, which include warrantless wiretaps of some Americans' international phone calls and e-mails as well as the massive collection of telephone records involving U.S. homes and businesses.

Heretofore, the sharpest GOP concerns have been raised by Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (Pa.). On May 26, Specter voted against Michael V. Hayden's confirmation as CIA director to protest what he called "the administration's policy of not informing the Congress . . . in a way which enables the Congress and the Judiciary Committee to do our constitutional job on oversight."

In his letter, Hoekstra complained of unspecified alleged surveillance operations that had not become public at the time and that, perhaps, remain undisclosed. It was written five weeks before newspapers divulged that the administration has been secretly tapping into a vast global database of confidential financial transactions for nearly five years. It was unclear yesterday whether Hoekstra and other top-ranking lawmakers had been briefed on that program by the date of the letter.

Hoekstra has differed with the White House in recent weeks over the significance of 500 chemical munitions shells uncovered in Iraq near the Iranian border in 2004. The shells were buried by Iraqi troops, and then apparently forgotten, during Iraq's eight-year war with Iran, which ended in 1988.

Last month, Hoekstra highlighted the findings in a Capitol Hill news conference. But administration officials played them down, saying the old shells did not point to a bid by Saddam Hussein to develop weapons of mass destruction.

Much of Hoekstra's letter to Bush outlined the chairman's objections -- which were widely known -- to the appointment of Stephen R. Kappes as CIA deputy director under Hayden. Kappes quit the CIA in 2004 in a dispute with then-Director Porter J. Goss. Goss preceded Hoekstra as House intelligence committee chairman, and many Republicans remain loyal to him.

"Regrettably," Hoekstra wrote Bush, "the appointment of Mr. Kappes sends a clear signal that the days of collaborative reform between the White House and this committee may be over." He defended Goss for responding to Kappes's "demonstrated contempt for Congress."

In imploring Bush to brief top lawmakers on surveillance operations, Hoekstra wrote that Congress "should not have to play 'Twenty Questions' to get the information that it deserves under our Constitution."

"I want to reemphasize," he wrote, "that the Administration has the legal responsibility to 'fully and currently' inform the House and Senate Intelligence Committees of its intelligence and intelligence-related activities."

He said Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) shared his concerns.

Asked for a comment on the letter, White House spokesman Peter Watkins said the administration "will continue to work closely" with Hoekstra and other congressional leaders on intelligence matters.

When In Doubt, Publish (WP)

By On Secrets

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

It is the business -- and the responsibility -- of the press to reveal secrets.

Journalists are constantly trying to report things that public officials and others believe should be secret, and constantly exercising restraint over what they publish.

Most Americans want their government to be held accountable, which is the raison d'?tre of watchdog journalism. At the same time, they do not want the press to disclose government secrets that are vital to national security.

DOJ_NMG_0039147

The journalist's dilemma, then, lies in choosing between the risk that would result from disclosure and the parallel risk of keeping the public in the dark -- a quandary that has become all the more pointed since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. As deans charged with imparting the values of journalism to the next generation of reporters and editors, we favor disclosure when there are not strong reasons against it.

That issue is front and center again because of the June 23 articles in the New York Times, the Los Angeles Times and the Wall Street Journal describing the government's efforts to track terrorist financing. The New York Times has attracted most of the outrage because it took the lead in investigating the system.

It is appropriate for Americans to be concerned when news organizations publish information that the president and others in authority have strongly urged not be published. No sane citizen would wish the media to provide terrorists with information that would be likely to endanger Americans.

President Bush has denounced the Times in exceptionally harsh language, and on June 29 the House formally condemned the paper. Some critics of the Times have termed its actions "treasonous" and called for criminal charges under the Espionage Act. One conservative commentator told the San Francisco Chronicle that she would happily send Bill Keller, the paper's executive editor, to the gas chamber.

Keller has characterized the decision to publish the information as a "close call," making this an especially important example to examine. Despite its security concerns, the public has shown steady support for the media's watchdog role. Earlier this year, a survey by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press found that 56 percent of respondents said it was very important for the media to report stories they believe are in the nation's interest. A third of respondents ranked government censorship on the grounds of national security as more important. The public wants the press to keep a sharp lookout, but wants the job performed responsibly. We share this sentiment.

In the case of the stories about financial data, the government's main concern seemed to be that the hitherto cooperative banks might stop cooperating if the Times disclosed the existence of their financial tracking system. So far, that apparently has not happened.

For many Americans, however, the possibility of damage to terrorist surveillance should have been sufficient justification for the Times to remain silent. Why, they ask, should the press take such a chance?

There are situations in which that chance should not be taken. For instance, there was no justification for columnist Robert D. Novak to have unmasked Valerie Plame as a covert CIA officer.

We believe that in the case of a close call, the press should publish when editors are convinced that more damage will be done to our democratic society by keeping information away from the American people than by leveling with them.

We know from history that the government often claims to be concerned about national security when its concern is that disclosure will prove politically or personally embarrassing. The documents that came to be known as the Pentagon Papers in 1971 told how Presidents Dwight D. Eisenhower, John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson had misled Americans about our role in the Vietnam War. Hence the classification of their contents.

In the aftermath of 9/11, a new climate of caution was a sensible response to a sophisticated terrorist foe. But Bush's reaction -- declaring a "war on terror" and claiming the Constitution grants almost limitless powers to the president in a time of war -- is excessive. His administration has been aggressively restricting access to information on the grounds of national security. For example, earlier this year historians complained that intelligence agencies were removing previously declassified documents from archives. Some of these papers dated as far back as the Korean War; many had been cited multiple times in books.

In general, the administration has sought to conduct much of what it calls the war on terror in secret, and it has been able to do so with little oversight from Congress, which would normally be a key check on power. When the press has played such an oversight role, it has often been harshly criticized.

For instance, a few months ago Bush denounced the Times for revealing the National Security Agency's program of monitoring international telephone calls by Americans without first obtaining warrants, as the law requires. In that case, Bush rebuked the paper for revealing a classified secret. For most observers, however, the most important secret that was revealed was that the president had ignored the statutory process that Congress had established.

Despite the rhetoric of their fiercest critics, most journalists take secrets seriously. Indeed, in a number of cases since 9/11, many news organizations, including the Times, have forgone publication of information at the request of the Bush administration. The Times held the article on domestic eavesdropping for a year, publishing it only after the paper thought that the issues raised were of great importance.

We believe that the extraordinary power of the presidency at this moment mandates more scrutiny rather than less. Yet Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales has said he would consider prosecuting journalists for publishing classified information.

Such an action would threaten to tilt the balance between disclosure and secrecy in a direction that would weaken watchdog reporting at a time when it is badly needed.

We subscribe to the vision of Carl C. Magee, a crusading journalist whose Albuquerque newspaper infuriated another president in the 1920s with revelations in the Teapot Dome scandal. Forced to close his paper after being driven to bankruptcy, Magee emerged two months later with another newspaper.

Emblazoned on the front page was a new motto, borrowed from Dante: Give Light and the People Will Find Their Own Way.

All The News That's Fit To Bully (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

TWO weeks and counting, and the editor of The New York Times still has not been sentenced to the gas chamber. What a bummer for one California radio talk-show host, Melanie Morgan, who pronounced The Times guilty of treason and expressly endorsed that punishment. She and the rest of the get-the-press lynch mob are growing restless, wondering why newspapers haven't been prosecuted under the Espionage Act. "If Bush believes what he is saying," taunted Pat Buchanan, "why does he not do his duty as the chief law enforcement officer of the United States?"

Here's why. First, there is no evidence that the Times article on tracking terrorist finances either breached national security or revealed any "secrets" that had not already been publicized by either the administration or Swift, the Belgian financial clearinghouse enlisted in the effort. Second, the legal bar would be insurmountable: even Gabriel Schoenfeld, who first floated the idea of prosecuting The Times under the Espionage Act in an essay in Commentary, told The Nation this month that the chance of it happening was .05 percent.

But the third and most important explanation has nothing to do with the facts of the case or the law and everything to do with politics. For all the lynch mob's efforts to single out The Times — "It's the old trick, go after New York, go after big, ethnic New York," as Chris Matthews put it — three papers broke Swift stories on their front pages. Even in this bash-the-press environment, the last spectacle needed by a president with an approval rating in the 30's is the national firestorm that would greet a doomed Justice Department prosecution of The Times, The Wall Street Journal and The Los Angeles Times.

The administration has a more insidious game plan instead: it has manufactured and milked this controversy to reboot its intimidation of the press, hoping journalists will pull punches in an election year. There are momentous stories far more worrisome to the White House than the less-than-shocking Swift program, whether in the chaos of Anbar Province or the ruins of New Orleans. If the press muzzles itself, its under-the-radar self-censorship will be far more valuable than a Nixonesque frontal assault that ends up as a 24/7 hurricane veering toward the Supreme Court.

Will this plan work? It did after 9/11. The chilling words articulated at the get-go by Ari Fleischer (Americans must "watch what they say") carried over to the run-up to the Iraq war, when the administration's W.M.D. claims went unchallenged by most news organizations. That this strategy may work again can be seen in the fascinating escalation in tactics by the Bush White House's most powerful not-so-secret agent in the press itself, the Wall Street Journal editorial page. The Journal is not Fox News or an idle blogger or radio bloviator. It's the establishment voice of the party in power. The infamous editorial it ran on June 30

("Fit and Unfit to Print"), an instant classic, doesn't just confer its imprimatur on the administration's latest crusade to conflate aggressive journalism with treason, but also ups the ante.

The editorial was ostensibly a frontal attack on The Times, accusing its editors of not believing America is "really at war" and of exercising bad faith in running its report on the Swift operation. But an attack on The Times by The Journal's editorial page is a shrug-inducing dog-bites-man story; the paper's conservative editorialists have long dueled with a rival whose editorials usually argue the other side. (And sometimes the Times opinion writers gleefully return the fire.) What was groundbreaking and unsettling about the Journal editorial was that it besmirched the separately run news operation of The Journal itself.

By any standard, The Journal is one of the great newspapers in the world, whether you agree with its editorials or not. As befits a great newspaper, its journalists are fearless in pursuit of news, as tragically exemplified by Daniel Pearl. Like reporters at The Times, those at The Journal operate independently of the paper's opinion pages. Witness The Journal's schism during the Enron scandal. Its editorial page belittled the scandal's significance most of the way, resisting even mild criticisms of Enron (it was "partly a victim of its own success") until it filed for bankruptcy. The dearly departed Ken Lay, after all, was the leading Bush financial patron; to the Journal editorialists, the "Clintonian moral climate" of the 1990's was a root cause of Enron's problems. Meanwhile, The Journal's investigative reporters had gone their own way months earlier, helping unearth the scandal. So much so that Mr. Lay tried to argue his innocence in the spring by testifying that a "witch hunt" by the paper's reporters had more to do with his company's demise than he did.

It was a similarly top-flight Journal reporter, Glenn Simpson, who wrote his paper's Swift story. But the Journal editorial page couldn't ignore him if it was attacking The Times for publishing its Swift scoop on the same day. So instead it maligned him by echoing Tony Snow's official White House line: The Journal was merely following The Times once it knew that The Times would publish anyway. As if this weren't insulting enough, the editorial suggested that the Treasury Department leaked much of the story to The Journal and that a Journal reporter could be relied upon to write a "straighter" account more to the government's liking than that of a Times reporter.

This version of events does not jibe with an e-mail sent by The Journal's own Washington bureau chief, Gerald Seib, on the day the Swift articles ran. "I was surprised to see your news story about the New York Times 'scoop' on the government program to monitor international bank transactions," Mr. Seib wrote to Joe Strupp of the trade publication Editor & Publisher. "As you could tell from the lead story on the front page of The Wall Street Journal today, we had the same story. Moreover, we posted it online early last evening, virtually at the same time The Times did. In sum, we and The Times were both chasing the story and crossed the finish line at the same time — and well ahead of The Los Angeles Times, which posted its story well after ours went up."

In other words, The Journal's journalists were doing their job with their usual professionalism. But by twisting this history, the Journal editorial page was sending an unsubtle shot across the bow, warning those in the newsroom (and every other newsroom) that their patriotism would be impugned, as The Times's had been, if they investigated administration conduct in wartime in ways that displeased the White House.

Any fan of The Journal's news operation expects it to stand up to this bullying. But the nastiness of the Journal editorial is a preview of what we can expect from the administration and all of its surrogates this year. In "The One Percent Doctrine," the revelatory book about wartime successes and failures now (happily) outpacing Ann Coulter at Amazon.com, the former Wall Street Journal reporter Ron Suskind explains just how tough it is for a reporter in this climate: "to report about national affairs and, especially, national security in this contentious period demands at least a spoonful of disobedience — a countermeasure to strong assurances by those in power that the obedient will be rewarded or, at the very least, have nothing to worry about."

The trouble is we have plenty to worry about. For all the airy talk about the First Amendment, civil liberties and Thomas Jefferson in the debate over the Swift story and the National Security Agency surveillance story before it, there's an urgent practical matter at stake, too. Now more than ever, after years of false reports of missions accomplished, the voters need to do what Congress has failed to do and hold those who mismanage America's ever-expanding war accountable for their performance in real time.

As George Will wrote in March, all three members of the "axis of evil" — Iraq, Iran and North Korea — are "more dangerous than they were when that phrase was coined in 2002." So is Afghanistan, which is spiraling into Taliban-and-drug-lord anarchy, without nearly enough troops or other assistance to secure it. On the first anniversary of the London bombings, and on a surging wave of new bin Laden and al-Zawahiri videos, the two foremost Qaeda experts outside government, Peter Bergen and the former C.I.A. officer Michael Scheuer, both sounded alarms that contradict the insistent administration refrain that the terrorists are on the run.

We can believe instead, if we choose to, that all is well and that the press shouldn't question our government's account of how it is winning the war brilliantly at every turn. (The former C.I.A. analytical chief, Jami Miscik, decodes this game in "The One Percent Doctrine": the administration tells "only half the story, the part that makes us look good," and keeps the other half classified.) We can believe that reporters, rather than terrorists, are the villains. We can debate whether traitorous editors should be sent to gas chambers or merely tarred and feathered.

Or we can hope that the press will rise to the occasion and bring Americans more news we can use, not less, at a perilous time when every piece of information counts.

U.S. Says Inmate Legal Notes May Have Aided Suicide Plot (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

Detainees at the Guantánamo Bay detention center in Cuba may have planned three suicides there last month by exchanging messages on note paper that was provided by lawyers and generally not scrutinized by guards because of confidentiality rules, the government has asserted in court papers.

Justice Department lawyers made the claim on Friday in a court filing in seeking permission from a federal district judge to review some 1,100 pounds of papers seized from the detainees as part of a military investigation into the suicides on June 10.

The filing, in the Federal District Court for the District of Columbia, cites a handful of notes found since the suicides. Detainees' lawyers have described the suicides as acts of desperation, while Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr., the facility's commander, has described them as acts of "asymmetric warfare." The government's claims were first reported by The Washington Post on Saturday.

Government lawyers argued in the filing that all prisoners' possessions needed to be searched, including documents typically protected by attorney-client privilege, because an initial search had "demonstrated that detainees had developed practices for misusing the existence of a privileged attorney-client communication system."

In the cell of one of the detainees who died, the authorities said, investigators found a hand-written message from another prisoner on notepaper marked "privileged attorney-client material."

Several other notes said to be relevant to the suicides were later discovered in prisoners' cells and plastic bins where detainees keep their personal possessions, according to a chronology of the investigation.

One of the notes offered guidance on knot-tying, court records said, although it is not clear if the three detainees were aware of the instructions when they hanged themselves with torn sheets and clothing.

Another set of notes marked privileged and "potentially authored by at least two of the deceased detainees" were found in the cell of a living detainee, according to court documents. One detainee also used envelopes marked attorney-client that were found to hold government documents that investigators said might have been classified.

Because all three of the men who died had never been visited by attorneys, government lawyers said the evidence "indicated the passing of materials and messages between detainees and that some level of planning or coordination of the suicides had taken place."

In an affidavit, Admiral Harris said the evidence suggested that "the suicides may have been part of a larger plan or pact for more suicides that day or in the immediate future."

He also raised the possibility that detainees' lawyers or others might have played a role in passing the notes, asking investigators to search for evidence of a plot assisted by "third parties."

Lawyers representing detainees at Guantánamo bridled at that suggestion. Bill Goodman, the legal director of the Center for Constitutional Rights, a New York group that has coordinated efforts to file habeas corpus petitions on behalf of most Guantánamo detainees, said guards were careful to check lawyers' briefcases both before and after they spent time with clients.

"Certainly if something is written on the back in Arabic, the guards are going to see it," Mr. Goodman said.

He and other lawyers described the government's demand for control of prisoners' possessions as an attempt to weaken their clients' cases.

Stephen Oleskey, a lawyer in Boston who represents six Algerians seized in Bosnia in 2001, said written communication was critical to defending the detainees.

Guantanamo Probe Finds Evidence Of Plot (AP)

By Ben Fox

AP, July 9, 2006

An investigation into three apparent suicides at the Guantanamo Bay prison has found that other detainees may have helped the men hang themselves or were planning to kill themselves too.

DOJ_NMG_0039151

Authorities who searched other detainees' cells after the three were found hanged discovered instructions on tying knots, along with several notes in Arabic that were "relevant" to an investigation of a possible broader plot, officials said in court papers filed late Friday in Washington.

The detention center's commander, Navy Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris, said in an affidavit that investigators believe "the suicides may have been part of a larger plan or pact for more suicides that day or in the immediate future."

Authorities confiscated personal papers from nearly all 450 prisoners at Guantanamo Bay to "determine whether other suicides were planned or likely to be planned," Carol Kisthardt, the Naval Criminal Investigative Service agent in charge of the investigation, said in an affidavit.

Both affidavits were filed in support of a request for a judge to appoint a special review panel to review all the detainees' documents, which include letters from attorneys.

Lawyers for Guantanamo detainees have condemned the confiscation of the legal papers as a violation of attorney-client privilege and asked a judge to order their immediate return.

Investigators said they confiscated about 1,100 pounds of personal documents after three detainees were found hanging from their steel mesh cells before dawn on June 10 — the first reported deaths of prisoners at the prison.

Bill Goodman, legal director for the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents about 200 detainees, said Saturday that a special review panel would undermine trust between prisoners and their lawyers and delay the legal process.

"It's another roadblock," Goodman said.

The government said the panel's independence would be assured, and detainees' rights protected, by its including lawyers, law enforcement and intelligence personnel and translators who have not taken part in any legal proceedings against detainees.

The special panel, or "Filter Team," would review all the material and report any information that threatens national security or involves "imminent violence" but would not divulge anything that would violate attorney-client privilege, the government said.

Authorities took the papers after finding a note in Arabic related to the suicides in the mesh wall of the cell of one of the prisoners found hanged to death, Kisthardt wrote.

The note did not appear to be written by the prisoner, or another of the detainees who committed suicide, and it was written on paper provided by lawyers stamped with the words "Attorney-Client Privilege."

Among the papers, investigators also found a printout of an e-mail written by someone on the base that appeared to contain sensitive information about the location of cells and operations at Guantanamo, where the U.S. holds men suspected of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

Investigators also confiscated envelopes from detainees marked "Attorney-Client Privilege" but did not review the contents to see if they had any relevant information, Kisthardt wrote.

Signs Of Life In Congress (NYT)

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

Congress, which is supposed to push back against executive attempts to amass overweening power, has hardly played its proper role when it comes to George W. Bush. In the past, when evidence arose that the president had overstepped his authority, the Congressional response was generally to look for ways to make whatever Mr. Bush did retroactively legal. But the Supreme Court's decision on the Guantánamo Bay detention camp seems to have jolted even some of the most loyal Republicans back to reality. They are vowing that this time, they will not merely rubber-stamp presidential overreaching. Soon, Americans will get a sense of how seriously to take this newfound spine.

The court ruled, in a decision so strong that it sent shock waves through Washington, that Mr. Bush violated the Geneva Conventions and American law when he created commissions to try detainees outside established judicial procedure. The court rejected Mr. Bush's claim of a power to handle prisoners any way he wants and said it was up to Congress to set rules.

This week, three Congressional committees will hold hearings on the issue. The White House predictably asked Congress simply to legalize Mr. Bush's policies. But a wide range of senators rejected that and called for a serious look at the basic question: whether and how existing rules should be changed to deal with terrorists who are not in any army.

The court said the military commissions, which Vice President Dick Cheney and his team cooked up without bothering to consult military lawyers, violated the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which has rules of evidence and process similar to civilian law. Congress could simply apply the military court to the Guantánamo prisoners. But the code was created to try members of the United States armed forces and some experts make convincing arguments its use would not be appropriate for terrorist suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0039152

Still, Congress could create a new kind of military commission, operating as closely as possible to United States military law. That is the proposal of Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, one of the Senate's experts on military law, and Arlen Specter, the Judiciary Committee chairman. It sounds reasonable, as long as lawmakers resist pressure from the administration to deny the prisoners any real rights, barring them from seeing classified evidence, admitting coerced confessions, excluding prisoners from hearings and sharply limiting their lawyers' ability to defend them.

The challenge for Congress is simply to create a vehicle for giving the prisoners their day in court that contains the protections that Americans believe any human being deserves before he can be locked away in an isolated prison forever. Coerced testimony should be banned. Classified material could be safeguarded by using the current civilian court practice, in which judges review such material and decide whether to share it with defense lawyers, who are cleared in advance.

The division here is not between people who want to win the war on terror and those who for some unfathomable reason do not. It is between an executive branch that seems bent on proving that the president has unlimited power and those who believe that the Constitution and the rule of law did not crumble along with the World Trade Center.

We would not be in this mess if Mr. Bush had followed the rules. If he had allowed the screening of captives on the battlefield, which the military wanted and the Geneva Conventions require, hundreds of innocent men would never have been sent to Gitmo. If he had asked Congress to create tribunals, instead of fashioning extralegal ones, some of those prisoners who really are terrorists might have been convicted by now in full view of the world.

Senator Graham put it just right the other day. "We don't need to change who we are to win the war," he said. "We need to create a system to meet the needs of a fair trial, the rights of the accused and the defense of the nation, that the world will see as fair and the nation can be proud of."

We hope Congress follows that spirit.

Congress's Turn (WP)

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

President Bush failed to create a fair legal system for accused terrorists. Congress can do better.

PRESSED BY the Supreme Court, Congress this week at last will begin considering how to create a legal system for foreigners held at the Guantanamo Bay prison and elsewhere abroad. Depending on the course it takes, the legislature could compound the damage of the past five years -- or it could enhance America's prestige and its fight against terrorism.

Having allowed President Bush to assert extralegal powers for nearly five years, some in Congress now want to rush through legislation that would rubber-stamp the regime that the court rejected. There is talk of completing a bill by summer's end. Some Republicans appear eager to turn what ought to be a serious debate about balancing national security and human rights into an election issue -- by labeling as soft on terrorism anyone who opposes Mr. Bush's unworkable scheme for trying Guantanamo inmates.

It's somewhat encouraging, therefore, that the Armed Services Committee under the chairmanship of Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) will take the legislative lead in the Senate. Mr. Warner's committee was the source last year of the sole piece of responsible legislation on foreign detainees since 2001, the ban on cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment of prisoners authored by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.). Mr. Warner says he will conduct "intensive consultations" with Republicans and Democrats on his committee, the White House and legal experts before deciding how to proceed. His first hearing this week will feature testimony by serving and former military judge advocates general.

That's a good place to start, if only because so many in Congress seem to misunderstand the issues raised by Hamdan v. Rumsfeld -- especially its finding that all detainees are covered by Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions. Based on their public statements, a number of senators appear to believe that any application of Geneva to al-Qaeda prisoners is equivalent to giving them prisoner-of-war rights or setting requirements that go beyond U.S. law. Some claim that American servicemen have been exposed to new legal jeopardy. None of that is true.

In fact, Geneva's Common Article 3 applies to everyone caught up in a conflict, including civilians and irregular combatants. Its requirement for minimally humane treatment falls far short of POW status and is very similar to that mandated by the McCain amendment. A federal law already requires U.S. personnel to comply with Article 3; what's more, Pentagon lawyers have determined that no authorized practice in the new Army interrogation manual violates the Geneva standard. Waterboarding and other practices in the CIA's secret prisons almost certainly do, but we're told these extreme methods have been dropped since the McCain amendment passed -- as they should have been.

So there's nothing practical to be gained by gratuitously repudiating Geneva or U.S. laws that mandate compliance with it -- and much that would be lost. To do so would effectively repeal the standard Congress adopted for prisoner treatment last year, and it would send a message to the world that the United States rejects one of the most basic international standards of human rights. Ideally, Congress should spell out what U.S. compliance with Common Article 3 should mean for prisoner treatment, or it should require the administration to publish its own guidance. But no action is better than gutting this basic standard.

As for trials, Article 3 requires simply that they be carried out by "a regularly constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples." The Supreme Court found that the Bush administration's plan for military commissions did not meet this basic standard. But the standard can be met without compromising security.

One approach, as Mr. Warner has suggested, is to start with the code of military justice and its court-martial system, which fully conform with international law. Senators can then examine what changes may be necessary to accommodate trials of accused terrorists. As we have suggested, some alterations may be needed -- for example, in order to use evidence that is highly classified.

Even better would be for Congress to comprehensively bring all aspects of detention and interrogation of prisoners under law. But as Mr. Warner points out, any system Congress sets up will again be subject to review by the Supreme Court. A hasty ratification of the administration's failed scheme, or a new concoction that fails to grant detainees basic rights, may not pass muster with the court -- and certainly won't with the rest of the world.

This is the seventh editorial in an occasional series about the Bush administration's detention and treatment of foreign prisoners. The full series is available athttp://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions.

Even In Time Of War, U.S. A Nation Of Laws (SA)

San Antonio Express News, July 9, 2006

Civil liberties groups see in the Supreme Court's ruling in Hamdan vs. Rumsfeld a clear rebuke to a president who has overstepped his constitutional authority.

Advocates for executive power in the war on terror will, at the same time, find in it some vindication.

On one key issue, five justices agree that the military tribunals established by the Bush administration to try accused terrorists held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, are unlawful. On another key issue, the justices do not challenge the president's authority to hold enemy combatants.

Legal scholars will pore over the 185-page ruling — with six different opinions, three of them dissenting — for a long time to come. The immediate result is that Camp Delta will remain in business while the White House and Congress construct a process within the scope of military justice that meets the legal requirements described by the court.

The more long-standing principle at the heart of the complicated decision is this: Even in times of war, the United States is a nation of laws. When those laws are ill-suited to the conflict at hand, the commander in chief can work with Congress and the courts to modify them or create new laws. He may not simply ignore them.

Americans have struggled to find the right balance between security and civil liberties in the war on terror. In the aftermath of Sept. 11, 2001, the pendulum swung too far in the direction of security. The Hamdan decision is the latest effort to restore a new equilibrium in this contentious debate.

"To the extent that there is latitude to work with the Congress to determine whether or not the military tribunals will be an avenue in which to give people their day in court," President Bush said following the court's decision, "we will do so."

It's reassuring to hear those words now. It would have been better for the nation had the president arrived at that conclusion at an earlier date.

German Man Held As Liaison Suspect For 9/11 Associate (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times/AP, July 9, 2006

BERLIN, July 8 (AP) — A German citizen of Moroccan descent has been arrested in Hamburg on suspicion that he is a member of Al Qaeda with contacts to a man close to the Sept. 11 hijackers, federal prosecutors said Saturday.

A man identified only as Redouane E. H., 36, of Kiel, was arrested Thursday on suspicion of supporting a foreign terrorist organization, a spokeswoman for the prosecutor's office, Frauke Scheuten, said Saturday.

He is suspected of being in contact with Said Bahaji, who had close ties to the three Sept. 11 hijackers who lived and studied in Hamburg — Mohamed Atta, Marwan al-Shehhi and Ziad al-Jarrah, Ms. Scheuten said. Mr. Bahaji is suspected of providing logistical support for the Hamburg cell but fled before the attacks and is thought to be in Pakistan. Ms. Scheuten said there was no evidence of direct contact between Redouane E. H. and the hijackers.

DOJ_NMG_0039154

"The accused had numerous contacts with the international network of violent jihadis, among other places in Syria, Algeria and Iraq," she said. "He is seriously suspected of supporting the Al Qaeda foreign terrorist network through recruiting fighters for suicide attacks in Iraq and through financial payments."

The arrest was made after gathering information largely drawn from monitoring the suspect's conversations in online chat rooms, Ms. Scheuten said.

Mr. Bahaji has relatives in Hamburg, including a wife, and authorities have previously said they had intercepted e-mail from him.

Prosecutors said that Redouane E. H. served "as an intermediary for messages between the separately pursued Said Bahaji and his wife."

Yemen Acquits 19 Suspected Al-Qaida Members (AP)

By Ahmed Al-haj

AP, July 9, 2006

Nineteen alleged al-Qaida members accused of plotting to assassinate Westerners and blow up a hotel used by Americans were acquitted Saturday by a judge who also exonerated some of fighting U.S. troops in Iraq.

The accused denied many of the charges, but some had confessed to fighting U.S. troops in Iraq, and had Iraqi stamps in their passports.

"This does not violate (Yemeni) law," presiding judge Ahmed al-Baadani said. "Islamic sharia law permits jihad against occupiers."

The 14 Yemenis and five Saudis were accused of forming a gang to assassinate Americans and Westerners in Yemen, and of joining the so-called holy war against the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq.

One defendant testified he had returned home to perpetrate jihad against Americans in Yemen, a U.S. ally and the ancestral homeland of Osama bin Laden.

But the prosecution failed to provide "adequate evidence that the defendants were plotting attacks against foreigners or planning to assassinate Americans in Yemen," al-Baadani said.

The defendants greeted the verdict with cries of "God is Great!" from behind the bars of a cage in the courtroom.

Mohammed al-Maqaleh, an expert in Islamist affairs who frequently appears in the Yemeni media, described the verdict as a "shock" and a sign that President Ali Abdullah Saleh was trying to drum up support from Muslim radicals ahead of the coming presidential elections.

Yemen, long regarded as a haven for al-Qaida, was the scene of the October 2000 suicide bombing against the USS Cole that killed 17 American sailors. But the country allied itself with the United States after Sept. 11 and waged a crackdown on militants.

Saleh nonetheless has long-standing ties with Islamic militants, who have stood by the administration since the 1980s.

"This (verdict) is a change for the judiciary in Yemen," said Ali al-Kurdi, one of the defendants, who spent three years in Afghanistan in the 1990s. "It is fair, something unusual."

Al-Kurdi was charged with being linked to al-Qaida.

The defendants were arrested in early 2005 and accused of having contact with al-Qaida in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and receiving directions from him to attack a Western-owned hotel in the Yemeni city of Aden. Al-Zarqawi was killed June 7 in a U.S. airstrike in Iraq.

Saleh's announcement that he will again run for president broke earlier promises to step down after 28 years at the helm of this impoverished Arab nation.

Five Yemeni opposition parties have chosen Faisal bin Shamlan, a former oil industry executive to challenge him. Bin Shamlan has spoken out against al-Qaida and denounced corruption.

US Extends Condolences On British Bombing Anniversary (AFP)

AFP, July 9, 2006

The United States has expressed sorrow and solidarity with Britons in memory of the 52 people killed in London bombings a year ago, a day after the grim anniversary.

"They had started their day like many others with breakfast with their families, and preparations for work and school. While they left their homes like any other day on July 7, they did not return," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in a statement.

"Fifty-two families suddenly lost a wife, a husband, a parent, a child. On the anniversary of their death we again mourn their loss and extend our condolences to their families," Rice said.

DOJ_NMG_0039155

She recalled the United States shares with the people of Britain "a deep bond of friendship that has stood the test of time."

"Their loss is our loss, their struggles are our struggles.

"While we mourn those who were killed last July 7, we will honor their memory by continuing to work together to defeat terrorism and ensure that all those who would do harm to the innocent are brought to justice."

Britain observed two minutes of silence Friday in memory of the 52 people who died when four British Muslim suicide bombers, with explosives packed into rucksacks, blew themselves up inside three packed London underground trains and a double-decker bus on July 7, 2005.

It was the worst-ever terrorist attack on British soil, as well as Europe's first experience with a suicide bombing.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Recent Arrests In Terror Plots Yield Debate On Pre-emptive Action By Government (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 8 — In Miami last month and now in New York, terror cases have unfolded in which suspects have been apprehended before they lined up the intended weapons and the necessary financing or figured out other central details necessary to carry out their plots.

For officials in Washington, it is a demonstration of the much-needed emphasis in this post-9/11 era for pre-emptive arrests.

"We don't wait until someone has lit the fuse to step in," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Friday at a news conference about the New York plot.

But the Miami and New York cases are inspiring a new round of skepticism from some lawyers who are openly questioning whether the government, in its zeal to stop terrorism, is forgetting an element central to any case: the actual intent to commit a crime.

"Talk without any kind of an action means nothing," said Martin R. Stolar, a New York defense lawyer. "You start to criminalize people who are not really criminals."

In the two most recent plots, the authorities have simultaneously warned that the suspects were contemplating horrific attacks — blowing up the Sears Tower in Chicago and setting off a bomb in a tunnel between New York and New Jersey — but then added that as far as they knew, no one was close to actually making such a strike.

In the Miami case, an F.B.I. official said at a recent hearing that the suspects apparently did not have written information on how to make explosives, details on the layout of the Sears Tower or any known link to a terrorist group.

In New York, officials said Friday that none of the eight suspects believed to be planning the tunnel attack were in the United States, and that they apparently did not have bomb materials and had not completed reconnaissance work on their supposed target.

The arrest on April 27 in Beirut of Assem Hammoud, 31, a Lebanese man who is accused of being the mastermind of the tunnel plot, came after the authorities monitored Internet chat rooms used by Islamic extremists who had used coded language to discuss a possible attack. One American official said the members of the group had never met one another.

In announcing the case, federal officials, including Mr. Chertoff, said the government could not waste time trying to determine whether the suspects were smart enough or serious enough to turn their threats into destructive action.

"It is a mistake to assume that the only terrorist that's a serious terrorist is the kind of guy you see on television, that's a kind of James Bond type," Mr. Chertoff said Friday. "The fact of the matter is mixing a bomb in a bathtub does not take rocket science."

Representative Peter T. King, a New York Republican and the chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security, said that the cases also demonstrate that the authorities cannot always delay charges until they have built airtight criminal cases.

"It was essential that the F.B.I. get rid of its pre-9/11 mentality of not making an arrest until they have enough evidence to convict," Mr. King said Friday in an interview. "You can't be locking everyone up. But so long as there are reasonable grounds to make the arrest, they should do that."

Mark J. Mershon, an F.B.I. assistant director, said that the apprehensions related to the New York case — so far no one has been arrested in the United States — began after the authorities were convinced that the talk was close to turning into action.

"Plotting for this attack had matured to a point where it appeared that the individuals were about to move forward," Mr. Mershon said Friday in New York.

"They were about to go to a phase where they would attempt to surveil targets, establish a regimen of attack and acquire the resources necessary to effectuate the attacks."

Carl W. Tobias, a law professor at University of Richmond in Virginia who tracks terrorism cases, said the modest evidence disclosed so far in some recent cases in relation to the ability of the suspects to deliver on their threats has caused him to wonder if politics might be a factor.

"There is some kind of public relations gained by making Americans on the one hand feel concerned that the Sears Tower in Chicago or some tunnel in Manhattan is targeted yet on the other hand feel comforted that the government is on top of it," he said.

The questions posed about some of the terror-related arrests echo doubts raised when Tom Ridge was secretary of homeland security and the Bush administration half a dozen times raised the color-coded alert warning to orange, signaling a high risk of a terrorist attack, leading skeptics to suggest the up-and-down warning levels may have been driven in part by politics.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks, according to a Justice Department tally, 261 defendants have been convicted or have pleaded guilty in terrorism or terrorism-related cases. But many of those cases have only remote connections to actual terrorism plots, like the case involving six men from Lackawanna, N.Y., who pleaded guilty to attending a terrorist training camp, but never actually took part in a terror plot.

But Pasquale J. D'Amuro, former assistant director in charge of the F.B.I. office in New York, said that law enforcement officials have no choice but to act pre-emptively, even if planning has not yet turned into an active plot.

"When they go operational, they run silent," Mr. D'Amuro said. "It becomes very difficult to follow them and try to trail them."

Mr. Chertoff acknowledged the debate on Friday, saying he had heard criticism by some that "the people you are arresting are not really serious or they don't really have the capacity of actually carrying something out."

But he said that the lesson not only of Sept. 11, but of terrorist attacks since then, including bombings last year in London, is that the government has no other choice. That means, he said, acting sooner rather than later, even if it might result in skeptics suggesting the plots were more imaginary than real.

"We are dangerously putting people at risk if somehow we believe that only criminal masterminds or terrorist masterminds are a threat," he said.

Terror Suspects Plotted Against Brooklyn Bridge, Other Landmarks, Officials Say (NSDY)

By Mohamad Bazzi

Long Island Newsday, July 9, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon -- Before Assem Hammoud and his associates decided to try to bomb New York's PATH trains, they had considered several other targets: the Brooklyn Bridge, the Golden Gate Bridge and the forests of California, where they would set a huge fire, Lebanese security officials told Newsday.

They eventually settled on the tunnels under the Hudson River, plotting to send suicide bombers to kill thousands of commuters and devastate the U.S. economy, according to two security officials who spoke yesterday on the condition on anonymity.

"They studied different possibilities and they decided to move ahead with an attack on the train tunnels," one official said. "They thought that would be the most viable plan."

Lebanese investigators found maps and other information about the two bridges and California forests when they raided Hammoud's home in Beirut after his arrest on April 27, the official said.

Hammoud, 31, is the alleged mastermind of the plot by eight al-Qaida followers scattered across six countries. He is being held in Lebanon. U.S. and Lebanese officials unraveled the plan by monitoring Internet chat rooms used by Islamic extremists -- long before any of the suspects tried to secure financing or explosives. None had even visited the United States.

U.S. officials said Friday that two other plotters were in custody but refused to say where. The Lebanese officials said that Hammoud was in contact with militants in Iran, Syria, Pakistan, Denmark and Canada, and that the other suspects are in those countries. The five plotters still at large are a Saudi, a Yemeni, a Palestinian, a Jordanian and an Iranian Kurd, according to the officials.

Although Lebanese and U.S. authorities said Hammoud was an al-Qaida operative who had sworn allegiance to Osama bin Laden, they did not outline his alleged ties to that group -- or its leaders -- when they first announced his arrest on Friday. That led some analysts to speculate that Hammoud was part of a new trend in global terrorism: small, localized cells that don't necessarily take orders from bin Laden or other al-Qaida leaders.

"This is the lone wolf phenomenon, where a small band of like-minded extremists decide to take action on their own," said Diaa Rashwan, a leading expert on Islamic militancy at the al-Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo. "They might draw inspiration from al-Qaida and bin Laden, but they might not be following direct orders."

The security officials told Newsday that Hammoud had contact with at least two of 13 men who were arrested by Lebanese authorities in December for belonging to al-Qaida and planning attacks from Lebanon. The officials said Hammoud was in touch with Hassan Nabaat, a Lebanese, and Hany Shanti, who has both Lebanese and Jordanian nationalities. But Lebanese officials have provided few details about those arrested, their relationship to al-Qaida and what attacks they were plotting.

Investigators moved to arrest Hammoud in late April -- after keeping him under surveillance for three months -- because they concluded that he had obtained a visa to Pakistan and was getting ready to leave. After his arrest, the officials said, he confessed he was to undergo four months of training in Pakistan at an al-Qaida-linked camp.

The officials said Hammoud also had applied for a tourist visa at the Canadian Embassy in Beirut. He had traveled several times to Canada and studied business administration at a university in Montreal in the mid-1990s. Once he entered Canada this time, an official said, Hammoud planned to go to the United States and organize the train attacks in October or November.

The son of a wealthy Sunni Muslim family from Beirut, Hammoud taught economics and management at Lebanese International University, a private college. He is fluent in Arabic, English, French and German, relatives said.

In militant chat rooms, he was instructed not to grow a beard, wear Islamic clothing or show any outward sign of religious devotion. He was told to act like a typical Lebanese young man so he could avoid suspicions.

Hammoud did not disappoint his militant handlers, living a fast life in Beirut, according to his family and Lebanese officials. He frequently went out to nightclubs and cafes. He traveled around the Middle East, Europe and Canada. He drank and dated women. He even drove a red sports car -- an MG convertible.

Before his arrest, he was planning to take part in a car race this summer, according to his mother, Nabila Qotb, 58. In an interview at the family's home in an upscale Beirut neighborhood, she insisted her son had no connection to al-Qaida or any militant group.

"He's very well educated. He speaks several languages. He likes to enjoy life, to go out and play sports," she said, sitting in a living room with flower print couches. "Why are people making these accusations against him? My son is innocent. ... I'm certain that he has no connection to al-Qaida. Absolutely none at all."

Activists Cited For Protest Near NSA (WT/AP)

By Ben Nuckols

The Washington Times/AP, July 9, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Thirteen anti-war activists were given citations yesterday for protesting outside the National Security Agency headquarters at Fort Meade.

An agency security officer cited the activists for "entering into military facility for purposes prohibited by law" and ordered them to leave the area, protest organizers and an agency spokesman said. They were ordered to appear in U.S. District Court in Baltimore to be arraigned at a date to be announced.

Twenty-five persons participated in the protest, but only 13 who refused to stop carrying signs were cited, said Max Obuszewski, one of those cited and a member of the group Pledge of Resistance -- Baltimore. They carried a banner reading "NSA = Crime Scene" and other signs protesting the agency's involvement in the war in Iraq.

The activists were stopped on a public road near the entrance to the agency that provides access to two museums that are open to the public, Mr. Obuszewski said.

"We were on, I would argue, public property," he said. "Anybody could go there and get gasoline. Anybody could go there and visit the two museums."

The activists were handed a document dated May 12, 2005, indicating that "protests, public speeches, marches, sit-ins, political displays, or demonstrations" were banned at Fort Meade. But Mr. Obuszewski said he had protested at the same spot a few times since that date without being cited.

"They never showed us this document before," he said. "Why were they allowing us out there before?"

Don Weber, an agency spokesman, declined to comment on that claim. Fort Meade policy specifies that protesters must submit a written request for a permit, he said.

"The requirement on Fort Meade is that they have a permit to protest," Mr. Weber said. "They did not. Although they were given a couple of opportunities not to be, they chose to be cited."

DOJ_NMG_0039158

The Pledge of Resistance -- Baltimore sent a letter last month to Lt. Gen. Keith B. Alexander, the agency's director, seeking a meeting to discuss what it called "the illegal wiretapping and wholesale collection of Americans' phone records" and "the NSA's surveillance of our group."

The organization has received no response, Mr. Obuszewski said.

Investors Lead Home Sale Boom In New Orleans (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, July 8 — In a market spurred by speculators and bargain hunters, an extraordinarily large number of houses in the flood-ravaged metropolitan area here are being sold, according to real estate analysts, who say volume and sales prices exceed levels before Hurricane Katrina.

The higher prices are largely due to an increase in value in suburban areas, many of which were not heavily flooded, or in dry areas of New Orleans. But flooded houses in the city are being bought as well, often at deep discounts of as much as $50 a square foot less than they would have sold for before the hurricane.

"We have a stronger housing market than before," said Wade R. Ragas, professor emeritus of finance at the University of New Orleans and the president of a local consulting firm, Real Property Associates.

"There is renovation activity in every ZIP code of Orleans Parish," Dr. Ragas added, "but the strongest buying activity is, in general, closest to where it did not flood or where there was under two feet of water."

Across the nine-parish region that includes New Orleans, 7,506 single-family homes were sold between January and the end of last month, compared with 6,449 in the same period last year, according to statistics from the New Orleans Metropolitan Association of Realtors and the Gulf South Real Estate Information Network. The average price so far this year is $221,244, compared with $193,097 in the same period last year.

The interest in buying, selling and renovating has been a bright spot since the last months of 2005, and has confounded some people who thought the flooding would cripple the housing market for years. But it is just one of many counterintuitive contrasts that are defining the area and making easy predictions unreliable.

Before the storm, Jennifer and Rodney Greenup lived in the Gentilly neighborhood of New Orleans, in a 1950's-era, 2,600-square-foot house with a red tile roof that they bought nine years ago for $108,000. It was appraised for nearly $240,000 before Hurricane Katrina.

But after the storm, when the levees broke, Gentilly was inundated, and the house sat in deep, murky water for weeks.

It sold after just two weeks on the market in February for $110,000. The house had been gutted and still lacks walls, floors, appliances and other standard fixtures.

"We didn't think we'd be able to get anything remotely normal when we decided to sell it," said Ms. Greenup, a pharmacist. "We just wanted to do all right and would have been happy to get 80 grand."

The buyer was a firefighter who said he had admired the house for years and planned to fix it up and live in it.

Kim and Reginald Glass are among the local investors betting on flood-ruined areas like Gentilly, which was a solidly middle-class neighborhood north of downtown toward Lake Pontchartrain. They have bought eight damaged houses for prices from $50,000 to $112,000, which Ms. Glass says probably represents about half the houses' market value before the storm.

"We had too much invested in New Orleans to walk away," said Ms. Glass, a lawyer who grew up in Gentilly. "We needed to figure out a way to stay here and make a living. So we decided to purchase properties in Gentilly. We looked to purchase any property that had potential, in hope of being able to renovate and rent. I think we're going to try the rental market, because there are so many people looking to come back."

The home the Glass family lived in had flood damage, and a house they were building on the lakeshore suffered wind damage. Undaunted, they returned to the city as early as possible, in October, and got to work.

"The biggest problem has been getting things like cabinets and appliances in," Ms. Glass said. "It's been quite an experience. But we knew that we were coming back to fight."

For-sale signs are everywhere, even in neighborhoods that feel dead, in this city of contrasts.. Some flood-ruined areas are still foul-smelling and dirty, while other neighborhoods are vibrant and clean. Some areas still have looting and other crimes, while many neighborhoods are generally safe, and tourists roam the French Quarter with drinks in hand.

Though billions of dollars in federal housing aid will begin pouring into the city this fall, there is no clear vision for renovating vast parts of the area, and some experts say speculators are taking a significant risk. In addition, there has been a 20 percent increase in the cost of construction materials, and the city continues to have a shortage of workers, experts say.

DOJ_NMG_0039159

"We don't know how things will pan out," said Ivan J. Miestchovich Jr., director of the Real Estate Market Data Center and the Center for Economic Development, both at the University of New Orleans. "There's a readjustment period right now. I think there's still a big question mark."

Amy Liu, deputy director of the Metropolitan Policy Program at the Brookings Institution in Washington, which is studying the post-storm recovery, said she was stunned by the number of houses on the market, but like Dr. Miestchovich was not sure what to make of it.

"What it means to us is that people are finally making decisions," Ms. Liu said. "If people are choosing to leave, that could be a bad thing. But if inventory is moving, then that's a good thing. To us, this is part of the natural churning that has to happen."

If much of the movement is being driven by speculators, that is not necessarily bad either, Ms. Liu said.

"If there are folks who are not financially able to clean up their homes," she said, "it is much better to have someone buy it than have it be abandoned and foreclosed."

Some sectors of the economy, of course, depend on optimism to survive, particularly real estate. Dee Luscy, president of the New Orleans Metropolitan Association of Realtors, said she thought the fear about the future was beginning to lift around the region.

"I think in the beginning people were afraid," Ms. Luscy said. "A lot of people thought, 'We'll never be able to give this stuff away.' Now we're seeing that things are selling. I think people are over the initial shock and are starting to feel O.K. about going on with life. What happened was like death. You go through stages of grief."

Vicki Shreves sold her gutted, 1,600-square-foot house in the Uptown section of New Orleans without putting up a for-sale sign. A friend of the family visited the house, on a street that had eight feet of water, "and wanted to know if we wanted to sell it," Ms. Shreves said. "It just seemed like such an easy thing, we said fine."

To Ms. Shreves, an accountant, the thought of rebuilding was depressing, and mold was a concern. But she had not decided to sell when she and her husband got the offer, which was close to $100 a square foot.

Before the storm, she said, she probably could have sold the house for $330,000. "When the storm came and obliterated it," she said, "we were happy to get $150,000."

"We got a check right there and closed the sale," she added.

Beth Amadon bought a flooded house in a neighborhood near Lake Pontchartrain for about 50 percent of its prestorm value of more than $600,000. Ms. Amadon knows what the houses are worth because she put in an offer on a different house in the same neighborhood just days before Hurricane Katrina.

"After the storm we couldn't get back to the city, so we agreed to walk away from that sale," she said. "That's how we ended up buying a different house."

In addition, Ms. Amadon sold several distressed properties that she and her husband, a real estate developer, had owned in the Tremé area near the French Quarter for about 20 percent more than they would have expected before the hurricane. The buyer was a resident who said he intended to rent the houses.

"People seem anxious to buy historically relevant houses close to the French Quarter," Ms. Amadon said. "It's been an interesting year."

Joan Farabaugh, a real estate agent in New Orleans, said she had earned as much income in the past six months as she did in all of last year.

"And I have as much business with nonflooded as flooded" houses, Ms. Farabaugh said. "Most of my sales are people who are locals, buying and fixing up."

She said she believed that her clients had faith in the future.

"They feel that what happened was unusual, and they don't feel that this will happen again," she said of the levee breaches and catastrophic flooding. "They feel they will be fine."

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Military Braces For Flurry Of Criminal Cases In Iraq (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

No American serviceman has been executed since 1961. But in the past month, new cases in Iraq have led to charges against 12 American servicemen who may face the death penalty in connection with the killing of Iraqi civilians.

DOJ_NMG_0039160

Military officials caution against seeing the cases as part of any broader pattern, noting that the incidents in question are isolated and rare. But the new charges represent an extraordinary flurry in a conflict that has had relatively few serious criminal cases so far.

As investigators complete their work, military officials say, the total of American servicemen charged with capital crimes in the new cases could grow substantially, perhaps exceeding the total of at least 16 other marines and soldiers charged with murdering Iraqis throughout the first three years of the war.

Some military officials and experts say the new crop of cases appears to arise from a confluence of two factors: an increasingly chaotic and violent war with no clear end in sight, and a newly vigilant attitude among American commanders about civilian deaths.

At least five separate incidents involving the deaths of Iraqis are under investigation, setting off the greatest outcry against American military actions since the Abu Ghraib prison scandal. By far the best known of the cases is the one in Haditha, where marines are being investigated in the killings of 24 Iraqi civilians in November. No charges have been filed in that case, but some say news of the incident may have helped bring some later cases to light.

"Unusual criminal acts raise the level of concern, whether in the military or among civilians, and with increased concern comes increased reporting," said Gary Solis, a former marine who teaches the law of war at Georgetown University.

In April, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the No. 2 American commander in Iraq, issued an order that specified for the first time that American forces must investigate any use of force against Iraqis that resulted in death, injury or property damage greater than $10,000. Maj. Todd Breasseale, a spokesman for the American command, said he knew of no clear link between General Chiarelli's order and the recent homicide investigations.

But Major Breasseale said that General Chiarelli, who took over day-to-day military operations in Iraq in January, has made clear to subordinates that he puts a high priority on avoiding and scrupulously reporting civilian casualties. American commanders in Iraq will be scrutinizing civilian deaths more intensely as the United States moves toward transferring authority to Iraqis, Major Breasseale said. Details about the five incidents under investigation are still emerging, and none of those charged have yet had an Article 32 hearing, the military's equivalent of a grand jury proceeding.

The incidents are far from the only ones in which American forces killed Iraqis. But serious criminal charges in such cases have been rare until now. In many earlier cases, the killings have been found to be justifiable, and the soldiers or marines in question have often been handled through administrative or nonjudicial processes.

The last soldier to be executed was John A. Bennett, hanged in 1961 after being convicted of the rape and attempted murder of an 11-year-old Austrian girl.

In the Iraq war, when soldiers or marines have been charged, convictions — and harsh sentences — have been rare. Of the 16 American servicemen known to have been previously charged with murder, only six were convicted or pleaded guilty to that charge, and none received the death penalty. In all, 14 service members have been convicted of any charge in connection with the deaths of Iraqis and have received sentences as varied as life in prison or dismissal from the service.

Among the new incidents, all five took place in central Iraq, in areas where the Sunni Arab insurgency is firmly entrenched despite years of effort to quell it by American and Iraqi forces. To some, that is the only thing that seems to link them.

"This is a war in which soldiers and civilians are constantly mingling, and they often don't understand each other," said Loren B. Thompson, a military analyst at the Lexington Institute. "The enemy has a conscious strategy of demoralizing U.S. forces by disorienting and confusing them. Against that backdrop, the number of alleged atrocities is quite low compared with other conflicts in the past."

In Vietnam, a much longer conflict, 95 American soldiers and 27 marines were convicted of killing noncombatants.

Some of the men under investigation in Iraq had done multiple tours in Iraq, and that, too, may have played a role.

"They can become almost numb to the killing," said Charles W. Gittins, a former marine and a lawyer who has represented marines accused of murder in Iraq. "The more you're in it, the more you want to live through it. You think more about preserving your own life than about what's the right thing to do."

In many of the cases where American troops killed Iraqi civilians, they were later found to have acted within their rules of engagement. Some of those cases became notorious, at least in the Arab world.

In Falluja in November 2004, for instance, the freelance journalist Kevin Sites filmed a Marine corporal shooting an apparently wounded and unarmed Iraqi in a mosque. The videotape generated a frenzy of negative publicity, but in May 2005 a military review cleared the corporal, stating that he had acted within the rules of engagement.

The definition of murder can be far more elusive in a war zone than in civilian life. In some previous criminal cases, soldiers or marines have claimed they acted in self-defense or carrying out mercy killings.

DOJ_NMG_0039161

Cpl. Dustin M. Berg of the Indiana National Guard, who was sentenced to 18 months in prison for killing his Iraqi police partner, said he acted because he feared his partner was going to shoot him.

In 2004, Staff Sgt. Johnny Horne said he killed a wounded 16-year-old Iraqi boy to put him out of his misery after a gun battle with Shiite militants.

Sergeant Horne pleaded guilty to unpremeditated murder and was sentenced to three years in prison, later reduced to one year.

In the heaviest penalty yet issued in the Iraq war, Sgt. Michael P. Williams was sentenced to life in prison after being convicted of premeditated murder last year in the killing of two Iraqi civilians in Baghdad. The sentence was later reduced to 25 years.

"I think there's a recognition that these are weird environments," said Eugene R. Fidell, a specialist in military law. "The danger is, carried to an extreme, that can mean throwing the law books out."

The flurry of new cases has taken on a high profile in the news media and public discussion. The barriers to conviction, though, will be formidable. Recovering credible evidence in Iraq's chaos can be very difficult, and Iraqi witnesses are open to challenge.

"There's going to be very little forensic evidence," Mr. Gittins said. "Jury members who have served in Iraq know that it is pretty common for Iraqis to lie to Americans. Also, the military pays the relatives of civilians who are killed — so they have an incentive to lie."

Some members of the military juries are likely to have served in Iraq, and are familiar with the chaotic atmosphere surrounding any decision to use force. "The presumption of innocence is going to reign supreme," Mr. Gittins said.

Haditha Probe Finds Leadership Negligent (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

The U.S. military officer overseeing the investigation into 24 civilian killings in Haditha, Iraq, has concluded that Marine leadership failed multiple times, including in pre-deployment training, in the tone set by commanders, and in how information was reported up the chain of command, defense officials said.

Army Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the No. 2 officer in Iraq, found that commanders and staff at the regimental and division levels were negligent in how they conveyed orders about how to deal with Iraqi civilians and also in how they responded to conflicting reports they received from units about the Haditha incident, the officials said.

Most of Chiarelli's "Findings and Recommendations" endorse the conclusions of an investigation led by Army Maj. Gen. Eldon A. Bargewell, the officials said. Bargewell concluded that Marine commanders should have asked more questions about how and why 15 Iraqi civilians -- the number first reported -- were killed, especially after a discrepancy emerged between the first report, that they had been killed by a roadside bomb, and a later report, that they all had died of gunshot wounds. Chiarelli told colleagues that he was stunned to learn that no investigation of the incident had been conducted even after it was evident that the facts of the matter were in dispute, an official said.

Bargewell's report also criticized the Marine Corps for letting stand a statement, released in November by one of its public affairs officers, that the Iraqis had been killed by a roadside bomb, instead of correcting the record when it was clear the statement was incorrect.

Chiarelli has long been concerned that the U.S. military was inadequately prepared to conduct an effective counterinsurgency campaign in Iraq. He also included thoughts about how better to prepare troops and commanders, the official added.

"You've got to prepare for the fight you're in today," said a second defense official, summarizing Chiarelli's findings on the military's inadequate training for counterinsurgency operations. "It's totally different" from fighting in Iraq two or three years ago, he said.

The Army, for example, tends in its training to emphasize using heavy firepower against the enemy, although classic counterinsurgency doctrine teaches that soldiers should use the minimal amount of force necessary to accomplish the mission.

Also, the Army early in Iraq tended to focus on killing or capturing insurgents, although counterinsurgency doctrine teaches that the best way to deal with an insurgent is to persuade him to change sides or to desert. Also, in contrast to a spate of cases of abuse of detainees, counterinsurgency theorists recommend treating captured fighters well, to encourage them to desert and to persuade others to give themselves up. Above all, people are seen as the prize in the war, not as its playing field.

When stacked up, Bargewell's exhaustive investigation stands more than four feet high. His report will not be released, but, later this week, Chiarelli is expected to release a redacted version of his 30-page report. On Friday, Chiarelli gave his report to

Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, but Casey is not expected to ask for major changes, the officials said.

The two generals' inquiry into the role of the Marine Corps chain of command in the incident is different from a criminal investigation being conducted by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS). That investigation involves more than 45 agents and is expected to conclude this summer, Pentagon officials have said.

No charges have been filed, but people familiar with the case say they expect charges of homicide, making a false statement and dereliction of duty, among others. Defense attorneys are expected to respond that the Marines involved were operating within the rules of engagement they had been given.

Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, a squad leader who was at Haditha, told his attorney last month that several civilians were killed last November when his squad went after insurgents who were firing at them from inside a house after a Marine convoy was hit by a roadside bomb. Wuterich said there was no vengeful massacre, even though women and children were killed. He instead described a house-to-house hunt that went awry on a chaotic battlefield.

"It will forever be his position that everything they did that day was following their rules of engagement and to protect the lives of Marines," Neal A. Puckett, who represents Wuterich, said then.

NCIS is investigating members of Kilo Company of the 3rd Battalion of the 1st Marine Regiment, based at Camp Pendleton, Calif. While in Iraq, the battalion was attached to the 2nd Marine Division based at Camp Lejeune, N.C. Chiarelli blames Gen. Richard A. Huck, who then commanded that division, for leadership failure, the official said. Huck recently retired from the Marines and could not be reached for comment yesterday.

The Bargewell investigation began in January after a Time magazine reporter began asking questions about the Haditha incident. Time's report appeared in March. A few weeks later, Lt. Col. Jeffrey R. Chessani was relieved of command of the 3rd Battalion of the 1st Marines, Kilo Company's parent unit. Two subordinates also were removed. The Marines did not specify why the actions were taken, beyond saying that the officers had lost their superiors' confidence.

But Haditha did not become a major issue until May, when Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), who had turned sharply against the Iraq war, said at a news conference that Marines had "killed innocent civilians in cold blood." Murtha is a former Marine and had been briefed by a senior Marine officer on the probe.

Spokesmen for the Marine Corps and for the Central Command, which oversees U.S. military operations in Iraq and the rest of the Middle East, declined to comment. Some of the details of Chiarelli's findings were reported Friday night by CBS News and the New York Times.

U.S. Seeks To Exhume Iraqi Girl's Remains (AP)

By Ryan Lenz

AP, July 9, 2006

U.S. investigators have asked Iraqi authorities to help them navigate cultural sensitivities to exhume the body of a teenager allegedly raped and murdered with her family by American soldiers, a military official said Saturday.

U.S. Maj. Mark Wright said U.S. authorities are aware that Islamic tradition has strict rules governing exhumation and could require religious leaders to become involved in the investigation.

"You want to be aware of these cultural issues while at the same time making sure that the accused receives proper justice," Wright, a spokesman for the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq, told The Associated Press.

Muslim tradition generally frowns on exhumations, considering them desecration of the remains.

However, Ahmed Taha, the uncle of the dead teen, told AP Thursday that relatives were eager to cooperate with investigators and would allow them to exhume the body of the alleged rape victim, Abeer Qassim Hamza. Her parents and sister were also slain.

Ex-soldier Steven D. Green was arrested last week in North Carolina and has pleaded not guilty to one count of rape and four counts of murder.

Four soldiers from the 1st Battalion, 502nd Infantry Regiment have been taken to a U.S. military camp in Baghdad for questioning, Wright said. He would not say if those soldiers had been arrested, but another U.S. official said Saturday that several more soldiers would soon be charged. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing.

Based on interviews and records, the U.S. military now believes the woman who Green is accused of raping and killing was between the ages of 14 and 20, Army spokesman Paul Boyce said Friday. While the military initially said she was 20, Boyce said he has seen documents that indicate she could have been about 14.

Wright said officials are also considering whether certain parts of a standard Western autopsy would be taboo in Iraq and if a religious leader or family members should be present to ensure cultural barriers are not crossed.

DOJ_NMG_0039163

He said U.S. military commanders in Iraq are working with the family's relatives to expedite the investigation, but that it was not immediately clear whether Iraqis or Americans would have custody of the woman's remains.

U.S. officials are concerned that the alleged rape-slaying, which occurred March 12 near Mahmoudiya, south of Baghdad, will strain relations with the new U.S.-backed government and increase calls for changes in the agreement that exempts American soldiers from prosecution in Iraqi courts.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has demanded an independent investigation into the case, which followed a series of allegations that U.S. troops killed and mistreated Iraqi civilians.

According to an FBI affidavit, Green and at least two others targeted the teenager and her family for a week before the attack, which wasn't revealed until witnesses came forward in late June.

The soldiers drank alcohol, abandoned their checkpoint, changed clothes to avoid detection and headed to the victims' house, about 200 yards from a U.S. military checkpoint in the so-called "Triangle of Death", a Sunni Arab area south of Baghdad known for its violence, the affidavit said.

In the week since the allegations came to light, the military has remained tightlipped even amid growing cries by Iraqi leaders for a fair investigation.

President Bush, speaking on CNN's "Larry King Live" last Thursday, said the Iraqis should understand that the allegations will be handled "in a very transparent upfront way."

"People will be held to account if these charges are true," Bush said.

In the chow halls and barracks, many soldiers remain convinced that the alleged rape and killings in Mahmoudiya were aberrations and that most American service members respect the rules of war.

"These crimes are against all the Army values, so if you don't have any of those values, you shouldn't even call yourself a soldier," said Staff Sgt. Ahmand Brown, 28, of Flint, Mich.

In the aftermath of claims that Marines killed civilians in the western town of Haditha in November, the U.S. military in Iraq ordered all personnel to undergo values training.

The Army has also paid greater attention to its rules of engagements, which determine when a soldier can use deadly force. But a bad soldier is a bad soldier, no matter the training, Brown said.

Green, who served 11 months with the 101st Airborne Division, based at Fort Campbell, Ky., received an honorable discharge and left the army in mid-May. He was discharged because of an "anti-social personality disorder," according to military officials and court documents.

But even before the rape-murder allegation surfaced, the military was investigating an incident in which three soldiers from the same battalion were killed by insurgents near Youssifiyah. Two of them apparently were abducted and slain, with their bodies mutilated.

U.S. officials insist they have no evidence that the incidents are related.

Marines Getting A New Message (LAT)

By Tony Perry And T. Christian Miller

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

SAN DIEGO — Even before the investigation of the killing of 24 civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha is complete, the Marine Corps has taken action, stressing accountability and sternly reminding officers that they must investigate all civilian deaths.

The investigative report, by an Army general, will be highly critical of officers for not investigating the Nov. 19 incident in which Marines from Camp Pendleton allegedly stormed into houses and killed the occupants after a roadside bombing killed a fellow Marine.

The report will also recommend that the Marine Corps change its training to remind troops that the rules for dealing with insurgencies are different from those for classic battles such as the assault on Baghdad in 2003 and the operations in the Sunni Triangle in 2004.

The Corps has anticipated the criticism, government officials close to the inquiry say.

"The word has gone out very clearly: When a civilian is killed, officers need to know how and why, and they need to get that information to the highest levels as quickly as possible," said an official who declined to be identified.

Training at Camp Pendleton, Twentynine Palms and other bases has been altered to emphasize restraint in the use of deadly force when civilians are involved.

In late May, Marine Commandant Gen. Michael Hagee went to Iraq to remind Marines of the international rules of warfare that call for protection of noncombatants.

DOJ_NMG_0039164

And Lt. Gen. James N. Mattis, who led Marines into Iraq in 2003 and during the April 2004 fight in Fallouja, recently returned from an unpublicized two-week trip to Iraq to talk to Marines.

Bing West, a former assistant Defense secretary and author of two books about the Marines in Iraq, said that Mattis had made it "crystal clear": "If shot at from a crowd of civilians, a Marine is not to fire back and endanger women and children."

Former Marine Col. Thomas X. Hammes, an expert on insurgent warfare, said a lack of accountability in cases involving the mistreatment of civilians by U.S. personnel — particularly at the Abu Ghraib prison — helped fuel the insurgency by creating a source of frustration among ordinary Iraqis.

He praised efforts to promote greater accountability among senior officers, saying it would help fight the war in Iraq.

"To date, we've been very, very poor at holding our people accountable," Hammes said. "Anything that … emphasizes the responsibility up the chain of command is a positive step. It certainly will help our troops on the ground."

The investigative report was done by Army Maj. Gen. Eldon Bargewell and reviewed by Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli.

Chiarelli's office said Friday that the report would next be sent to Army Gen. George W. Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq. Finally, the report will be sent to Marine Lt. Gen. John F. Sattler, commanding general of the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force at Camp Pendleton.

Sattler, or his successor, will use that report, and an investigation by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, to determine whether any of a dozen Marines with the 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division, should face criminal charges. Sattler is set to be relieved this summer by Mattis.

Investigators have concluded that some of the Marines should face murder charges and that the killings were unprovoked and outside the international rules of warfare. Defense attorneys insist that the Marines were acting within the rules of engagement laid down by their officers.

The Army report is known to be critical of top officers in the 2nd Marine Division for failing to see "red flags" that should have made them question the report from ground troops. The military began an investigation only after Time magazine uncovered evidence disputing the Marines' original account of the killings.

Although the troops are with the 1st Marine Division based at Camp Pendleton, they were accountable to officers with the 2nd Regiment of the 2nd Marine Division, based at Camp Lejeune, N.C.

Two top officers in the chain of command during the Haditha incident were replaced last month, though officials said both changes had been scheduled before the controversy.

Maj. Gen. Richard Huck, commanding officer of the 2nd Marine Division, announced his retirement. And Col. Stephen Davis, commander of the second 2nd Regiment, was replaced and reassigned.

After the troops involved in the Haditha incident returned to Camp Pendleton, the commanding general of the 1st Marine Division relieved the battalion commander and company commander after losing "confidence in their leadership."

Said one Marine officer with extensive experience in Iraq, "No question, this hasn't been the Marine Corps' finest hour. But I think everybody is locked on to seeing that it never happens again."

Perry reported from San Diego and Miller from Washington.

Rules Of War Of Value To Soldiers (AP)

By Robert Tanner

AP, July 9, 2006

Whether it's firing a rifle from 100 feet away or directing a bombing raid from a mile or more in the air, the military objective is the same: Kill the enemy.

Troops get instruction in deadly skills from the first time they put on a uniform.

But there's another lesson they're taught, one that's rooted in philosophy and old-fashioned values like honor and courage. Call it the morality of war: how to kill, but not murder.

At a time when a flurry of criminal allegations have been raised against U.S. troops — charges or investigations in five separate cases alleging they gunned down unarmed Iraqis or detainees — military personnel and their instructors insist ethics training is both vital and vibrant.

This is how it breaks down for Tim Coderre, a sniper with the National Guard who spent more than five months in a frontline operation in Iraq amid heavy fighting: "I'm not a warmonger. But I understand my job. ... My job is to be ferocious in combat, to be a killer. I'm sorry, but that's war."

Coderre was a Marine for eight years before returning to civilian life in North Carolina. He joined the Guard after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and went to Iraq in 2004. "I don't apologize," he said. "I'm very proud of the number of confirmed kills I had."

DOJ_NMG_0039165

Killing from a distance, he shot only those who he judged were enemy insurgents. The rules of war — no targeting civilians, no killing prisoners — were ingrained, he said, despite his revulsion for the insurgents and their tactics, such as beheading prisoners.

"I could never do that to them," he said. "I hate insurgents, but I could never do that to them."

At West Point, moral training is at the heart of the enterprise, said retired Army Col. Don Snider, a professor of political science.

Classes teach philosophy, logic and the history of war, emphasizing the right conduct and the unacceptable, like My Lai in Vietnam, where American troops killed about 300 villagers, or the French experience in Algeria, where commanders turned to torture to fight rebels.

"Normally, the right (choice) is harder than the wrong, or there is no clear right and wrong. In many cases, soldiers are choosing between two wrongs, because both have morally ambiguous outcomes," he said. An example: A unit takes fire from a village, with no target in sight. Should the troops fire back, with the likelihood of civilian casualties? Retreat?

Each choice has moral consequences, he said.

Among the latest accusations, the charge that a group of soldiers raped an Iraqi woman and killed her and her family would — if proved true — clearly fall outside the bounds of military and civilian law. In others cases, in which villagers and detainees were killed, defense attorneys say troops in danger made difficult choices but followed the rules of war.

At the U.S. Naval Academy, a class called "The Code of the Warrior" examines warrior cultures, looking at the ancient Greeks, the Vikings, American Indian tribes, the Japanese samurai and others.

Shannon French, an associate professor of philosophy, aims to distill the essence of warrior values and the reasons they matter so much.

"It's so vital. Those rules are there to keep them from becoming monsters," French said. "Any time you take a human life, there is trauma, there is what we'd call moral, psychological or even spiritual damage. Nothing removes the trauma.

"But if, after the fact, you can understand the reason for the killing, and recognize how it fits in with the values you were raised with, how it isn't an affront to those values, then you can integrate that into your identity in a way that is healing."

Her students reject even the word "killer," insisting it carries a judgment that doesn't fit a warrior.

If the rules fail, French said, a great deal is at risk: hopes that your captured soldiers will be treated humanely, the chance to reconcile with the enemy when the war is over, the power to keep allies at your side and support at home.

Most important are the troops themselves, she said. At stake is their return to civilian life and sanity. The temptation to cross the line is undeniable in the chaos of battle, but so is the result.

To make the lessons real, her classes feature visits by American warriors.

In one case, a bomber pilot came to her class, bringing videos of his missions in Afghanistan. Infrared footage of targets exploding brought cheers from her class of would-be pilots.

"He paused an image, which was an infrared explosion, a larger explosion and some smaller heat signatures.

"He said, `What are the smaller heat signatures you're seeing?' They paused: 'People?' `That's right, when we hit this building, people came out. Why is that one so much hotter than the others?'"

"Then he let the image play, and that signature ran erratically. Finally, one of the students spoke up and said 'He's on fire?'" French recounted. "You could've heard a pin drop."

"My speaker turned to the class and looked them in the eye. 'That is a human being writhing in agony, and I caused that and I have to live with that," she said.

The pilot wasn't trying to frighten them out of the task ahead of them, French said. He was simply trying to force them to acknowledge the moral weight of warfare — even from a distance.

"He didn't regret what he did, but he felt for his own moral well being he did have to mourn it," she said.

For Coderre, back in civilian life as a deputy sheriff in coastal North Carolina, few can relate to his experience in war unless they've been through the same.

"That's something people really don't want to hear about. 'My God, you're happy you killed someone?'" he said.

But no apology is necessary, he said. "Yes, a soldier, a sailor, was able to go home because of me," he said.

When The Personality Disorder Wears Camouflage (NYT)

By Benedict Carey

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

WHEN a war crime doesn't look quite like a war crime — when it seems cold and deliberate like a serial murder, rather than an impulsive act of vengeance — it can be especially disturbing, as United States Army officials have learned over the past week.

DOJ_NMG_0039166

According to federal prosecutors, an Army private and several comrades attacked an Iraqi family last March, raping and killing a young woman after executing her parents and her younger sister in their home. The men disguised themselves for the attack and worked as a team, the prosecutors said. Iraqi leaders are in an uproar, as are American officials in and out of the military.

The accused ringleader, Steven D. Green, 21, who was discharged in May, pleaded not guilty after his arrest June 30, and details of the crime were still emerging last week. The Army has said it discharged Mr. Green for a "personality disorder."

Which raises a question: How does someone with a personality disorder — a significant, disabling, and dangerous condition — manage the stress of combat? Wouldn't a person with a serious mental problem drop out, or be identified and quickly discharged?

The answer, usually, is yes. People with paranoid, borderline or compulsive personality disorders, for instance, are hobbled by anxieties and delusional fears, experts say: two months of boot camp would typically be overwhelming for them. The low frequency of psychiatric breakdowns in Iraq — about 8 in 1,000 service members have been evacuated for psychiatric problems, fewer than in previous wars — suggests that few people with significant mental illness make it far in the service.

Yet the military does not perform full personality assessments on recruits unless there is some pressing reason to do so. Most anyone who has graduated from high school and avoided serious trouble with the law is qualified to enlist. And the psychological pressure recruits face during basic training is less intense than it once was, military experts say; the "shark attack" of screaming officers that used to greet fresh recruits has been tamed at some bases.

In this environment, people who have one diagnosis in particular — antisocial personality disorder — can often masquerade as bold, effective soldiers, psychiatrists argue. Antisocial behavior is characterized by reckless irresponsibility, habitual lying and an indifference to the suffering of others. In some reports Army officials have listed such a diagnosis as the reason for Mr. Green's discharge.

"These are generally rough-and-ready types who tend to be trouble makers, who have no loyalty to groups or commanders," said Dr. Michael Stone, a professor of clinical psychiatry at Columbia University, who said he could not comment directly on the Army case. He added: "But they don't have to be pushed to act ruthlessly toward enemy combatants. It comes very naturally, which can be an admirable quality. And some small percentage of them are bound to slip through the cracks."

This is especially likely if they have a measure of charisma, of superficial charm, a glib talent for telling lies, criminologists say. These are hallmark traits of what some experts call psychopathy, a potent blend of antisocial instincts and grandiosity. From 25 percent to 30 percent of people who commit deliberate crimes of violence score highly on a test called the psychopathy checklist, said Robert Hare, an emeritus professor of psychology at the University of British Columbia in Vancouver, who devised the test.

Dr. Hare said he had not reviewed the Iraq case and could not comment on it specifically. "I can say that when you have a psychopathic offender, quite often he will manipulate others, he can be a puppet-master type," he said. "Others are attracted to his sense of certainty, his sense of power, to the fact that he can do things others have trouble doing."

A person with psychopathic tendencies may appear to others as clearheaded as an elite soldier when under fire, or when on the attack. But the internal psychological reality is much different, research suggests.

In several experiments conducted in 2001 and 2002, Dr. Andy Morgan of Yale University found that Special Operations soldiers, the Army's most elite fighters, had higher levels of stress hormones in their blood than regular infantrymen when under extreme stress during training. But they also had higher levels of another hormone that is thought to be a natural relaxant. In short, Dr. Morgan concluded, the elite soldiers were very much aware of the danger and moral implications of their actions but able keep their heads, and relax quickly when the danger passed.

By contrast, the psychopath functions well under pressure because he does not feel the moral tension at all.

At a time when recruiting has become increasingly difficult, the distinctions between the cool-headed, aware soldier and the psychopath may sometimes be overlooked. Would-be enlistees who have misdemeanors and even felonies on their records can and do obtain waivers to join the military if they're seen as fit, said Beth Asch, a specialist in military manpower at the RAND Corporation.

"These people do get looked at closely, but what it means is that even though there is a recruiting standard, that standard is not rock hard, and that's how we might get people in the service who have had mental problems," or black marks on their record, she said.

The number of atrocities against civilians is still small given the large number of troops deployed in the region. But as recent events make clear, just a few soldiers cause big trouble.

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

On Jan. 18, 2005, Chris Hondros, a photographer for Getty Images embedded with the Army's 25th Infantry Division in Tall Afar, Iraq, captured the scene when a car carrying the Hassan family home in time for curfew didn't stop soon enough at the soldiers' command. They fired into the vehicle, killing Hussein and Kamila Hassan. Five of the couple's children and a young cousin were in the back seat. After Hondros's award-winning photos were published, the Hassan family's plight caught the attention of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), among others, who helped arrange for the injured Rakan, 12, to come to Boston for medical treatment. He and his younger siblings now live with their oldest sister and her husband in Mosul.

Blast Kills 3 GIs In Western Iraq (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes And Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

The troops were hunting for roadside bombs when their armored vehicle was destroyed by a massive explosive device in restive Ramadi.

RAMADI, Iraq — Three U.S. soldiers scouring the treacherous roads of western Iraq for remote-controlled explosive devices were killed by a massive roadside bomb that destroyed their heavily protected vehicle, military officials said Saturday.

In Baghdad, U.S. and Iraqi forces launched the third operation in two days targeting leaders of Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi militia.

And at least 10 Iraqi civilians were reported killed in political violence around the country.

The three soldiers were part of the U.S. Army 1st Armored Division's Task Force Dagger, which sweeps major roads in Ramadi for bombs under the command of the Marines.

They were riding in a heavily armored Cougar, a vehicle designed to withstand roadside bombs and used in minesweeping operations.

The Pentagon last year ordered 122 of the minesweeping Cougars, worth a total of $87 million, from Force Protection Inc., the Ladson, S.C., firm that makes the vehicle and its spare parts.

The Cougars "feature armor-plated V-shaped bottoms designed to deflect the upward explosive power of roadside bombs," the company's website says.

But some Marines say they believe that, since the 1st Armored Division units moved into the area, insurgents have been placing larger roadside bombs to take out the Germany-based unit's fleet of armored tanks and Bradley fighting vehicles.

Bombs assembled in makeshift factories, then planted discreetly along roadways and detonated by remote control have become Sunni Arab insurgents' weapon of choice in their three-year guerrilla war against U.S. forces and the Iraqi government.

American and Iraqi troops also have had to confront Shiite militiamen. In Saturday's operation, the troops surrounded a southeastern Baghdad mosque suspected of playing host to an Al Mahdi militia leader.

An Iraqi Defense Ministry source said the U.S. and Iraqi forces withdrew from the area shortly before midnight without detaining anyone.

Political leaders in Sadr City, a Baghdad slum, announced that they were suspending their cooperation with U.S. forces and Iraqi troops after a massive raid Friday meant to capture a militia leader there.

U.S. and Iraqi officials said the leader, a well-known crime boss nicknamed Abu Daraa, had been caught in the raid, but other officials Saturday cast doubt on the account.

Another Al Mahdi militia leader was detained Friday south of the capital.

The militia leader is suspected of involvement in kidnapping-for-ransom rings as well as death squad operations against Sunni Arabs.

Elsewhere in the capital, a car bomb explosion near a Shiite mosque killed three Iraqis and injured 12, all passersby on their way to nearby shops.

A barrage of mortar shells struck an area of houses and shops in the southern Baghdad neighborhood of Dora, killing three civilians and injuring four.

Two Iraqi civilians were killed in gunfire from an insurgent attack on a U.S. convoy near the northern city of Kirkuk.

In the southern city of Basra, gunmen killed two civilians, including one working for a cellphone company.

Barnes reported from Ramadi and Daragahi from Baghdad. Special correspondents in Basra and Kirkuk contributed to this report.

3 GIs Killed In Western Iraq Province (AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub

DOJ_NMG_0039168

AP, July 9, 2006

Three U.S. soldiers and an Iraqi woman translator were killed in separate incidents Saturday, while the country's largest Sunni Arab party appealed to authorities to end a military crackdown in Sunni villages northeast of Baghdad.

The three Americans were assigned to the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force, which has some attached Army units, and died in fighting in the western province of Anbar, the U.S. military said.

They were the first U.S. fatalities reported in Iraq since Tuesday, raising the number of U.S. personnel killed this month to eight. The average of one death a day is down sharply from a rate of more than two a day in recent months.

Iraqi police said the translator, whose name was not released, was slain in a drive-by shooting in southwestern Baghdad. She worked for the Americans but was off-duty at the time, police Capt. Maithem Abdul-Razaq said.

Interpreters and others working for the Americans have long been targeted by insurgents who accuse them of "collaborating" with "occupation forces."

In a statement Saturday, the Iraqi Islamic Party said U.S. and Iraqi troops had surrounded 15 mostly Sunni villages near Muqdadiyah, about 60 miles northeast of Baghdad, making it difficult for civilians to move around.

The statement called on Iraqi and U.S. forces to allow food and medicine to enter the villages and compensate farmers for damage to their crops.

Last week, the Iraqi military announced operations in the Muqdadiyah area after an increase in insurgent activity. The mostly farm area sits astride a highway between Baghdad and Kurdish areas to the north and is in a province where tensions are high between Shiites and Sunnis.

The Iraqi Islamic Party is headed by one of Iraq's two vice presidents, Tariq al-Hashimi, who the Americans hope can persuade disaffected fellow Sunnis to abandon the insurgency and participate in political life so the United States can begin withdrawing troops.

Two influential U.S. senators visiting Iraq said they were assured on Saturday by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, that his unity government will reach out to Sunni Arabs and crack down on Shiite militias blamed for much of the country's sectarian violence.

Sen. Jack Reed (news, bio, voting record), D-R.I., said al-Maliki told them it would be "feasible" to redeploy a small portion of U.S. troops "perhaps this year" because more Iraqi soldiers have been trained and sent into the fight.

Sen. Joseph Biden (news, bio, voting record), D-Del., said the prime minister also seems serious about encouraging insurgents to accept amnesty and rejoin the mainstream and "appears to be prepared to take concerted action against militias" blamed for rising sectarian violence.

Nevertheless, the government, which took office in May, faces a formidable task as it strives to calm sectarian tensions, cut a deal to end the insurgency and restore stability.

Iraqi police reported several killings in Baghdad on Saturday and many seemed tied to the animosities between Shiites and Sunnis.

Gunmen opened fire on a Shiite family trying to move out of a religiously mixed neighborhood for the Shiite city of Karbala. Police said five relatives were wounded in the attack in Dora, where sectarian tensions run high.

Also in Dora, gunmen in two cars stopped a vehicle on a street, forced the two passengers to get out and killed them in front of horrified bystanders, police reported.

Gunmen killed three people working in an ice cream shop in the mostly Shiite neighborhood of Nahrawan, police Lt. Fikrat Mohammed said.

Three mortar shells exploded in a mostly Shiite area of southern Baghdad, killing three people and wounding three children, police said.

A car bomb exploded in a public garage near a Shiite mosque late Saturday in the city's western Jihad district, killing two people and wounding nine and causing slight damage to the mosque, said police Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razzaq.

Police also reported finding four bodies in eastern and western Baghdad that appeared to be victims of sectarian death squads.

Gunmen in two speeding cars opened fire on a Sunni mosque in west Baghdad's Ghazaliya neighborhood. Mosque guards returned fire and the attackers fled, police Capt. Jamil Hussein said.

The incidents occurred a day after at least 17 people died in a wave of bombings and mortar attacks on mostly Sunni mosques in the Baghdad area and northern Iraq. A Sunni cleric was also kidnapped in the capital, a Sunni official said.

Sectarian violence has forced thousands of Iraqis to move to different neighborhoods or cities where their sect is predominant. The Interior Ministry estimated earlier this month that nearly 4,000 families had been forced to relocate in the Baghdad area alone.

Three US Soldiers Killed In Western Iraq Battle (AFP)

By Jay Deshmukh

AFP, July 9, 2006

Three American soldiers were killed in fighting in Al-Anbar amid reports that senior military officers could be accused of negligence in a probe into the alleged killing of 24 Iraqi civilians by US marines in the same province.

In rebel attacks at least five people were killed, while 70 suspected insurgents were arrested by the Iraqi army in an operation in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad.

The US military said it lost three soldiers in western Al-Anbar Saturday to "enemy action," pushing its losses in Iraq since the March 2003 invasion to 2,543, according to an AFP count based on Pentagon figures.

The province remains an active battleground in the fight against the insurgency, despite several US-led operations in the area since 2004.

At present the military is carrying out operations to regain control over the provincial capital of Ramadi, a stronghold of Sunni insurgents.

Meanwhile, the New York Times reported Saturday that Lieutenant General Peter Chiarelli, the number two commander of US troops in Iraq, had faulted a number of officers for "dereliction of duties" during the probe into the alleged killings of two dozen Iraqis in the town of Haditha in Anbar province.

The report, quoting an unnamed Defense Department official, said Chiarelli concluded that in the deaths, which included 10 women and children and an elderly man in a wheelchair, "senior officers failed to follow up on inaccuracies and inconsistencies in the initial reporting of the incident that should have raised questions."

It said Chiarelli faulted senior staff of the Second Marine Division, then commanded by Major General Richard Huck, and the Second Regimental Combat Team headed by Colonel Stephen Davis and "recommended unspecified disciplinary action for some officers".

If the officers are disciplined, they would be among the most senior American military personnel punished since the Iraq war began in March 2003, the report added.

On Friday the military said Chiarelli had "completed his review of the investigation conducted by Major General Eldon Bargewell into reporting, training and command climate as it related to circumstances surrounding the deaths of 24 Iraqis in Haditha on November 19, 2005."

Bargewell was asked to determine how the Haditha killings were reported up the chain of command, and to see if there had been a cover-up.

The report said Chiarelli has recommended that all American forces in Iraq must receive more counterinsurgency training, first in the United States before deploying and again in Iraq.

The US Marine Corps initially reported that 15 civilians and a marine were killed by a roadside explosion in Haditha.

But the military opened an investigation after Time magazine reported in March that witnesses, backed by a videotape of the scene, said the marines went on a rampage after a roadside explosion killed one of their comrades.

They allegedly went from house to house deliberately killing men, women and children. Five unarmed men in a taxi near the site of the bombing were also killed, according to accounts leaked to the press.

The US military has battled a series of other abuse allegations in the past few months -- the most recent being the alleged rape and murder of an Iraqi woman in March by American soldiers.

In rebel violence five people were killed and three wounded Saturday in a mortar attack in the village of Abu Dsheir, south of Baghdad, security sources said.

General Rahman al-Janabi of the Iraq army's 5th division said his forces detained 70 suspected insurgents and freed 10 hostages over the past five days in an operation in Muqdadiyah in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad.

"The objective is to clean up the area of insurgents," he said.

The Iraqi army took control of the area from US forces on Monday.

But Sunni MP Alaa Maki warned of a looming humanitarian crisis in the town, accusing the army of sealing off nearly 15 villages in the area.

"This siege signals a grave danger if it goes on much longer," he said. "The medical clinic is closed, there is no power and water. Farms have been destroyed and some homes have been used as bases."

Diyala province, part of Iraq's agricultural heartland and containing an explosive mix of Sunnis and Shiites, is one of the main fault lines in the country's ongoing sectarian violence.

It was here that militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed on June 7.

Meanwhile, at least 368 detainees were freed Saturday as part of a peace plan by Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

Sunni Politicians May Expand Boycott Over Kidnapping (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, July 8 — Sunni Arab politicians are considering withdrawing from executive offices in the Shiite-led government because militiamen have yet to free a Sunni legislator kidnapped this month, a Sunni leader said Saturday.

Adnan al-Dulaimi, a leader of the main Sunni Arab political group, which holds 44 of the 275 seats in Parliament, said the bloc would also continue its boycott of the legislature for a second week.

The boycott began after Tayseer Najah al-Mashhadani, a member of the bloc, was abducted with eight bodyguards on July 1 at a checkpoint in Baghdad while driving from her home north of the city. Members of her party say a bodyguard who escaped has described the abductors as Shiite militiamen.

Sunni politicians have long criticized the ruling Shiite political parties for supporting militias and filling the ranks of the government security forces with militiamen.

"Everything is possible," Mr. Dulaimi said in a telephone interview, addressing the possibility of a Sunni pullout from the government. "The issue needs to be studied and an agreement must be reached to arrive at a solution."

The abduction of Ms. Mashhadani has plunged the new government, approved in May and led by Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, into its first major political crisis. Before parliamentary elections last December, American officials worked hard to coax Sunni Arab politicians to participate, in the hope that political engagement would help dissipate the Sunni-led insurgency. But the Sunni Arab boycott of Parliament just weeks after the government began to operate has underscored the fragility of the ethnic and sectarian power-sharing agreement.

In the executive branch, the Sunni Arabs, who make up one-fifth of the population, hold several cabinet seats and run a handful of ministries. Tariq al-Hashemi, the leader of the Iraqi Islamic Party, to which Ms. Mashhadani belongs, is one of two vice presidents.

The Sunni Arabs, increasingly anxious over the power accrued by Iranian-backed Shiites, have temporarily withdrawn from the political process in the past. They did so during negotiations over the drafting of the permanent Constitution, after some members of the Sunni committee were assassinated. They also walked out on talks to form the new government after Shiite militiamen killed many Sunni Arabs last February after the bombing of a Shiite shrine.

When the Sunni legislators announced their boycott after Ms. Mashhadani's kidnapping, they warned that they might also resort to withdrawing cabinet members. Now, talk of that appears more serious. Mr. Dulaimi said that Sunni Arab politicians were also concerned about the ongoing attacks against Sunni mosques; on Friday, four such mosques were assaulted, he said.

An official in the Iraqi Islamic Party told reporters on Wednesday that he had received a call from one of Ms. Mashhadani's kidnappers. The man had demanded that the government release all Shiite detainees in Diyala province; that all Shiite detainees be freed from American prisons in Iraq; and that Sunni groups cease attacks against Shiite mosques, all within 72 hours.

Sunni Arab politicians have suffered other woes this week. Two members of the Iraqi Islamic Party were killed by Shiite militiamen on Thursday on the road between Baghdad and Mahmudiya, a party official, Omar al-Jubouri, said Saturday.

"The Iraqi people ask the Americans for an iron fist to crush the Sadr militia in Baghdad," Mr. Jubouri said in an interview, referring to the volatile militia commanded by the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

The American military and Iraqi troops fought Sadr militiamen early Friday in Baghdad and captured a commander.

The military said Saturday that three American marines had been killed by "enemy action" in Anbar province, the insurgent stronghold west of Baghdad.

On Saturday night, a car bomb outside a Shiite mosque in Baghdad killed at least three people.

Three mortar rounds killed at least three Iraqi civilians and wounded at least seven on Saturday, police officials said. And on Friday night, a mortar attack on a children's playing field in northern Baghdad killed four children and injured 38, the American military said.

BAGHDAD — Brutality and corruption are rampant in Iraq's police force, with abuses including the rape of female prisoners, the release of terrorism suspects in exchange for bribes, assassinations of police officers and participation in insurgent bombings, according to confidential Iraqi government documents detailing more than 400 police corruption investigations.

A recent assessment by State Department police training contractors echoes the investigative documents, concluding that strong paramilitary and insurgent influences within the force and endemic corruption have undermined public confidence in the government.

Officers also have beaten prisoners to death, been involved in kidnapping rings, sold thousands of stolen and forged Iraqi passports and passed along vital information to insurgents, the Iraqi documents allege.

The documents, which cover part of 2005 and 2006, were obtained by The Times and authenticated by current and former police officials.

The alleged offenses span dozens of police units and hundreds of officers, including beat cops, generals and police chiefs. Officers were punished in some instances, but the vast majority of cases are either under investigation or were dropped because of lack of evidence or witness testimony.

The investigative documents are the latest in a string of disturbing revelations of abuse and corruption by Iraq's Interior Ministry, a Cabinet-level agency that employs 268,610 police, immigration, facilities security and dignitary protection officers.

After the discovery in November of a secret Interior Ministry detention facility in Baghdad operated by police intelligence officials affiliated with a Shiite Muslim militia, U.S. officials declared 2006 "the year of the police." They vowed a renewed effort to expand and professionalize Iraq's civilian officer corps.

President Bush has said that the training of a competent Iraqi police force is linked to the timing of an eventual withdrawal of U.S. troops and a key element in the war in Iraq.

But U.S. officials say the renegade force in the ministry's intelligence service that ran the bunker in Baghdad's Jadiriya neighborhood continues to operate out of the Interior Ministry building's seventh floor. A senior U.S. military official in Iraq, who spoke on condition of anonymity in an interview last month, confirmed that one of the leaders of the renegade group, Mahmoud Waeli, is the "minister of intelligence for the Badr Corps" Shiite militia and a main recruiter of paramilitary elements for Interior Ministry police forces.

"We're gradually working the process to take them out of the equation," the military official said. "We developed the information. We also developed a prosecutorial case."

Bayan Jabr, a prominent Shiite, was interior minister at the time of the investigations detailed in the documents and has been accused of allowing Shiite paramilitary fighters to run rampant in the security forces.

U.S. officials interviewed for this article said the ability of Jabr's replacement, Jawad Bolani, to deal with the corruption and militia influence in the police force will be a crucial test of his leadership.

The challenges facing Bolani, a Shiite engineer who has no policing experience and entered politics for the first time after the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, are highlighted in a recent assessment by police trainers hired by the State Department. According to the report, corruption in the Interior Ministry has hampered its effectiveness and its credibility with Iraqis.

"Despite great progress and genuine commitment on the part of many ministry officials, the current climate of corruption, human rights violations and sectarian violence found in Iraq's security forces undermines public confidence," according to the document, titled "Year of the Police In-Stride Assessment, October 2005 to May 2006."

Elements of the Ministry of the Interior, or MOI, "have been co-opted by insurgents, terrorists and sectarian militias. Payroll fraud, other kinds of corruption and intimidation campaigns by insurgent and militia organizations undermine police effectiveness in key cities throughout Iraq," the report says.

The report increased tensions between the Pentagon, which runs the police training program, and the State Department, which has been pushing to expand its limited training role in Iraq, said a U.S. official who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The report strikes contradictory tones, saying that the Interior Ministry continues to improve and that its forces are on track to take over civil security from U.S. and Iraqi military elements by the end of the year, while outlining shocking problems with corruption and abuse.

"The document basically shows that Interior Ministry management has failed," the U.S. official said. "The document didn't directly address U.S. policy failures, but I guess it does show that too."

Interior Ministry officials have taken steps to "improve detainee life," the report says. "However, there are elements within the MOI which continue to abuse detainees."

Referring to Sunni Arab insurgent groups and Shiite paramilitary organizations, the report says "these groups exploit MOI forces to further insurgent, party and sectarian goals. As a result, many Iraqis do not trust the police. Divisions falling along militia lines have led to violence among police.

"MOI officials and forces are widely reported to engage in bribery, extortion and theft," the report says. "For example, there are numerous credible reports of ministry and police officials requiring payment from would-be recruits to join the police."

The report's findings are borne out in hundreds of pages of internal investigative documents.

DOJ_NMG_0039172

The documents include worksheets with hundreds of short summaries of alleged police crimes, letters referring accused officers to Iraq's anti-corruption agencies and courts, citizen complaints of police abuse and corruption, police inspector general summaries detailing financial crimes and fraudulent contracting practices and reports on alleged sympathizers of Saddam Hussein's former regime.

In crisp bureaucratic Arabic, the documents detail a police force in which abuse and death at the hands of policemen is frighteningly common.

Police officers' loyalties appear to be a major problem, with dozens of accounts of insurgent infiltration and terrorist acts committed by ministry officials.

In one case, a ring of Baghdad police officers — including a colonel, two lieutenants and a captain — were accused of stealing communications equipment for insurgents, who used the electronics for remote bomb triggers. In another case, a medic with the Interior Ministry's elite commando force in Baghdad was fired after he was accused of planting improvised explosives and conducting assassinations.

In Diyala province, where last month U.S. forces killed Abu Musab Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, investigators were looking into allegations that a police officer detonated a suicide vest in the bombing of a police station. In a separate case, a brigadier general, a colonel and a criminal judge were accused of taking bribes from a suspected terrorist.

Police officers have also organized kidnapping rings that abduct civilians for ransom — in some of the cases, the victims are police officers. Two Baghdad police commanders kidnapped a lieutenant colonel, stole his ministry car and demanded tens of thousands of dollars from the victim's family, the documents allege. In that case, the two accused, Maj. Gen. Naief Abdul Ezaq and Capt. Methaq Sebah Mahmoud, were fired and taken to court.

The abbreviated notes on the case do not make clear whether the two officers received further punishment, but the fact that the documents mention the courts being involved in the incident at all makes it stand out from the rest of the cases.

In another case, the bodyguards of a police colonel in the Zayona neighborhood of Baghdad kidnapped merchants for ransom, according to the documents. In the capital's Ghazaliya neighborhood, a lieutenant and his brother-in-law kidnapped a man and demanded a huge ransom from his family.

Abuse by police is also a common theme. The victims include citizens who tried to complain about police misbehavior, drivers who disobeyed traffic police commands and, in several cases, other police officers.

But detainees appear to be targeted most often. The U.S. military has been working with the Iraqi government to standardize detention facilities and policies, and the U.S. assessment claims that several site visits turned up no serious human rights abuses. But the ministry documents reveal a brutal detention system in which officers run hidden jails, and torture and detainee deaths are common.

The documents mention four investigations into the deaths of 15 prisoners at the hands police commando units.

In the Rusafa section of Baghdad, a predominantly Shiite area known for its strong militia presence, police tortured detainees with electricity, beatings and, in at least one case, rape, according to the internal documents. Relief was reserved for those detainees whose relatives could afford to bribe detention officers to release them.

The Wolf Brigade, a notorious commando unit, illegally detained more than 650 prisoners, according to the documents. During a mass release of Wolf Brigade prisoners last November, a Times reporter saw dozens of malnourished men among the released detainees; several were so weak that they could not walk without assistance.

Female detainees are often sexually assaulted. According to the documents, the commander of a detention center in the Karkh neighborhood of the capital raped a woman who was an alleged insurgent in August. That same month, two lieutenants tortured and raped two other female detainees.

Among the strongest reprimands — and the most outrageous corruption — detailed in the documents are the cases involving two provincial police chiefs who were removed.

Brig. Gen. Adil Molan Ghaidan, the former Diyala province police chief, was accused of drinking on the job, illegally confiscating real estate from citizens, knowingly paying ghost employees and harboring suspected terrorists. He was removed from the force about six months ago, police sources say.

Before his removal several months ago, Maj. Gen. Ahmad Mohammed Aljiboori, the former Nineveh province police chief, allegedly assigned a private army of 1,400 officers to personal security detail. According to an internal inquiry, Aljiboori claimed the force was not under the Interior Ministry's control.

The document also accuses Aljiboori of detaining 300 Iraqis for two months without charges, wasting thousands of dollars on extravagant banquets and neglecting antiterrorism efforts to focus on arresting car dealers. The document says Aljiboori confiscated most of the cars for personal gain and gave some of them away to friends as gifts.

DOJ_NMG_0039173

U.S. officials say they have known about Interior Ministry abuses for years but have done little to thwart them, choosing instead to push Iraqi leaders to solve their own problems.

"The military had been at the bunker prior to the raid in November," said the U.S. official, referring to the Jadiriya facility. "But they said nothing."

Some U.S. military leaders want American officials to have a stronger hand with the Interior Ministry, arguing that continuing corruption and militia influence are dashing any hope for a speedy American withdrawal.

Another senior military official said U.S. policy in regard to the ministry was confused and disengaged. The official, who asked not to be identified because his comments impugned his superiors, said the Pentagon and State Department had failed to coordinate their efforts and were disengaged from the Iraqi police leaders.

"They sit up there on the 11th floor of the ministry building and don't talk to the Iraqis," the official said of U.S. police trainers assigned to the Interior Ministry headquarters tower. "They say they do policy and [that] it's up to the Iraqis — well, they're just doing nothing. The MOI is the most broken ministry in Iraq."

Newsweek, July 9, 2006

One of the few women in Iraq's Army says she's proud to protect her country.

July 7, 2006 - Since she was a little girl in Sulemaniya, Shahla always wanted to be a soldier in the Iraqi Army. But women weren't allowed to fight under Saddam. So as soon as Hussein was gone in 2003, the attractive young mother put her name on the list. Shahla is now a first lieutenant. (Because of the sensitive nature of her work, Coalition officials asked that her real name not be used.)

Recently, she was handpicked by Iraq's Minister of Defense to take leadership courses at Zahko Military Training Academy in northern Kurdistan. At 35, she's a Sunni Kurd who wears dark eyeliner with her fatigues and says she lives to hunt down terrorists. She recently sat down with two visitors at Zahko, including NEWSWEEK's Sarah Childress, for a conversation in English. Excerpts:

NEWSWEEK: Why did you decide to join the Army?

Shahla: I like the army, and I like my country. I've been through many dangerous situations, but everybody must make sacrifices. It's hard, because in our community, it's very difficult for women to prove themselves in the army. You hear that the army's only for men. Before, during Saddam's time, women in the army could only be doctors. They didn't recognize their rank. Now, we see the difference. Now, they respect us. Now they call us by our ranks.

What is the training like at Zahko?

One thing I like is PT [physical training]. Not many women in the community do PT. Even if a woman is educated and gets a degree, she sits at home. But now that I've joined the army, I know it's important for women to get in physical shape.

How does your family feel about your enlistment?

I've never been in the army without family support. It's often difficult to convince families in this situation.

Are you afraid of being targeted by insurgents?

The threat isn't on me. It's on my family, and my neighbors. But we all must make sacrifices. Most of the problems we have are with people who work both sides. The terrorists are educated. They're not stupid. They have plans. They recognize our uniforms, but we don't know them. So they join the army. Sometimes they do join the units, to mark us as targets.

Is sectarianism a problem in the army?

At the beginning, no. But it's increasing. I've seen conflicts. Things happen, and you're supposed to act out against a mosque or husseiniya [another name for a Shiite mosque]. You have to, because bad people use these places for kidnapping and torture. But [a few soldiers may] refuse. We talk with them, and tell them that it's not the end of the world. It's for Iraq, for security and freedom.

What's difficult about being here?

I haven't seen my daughter, who is six, in one and a half months. It's very hard, but I do this for her, for the future. I'd like to stay in the army. It's my career. … And PT. At the start, it was so hard. I like exercises, but not running, because I smoke. They understand the situation. (Nearby American officers overhear and laugh.) It's a new thing. Before, I just walked. In the last week I've started running.

What do you like about being in the army?

We're chasing the terrorists. It makes me proud of myself. [My commanders] trust me. They trust my judgment.

Baghdad Water Plant OK But Delivery Hard (AP)

By Kim Gamel

AP, July 9, 2006

After nearly three years and $45 million, a treatment plant in northern Baghdad is pumping enough drinking water for a quarter of Baghdad's people. But the trick is getting it to them because of losses to broken pipes and scavengers.

Officials with the U.S. Agency for International Development are preparing to wrap up work in September after restoring one Saddam Hussein-era plant and building another at the Shark Dijlah water treatment facility, which serves 1.5 million people mostly in eastern Baghdad.

"We've successfully been providing water for over a year now," USAID expert Chris Serjak said during a tour Saturday, standing outside the nearly 30-year-old original plant as motors from filtration pools rumbled in the background.

Western and Iraqi reconstruction officials have pinned their hopes on U.S.-funded projects like the improvements at the plant to overcome severe shortages of water and poor sewage systems.

"Basically there is a water crisis," city spokesman Adel al-Ardawi said by telephone, blaming the shortages on a lack of electricity and violence by insurgents.

But there is more to the problem than infrastructure.

"You can build a brand new plant and pump tons of water out, but if the lines aren't there to handle it you're not getting full volume," Serjak said.

Desperate Iraqis tap into mains and use generators to pump water to their homes in several areas where water is scarce. That lessens the flow to others.

Shihab Ahmed, a 48-year-old clerk who lives in the southeastern neighborhood of New Baghdad, said he gets up about 3:30 a.m. because his faucets only run at full force for about an hour and he needs to fill plastic bottles for use throughout the day.

"This water is for cooking and drinking, after my wife boils it to purify it," he said.

Serjak said water also seeps from decayed distribution mains, and that defect can bring health problems.

"The country has broken sewer mains lying alongside broken water lines, and so you get contamination not at the treatment plant but actually at the distribution line," the 31-year-old Los Angeles native said.

He said USAID spent $13 million last year to improve water delivery in the city's crowded Shiite slum of Sadr City, where they replaced 61 miles of old, cracked asbestos pipes with new mains and provided more than 15,000 house connections.

They used local laborers to win the community's support and avoid security problems.

Serjak said the water infrastructure in Sadr City, which suffered from decades of neglect under Saddam's Sunni-dominated regime, was in particularly bad shape, with concrete pipes susceptible to cracking buried just below the surface, exposing them to traffic.

In addition, he said, "People were making a lot of illegal taps because of the growth of the area."

While authorities had looked to public works to build a new Iraq after the U.S.-led invasion, the insurgency has forced the diversion of billions of dollars to security from projects to improve water, sewage and power systems.

About $2.1 billion of the more than $4 billion initially allocated for water and sanitation projects was shifted in 2005 to address new priorities and security needs, according to the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad.

Just 49 of the originally planned water and sewer projects will be completed, and 300 of the planned 425 electrical projects will be done, according to a U.S. government audit released in late January.

Saad Salman, general manager of the Shark Dijlah plant, said it had not been attacked, but he worries constantly it could be. Security is provided by the Facility Protection Services, which was recently criticized by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki for being ineffective and having links to insurgents.

Serjak acknowledged relief officials had to scale back efforts because of spiraling costs and violence.

"When we first came in we put together a wish list," he said. "And as you go in and further define what can be done, you make tradeoffs, you make decisions. Going back to what's cost effective."

The USAID team made the decision to both build a new water plant and expand the old one at Shark Dijlah after discovering they had a head start. The U.N. Development Fund had done designs and ordered equipment for improvements to the plant before the invasion in March 2003.

Serjak said he found it more efficient to work with what is available in Iraq, where transporting equipment safely is difficult.

"There are some plants that are too far gone," he said. "But where possible, rehabilitation has been quicker and more cost effective."

L.A. Man Detained In Iraq Sues U.S. (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post/AP, July 9, 2006

Military Officials, Rumsfeld Named

LOS ANGELES, July 8 -- An aspiring Iranian American filmmaker who spent nearly two months in a prison in Iraq without being charged has sued Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and other military officials, calling the government's detention policies unconstitutional.

Cyrus Kar, 45, of Los Angeles, seeks unspecified damages and major changes in the government's detention policies overseas.

The suit was filed this week in federal court by the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California. It is the first civil case challenging detention policies in Iraq, said Mark Rosenbaum, the organization's legal director.

A phone message left for a Pentagon spokesman was not immediately returned Saturday.

When Kar was released, military officials said that he had been properly detained as "an imperative security threat" and that the matter had been handled and resolved appropriately.

"This case highlights the effectiveness of our detainee review process," spokesman Air Force Brig. Gen. Donald Alston said after Kar's release.

Kar was taken into custody in May 2005 after he visited Iraq to make a documentary film about Cyrus the Great, the Persian king who wrote the world's first human rights charter. Potential bomb parts were found in a taxi in which Kar was riding.

He was released July 10, 2005, after his family sued, accusing the federal government of violating his civil rights and holding him after the FBI cleared him of suspicion. He is a former U.S. Navy Seal, according to news reports.

The new lawsuit said his 55-day detention violated not only his civil rights, but also the Geneva Conventions and the law of nations.

"Human rights monitors note that the vast majority of the over 15,000 detainees in U.S. military custody in Iraq have never been charged, tried, provided counsel, or allowed to challenge their detention in court, and over one-fifth of them have been detained for over a year in this manner," the suit states.

Kar said that while he was imprisoned, he was at various times hooded and threatened, taunted and insulted by U.S. soldiers. One soldier slammed Kar's head into a concrete wall, the suit said.

What happened to him in Iraq was "a life-altering experience," Kar told the Los Angeles Times.

In addition to Rumsfeld, the defendants include Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., commanding general of the multinational forces in Iraq, and Maj. Gen. William H. Brandenburg, who was in charge of detainee operations in Iraq at the time of Kar's detention.

No Political Timetable For Iraq (WT)

By Jack Reed

The Washington Times, July 9, 2006

We do not need an artificial timetable for Iraq, especially not a political one, but we do need a plan from the White House on how and when we can succeed. Democrats support beginning a phased redeployment of U.S. forces from Iraq by the end of 2006.

This proposal would protect American interests and give the commander in chief flexibility to bring our troops home in a safe and timely manner. It also recognizes a strong residual U.S. force will remain in Iraq to provide training and support, and Special Forces who can seek out and kill terrorists.

The days of young American soldiers manning most Iraqi checkpoints and getting caught in the cross-fire of sectarian violence must end. That mission can, should, and must be accomplished by the Iraqis themselves.

The Senate passed a similar measure last year -- a nonelection year. Seventy-nine senators, from both sides of the aisle, joined together and urged the president to make 2006 a year of transition.

Though the Republicans backed off this commitment, it is highly likely significant numbers of U.S. troops will start redeploying from Iraq in 2006 and continue to draw down in 2007. America's top military commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, recently stated: "I'm confident we'll be able to continue to take reduction over the course of this year."

Iraqi national security adviser Mowaffak Rubaie offered a similar forecast: "Iraq's ambition is to have full control of the country by the end of 2008," Mr. Rubaie said in an op-ed article in The Washington Post. "In practice, this will mean a significant foreign troop reduction. We envisage the U.S. troop presence by year's end to be under 100,000, with most of the remaining troops to return home by the end of 2007."

It is imperative we support the Iraqi government and pay attention to what they say. Ultimately, the Iraqis will determine their country's future and whether it succeeds or fails. America's greatest chance to help Iraq become a stable nation that respects human rights, and not a harbor for terrorists, is through nonmilitary support for Iraqi reconstruction.

Several months ago, President Bush announced a proposal to develop and deploy reconstruction teams in all 18 Iraqi provinces. But today, there are still only four such teams operating in the entire country. They lack resources, personnel and meaningful support from the White House.

Unless we can fix the reconstruction, redevelopment and political mentoring process, our military efforts will buy time but not guarantee success. Americans know we need a new direction in our Iraq policy.

Democrats have offered a thoughtful plan -- tactically, strategically, politically -- that will change the course from the president's failed policy. Republicans defeated this common-sense proposal. Now they must deliver a clear road map of their own, and a plan to pay for it.

The president must level with the American people and tell them he is committing more resources to Iraq, including personnel from our State and Justice Departments and our Agency for International Development. He must also be more candid about the cost. American taxpayers have already paid $320 billion for the Iraq war, and will be forced to spend hundreds of billions more.

Our national security demands we bring Iraq to a successful conclusion as quickly as possible. The timing and placement of our military forces is the president's responsibility. He should step up and take on that responsibility, beginning today.

Our fighting men and women should not be left on the front lines of Iraq for one day longer than is absolutely necessary.

Jack Reed, Rhode Island Democrat, is a member of the U.S. Senate Armed Services Committee and is a retired United States Army captain.

The Breakup (NYT)

By Peter W. Galbraith interview Compiled By Deborah Solomon

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

Q: Your new book, "The End of Iraq: How American Incompetence Created a War Without End," argues that the Bush administration should stop insisting that Iraq can ever be a unified nation.

Iraq still exists on a map, but it no longer functions as a single country. We're trying to build national institutions right now — like the army and the police — when there is no nation.

As someone who has held various exalted government positions — you were the first U.S. ambassador to Croatia as well as a longtime Near East specialist for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee — how exactly are you defining the word "nation"?

A nation is a collection of people who share a common identity. You would expect that Kurds, Shiites and Sunnis would have their religious or ethnic identity. What they do not share is an Iraqi identity.

That point has been made countless times, but you're one of the first writers to suggest that the U.S. government totally abandon its current policy and just slice Iraq into three states.

Absolutely. A confederation of three states.

What would you call them?

How about Kurdistan, Sunnistan and Shiastan?

Catchy. What religion are the Kurds?

They are overwhelmingly Sunni Muslim.

So why do Saddam Hussein and his fellow Sunni Muslims hate them so vehemently?

Because he was a fascist in a classic sense. He believed in a master race, which was the Arabs, and that the Kurds were therefore a lesser people in this greater Arab land.

Who are the most famous Kurds?

Beyond the presidents of Iraq and Kurdistan, the most famous, historically, is Saladin, the Muslim warrior who took Jerusalem from the crusaders.

That's fascinating, considering that Saddam Hussein famously proclaimed himself the Saladin of modern times.

He wrapped himself in the mantle of Saladin, even naming his native province after him. Saladin is worshiped by the Arabs, who fudge on his ethnicity.

Before the first gulf war, you documented Saddam's genocide against the Kurds, at a time when few in the West were paying attention.

DOJ_NMG_0039177

I actually stumbled across the start of the genocide in 1987, when I traveled to Kurdistan and saw the systematic destruction of villages along the road. Later, I arranged for 14 tons of documents, including lists of people who were rounded up and massacred, to come to the U.S.

And Harvard, your alma mater, declined to house them. That wasn't very brave.

They were concerned about a possible terrorist attack on Widener Library. The documents went to the National Archives.

Aren't you a little bit old to be publishing your first book?

Even though I am a late bloomer in the book area, it's original.

You mean the book is original?

It's original that you have a 55-year-old first-time author who actually wrote it himself.

Of course, you had a great teacher — your father, John Kenneth Galbraith, the world-class economist who died in April, at the age of 97.

He had a clear mind until basically the day he died. He was very interested in this book. He actually read the first four chapters, and he liked it every much. He had some small editorial comments, which I took.

He certainly got a lot done, some 40 books including the campus classics "American Capitalism" and "The Affluent Society."

He was very disciplined in his writing. My father always said that in the fifth draft he introduced that note of spontaneity for which his writing was well known.

In other words, great books aren't written, they're rewritten.

I believe in that.

Is it true that your father coined the phrase "conventional wisdom"? That, at any rate, is the conventional wisdom.

And, in this case, the conventional wisdom is right.

Among The Ghosts: Heroes And Grand Plans (NYT)

By Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq

AT the end of a long week, I went searching for her tomb. I spoke first to the priest at the Armenian Orthodox Church, who pointed me to a cemetery down the road. I went there, and a toothless old blue-eyed lady pointed me to the next one. Then, in the quiet of a compound off clamorous Tehran Square, I found her.

Gertrude Margaret Lowthian Bell — or Miss Bell, as the Iraqis still call her — is interred in the Anglican Church's cemetery in a raised tomb. It's dried up and crumbling in the Iraqi sun. The British delegations that used to pay homage stopped coming months ago because of the danger. A ring of jasmine trees and date palms planted last year by Ahmad Chalabi's daughter, Tamara, "in recognition of Gertrude Bell's historic contribution to Iraq" are mostly dead.

"The soil is too salty," said Mansour Ali, the grave keeper, jabbing a finger at the earth.

Miss Bell, the British adventurer and diplomat, was as decisive in the creation of the modern Iraqi state as any single person. She imagined it in the ruins of the Ottoman Empire, then ending its 600-year run. The First World War was over, and the Middle East seemed as blank as a sheet of paper. The borders of the new state would be long and straight like a ruler, cutting across deserts, tribes and languages. It was a thrilling time to be alive.

"I feel at times like the Creator about the middle of the week," Miss Bell said at the time. "He must have wondered what it was going to be like, as I do."

On the other side of town lie the soldiers. The British war cemetery sits in a fenced-in field across the road from the Turkish Embassy in the Waziriya neighborhood in northern Baghdad. The gates are high and locked, but with a little persistence, an Iraqi named Jasim Koli will let you in.

Back when the British Empire reigned supreme, and refrigeration was scarce, the men who gave their lives for the Crown were buried where they fell. It took too long to ship them home. Even now, across the old realm, in places like Trincomalee, Sri Lanka and Kohima, India, the British war cemeteries are lovingly maintained, prideful reminders of a vanished world.

At the Baghdad North Gate War Cemetery, the grass in some places reaches to your chest. The chiseled faces of some of the tombstones are too worn to read. Some are toppled and crumbling. The sign at the entrance announcing a renovation, dated Nov. 20, 1997, has been worked over with a machine gun. It's a dangerous neighborhood.

Still, the work goes on. The Iraqis come out at 6 p.m., when the sun begins to cool, and hack at the tall grass with their scythes. Every couple of weeks, an Iraqi shows up to pay them.

DOJ_NMG_0039178

About 1,000 British soldiers lie together at the North Gate War Cemetery. The story of each is reduced to fit on the face of a headstone, but it is still large enough to suggest its own epic:

George Percy Wilder
Middlesex Regiment
11th July 1918 Age 38
In ever loving memory of my only child
From his sorrowing
Widowed mother

Most of those buried here were younger than Mr. Wilder by 20 years. About a dozen are unidentified: "Here Lies a Soldier of the Great War," the headstones read. "Known Unto God."

Some of the inscriptions read like bits of poetry, written in language of almost unbearable dignity. This, for example, was chiseled into a stone at the north end of the graveyard:

These here have been recovered
And interred
The bodies of
British officers and men
Who after the fall of Kut
Being prisoners
In the hands of the Turks
Perished during the march
From Kut
Or in the prison camps
Of Anatolia
These are they who came
Out of great tribulation

Behind the inscription lie about 200 graves. The British lost about 30,000 men in the Mesopotamian campaign against the Ottoman Turks and their German advisers, a sideshow to a greater catastrophe that killed 10 million. Many of those British soldiers, like those arrayed at the north end of the cemetery, died during and after the siege of Kut, some from starvation. Others died closer to Baghdad, some during combat and some, like Lt. Gen. Sir Stanley Maude, the commander of the Mesopotamia Expeditionary Force, of cholera; in his case, a year before the Great War ended. He lies in his own small temple inside the cemetery. The 30,000 British dead represent a total more than 10 times the number of Americans killed in 39 months of war here.

The marines gathered in a cement building not much larger than a garage. Most of them took a seat in one of the plastic chairs arranged for the occasion. A platoon stood off to one side, holding the battalion's flag. In the middle of the room were a fallen comrade's boots, his rifle and his helmet, arranged in a kind of headstone, and a framed photograph of a square-jawed, bespectacled young man.

"Lance Corporal Nicholas J. Whyte," the program said. "23 Jun 1984 - 21 Jun 2006."

Corporal Whyte was killed by a sniper last month while on a patrol in Ramadi. The bullet hit him in the throat and severed his spinal cord.

In all likelihood, it was not a lucky shot. Four of the 11 marines from his battalion who have been killed in Ramadi since March have been shot in a similar way in the same neighborhood. Corporal Whyte was shot in the throat. Another marine was shot through the forehead, just below the rim of his helmet. A third was shot through the heart. A fourth was shot through the collarbone. "We think it's the same guy," said Maj. Thomas Hobbs, the executive officer of the Third Battalion, Eighth Marines.

Earlier last week, after the marines moved into Ramadi General Hospital — in the same neighborhood where Corporal Whyte was killed — someone with a rifle went to work again. Within 12 hours after the marines had left, leaving behind a fledgling team of Iraqi police, a sniper had shot two of them, one through the face; he died. At last notice, the second Iraqi police officer, shot in the gut, was still hanging on.

Corporal Whyte was from Brooklyn; like the overwhelming majority of the marines in the Third Battalion, he signed up after Sept. 11, 2001. He was on his second tour in Iraq. He'd gone to Northeastern boarding schools on scholarship before graduating public high school, and his parents expected him to head to the Ivy League. In a unit of young men proud of their aggressiveness, Corporal Whyte was one of its softer touches.

"He was practically a pacifist," said one member of his platoon. "If someone gave him a hard time, he'd just let it go."

A marine with bagpipes played "Amazing Grace." The Marine chaplain said a prayer. "It is appropriate to ask this evening," he intoned, "how can we use Corporal Whyte's example to become better leaders?"

Lt. Col. Steven Neary, Corporal Whyte's battalion commander, stepped to the podium and read a verse from the marine's prayer book.

"I am not fighting to preserve the kind of world we had just before this war," he read. "If I were, I would be fighting to preserve a world that produced tyrants and dictators. The new world must be a better world than that, or it is not worth fighting for."

In the end, the colonel said, there was no explanation. "None of us can understand why he was taken from us," he said.

In the Marine tradition, the roll of his platoon was called; when it came to Corporal Whyte's name and no one answered, the platoon's leader read it aloud two more times.

With that, each of the members of weapons company, about 150 men in all, walked past Corporal Whyte's helmet, boots and rifle, paused, touched it a final time and gave a salute.

"Goodbye, brother," one of them said.

What's An Iraqi Life Worth? (WP)

By Andrew J. Bacevich

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

In Iraq, lives differ in value -- and so do deaths. In this disparity lies an important reason why the United States has botched this war.

Last November in Haditha , a squad of Marines, outraged at the loss of a comrade, is said to have run amok, avenging his death by killing two dozen innocent bystanders. And in March, U.S. soldiers in Mahmudiyah allegedly raped a young Iraqi woman and killed her along with three of her relatives -- an apparently premeditated crime for which one former U.S. soldier has been charged . These incidents are among at least five recent cases of Iraqi civilian deaths that have triggered investigations of U.S. military personnel. If the allegations prove true, Haditha and Mahmudiyah will deservedly take their place alongside Sand Creek, Samar and My Lai in the unhappy catalogue of atrocities committed by American troops.

But recall a more recent incident, in Samarra . On May 30, U.S. soldiers manning a checkpoint there opened fire on a speeding vehicle that either did not see or failed to heed their command to stop. Two women in the vehicle were shot dead. One of them, Nahiba Husayif Jassim, 35, was pregnant. The baby was also killed. The driver, Jassim's brother, had been rushing her to a hospital to give birth. No one tried to cover up the incident: U.S. military representatives issued expressions of regret.

In all likelihood, we will be learning more about Haditha and Mahmudiyah for months to come, whereas the Samarra story has already been filed away and largely forgotten. And that's the problem.

The killing at the Samarra checkpoint was not an atrocity; most likely it was an accident, a mistake. Yet plenty of evidence suggests that in Iraq such mistakes have occurred routinely, with moral and political consequences that have been too long ignored. Indeed, conscious motivation is beside the point: Any action resulting in Iraqi civilian deaths, however inadvertent, undermines the Bush administration's narrative of liberation, and swells the ranks of those resisting the U.S. presence.

Gen. Tommy Franks, who commanded U.S. forces when they entered Iraq more than three years ago, famously declared: "We don't do body counts." Franks was speaking in code. What he meant was this: The U.S. military has learned the lessons of Vietnam -- where body counts became a principal, and much derided, public measure of success -- and it has no intention of repeating that experience. Franks was not going to be one of those generals re-fighting the last war.

Unfortunately, Franks and other senior commanders had not so much learned from Vietnam as forgotten it. This disdain for counting bodies, especially those of Iraqi civilians killed in the course of U.S. operations, is among the reasons why U.S. forces find themselves in another quagmire. It's not that the United States has an aversion to all body counts. We tally every U.S. service member who falls in Iraq, and rightly so. But only in recent months have military leaders finally begun to count -- for internal use only -- some of the very large number of Iraqi noncombatants whom American bullets and bombs have killed.

DOJ_NMG_0039180

Through the war's first three years, any Iraqi venturing too close to an American convoy or checkpoint was likely to come under fire. Thousands of these "escalation of force" episodes occurred. Now, Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the commander of U.S. ground forces in Iraq, has begun to recognize the hidden cost of such an approach. "People who were on the fence or supported us" in the past "have in fact decided to strike out against us," he recently acknowledged.

In the early days of the insurgency, some U.S. commanders appeared oblivious to the possibility that excessive force might produce a backlash. They counted on the iron fist to create an atmosphere conducive to good behavior. The idea was not to distinguish between "good" and "bad" Iraqis, but to induce compliance through intimidation.

"You have to understand the Arab mind," one company commander told the New York Times, displaying all the self-assurance of Douglas MacArthur discoursing on Orientals in 1945. "The only thing they understand is force -- force, pride and saving face." Far from representing the views of a few underlings, such notions penetrated into the upper echelons of the American command. In their book "Cobra II," Michael R. Gordon and Gen. Bernard E. Trainor offer this ugly comment from a senior officer: "The only thing these sand niggers understand is force and I'm about to introduce them to it."

Such crass language, redolent with racist, ethnocentric connotations, speaks volumes. These characterizations, like the use of "gooks" during the Vietnam War, dehumanize the Iraqis and in doing so tacitly permit the otherwise impermissible. Thus, Abu Ghraib and Haditha -- and too many regretted deaths, such as that of Nahiba Husayif Jassim.

As the war enters its fourth year, how many innocent Iraqis have died at American hands, not as a result of Haditha-like massacres but because of accidents and errors? The military doesn't know and, until recently, has publicly professed no interest in knowing. Estimates range considerably, but the number almost certainly runs in the tens of thousands. Even granting the common antiwar bias of those who track the Iraqi death toll -- and granting, too, that the insurgents have far more blood on their hands -- there is no question that the number of Iraqi noncombatants killed by U.S. forces exceeds by an order of magnitude the number of U.S. troops killed in hostile action, which is now more than 2,000.

Who bears responsibility for these Iraqi deaths? The young soldiers pulling the triggers? The commanders who establish rules of engagement that privilege "force protection" over any obligation to protect innocent life? The intellectually bankrupt policymakers who sent U.S. forces into Iraq in the first place and now see no choice but to press on? The culture that, to put it mildly, has sought neither to understand nor to empathize with people in the Arab or Islamic worlds?

There are no easy answers, but one at least ought to acknowledge that in launching a war advertised as a high-minded expression of U.S. idealism, we have waded into a swamp of moral ambiguity. To assert that "stuff happens," as Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld is wont to do whenever events go awry, simply does not suffice.

Moral questions aside, the toll of Iraqi noncombatant casualties has widespread political implications. Misdirected violence alienates those we are claiming to protect. It plays into the hands of the insurgents, advancing their cause and undercutting our own. It fatally undermines the campaign to win hearts and minds, suggesting to Iraqis and Americans alike that Iraqi civilians -- and perhaps Arabs and Muslims more generally -- are expendable. Certainly, Nahiba Husayif Jassim's death helped clarify her brother's perspective on the war. "God take revenge on the Americans and those who brought them here," he declared after the incident. "They have no regard for our lives."

He was being unfair, of course. It's not that we have no regard for Iraqi lives; it's just that we have much less regard for them. The current reparations policy -- the payment offered in those instances in which U.S. forces do own up to killing an Iraq civilian -- makes the point. The insurance payout to the beneficiaries of an American soldier who dies in the line of duty is $400,000, while in the eyes of the U.S. government, a dead Iraqi civilian is reportedly worth up to $2,500 in condolence payments -- about the price of a decent plasma-screen TV.

For all the talk of Iraq being a sovereign nation, foreign occupiers are the ones deciding what an Iraqi life is worth. And although President Bush has remarked in a different context that "every human life is a precious gift of matchless value," our actions in Iraq continue to convey the impression that civilian lives aren't worth all that much.

That impression urgently needs to change. To start, the Pentagon must get over its aversion to counting all bodies. It needs to measure in painstaking detail -- and publicly -- the mayhem we are causing as a byproduct of what we call liberation. To do otherwise, to shrug off the death of Nahiba Husayif Jassim as just one of those things that happens in war, only reinforces the impression that Americans view Iraqis as less than fully human. Unless we demonstrate by our actions that we value their lives as much as the lives of our own troops, our failure is certain.

Fighting Insurgents, By The Book (WP)

By Fred Kaplan

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0039181

Two messages flutter between the lines of the Army's new field manual on counterinsurgency wars, its first document on the subject in 20 years.

One is that Pentagon planning for the Iraq war's aftermath was at least as crass, inattentive to the lessons of history, and contrary to basic political and military principles as the war's harshest critics have charged.

The other is that as a nation we may simply be ill-suited to fighting these kinds of wars.

The field manual's chief authors -- Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus and retired Lt. Col. Conrad C. Crane -- would never make these points explicitly. When Petraeus was commander of the 101st Airborne Division in Iraq, he combined combat power and community-building more astutely than any other officer. Crane, director of the U.S. Army Military History Institute, is one of the leading scholars of "irregular warfare." They both support the war's aims. And they outline their new doctrine -- or, rather, their revival of a very old doctrine -- thoughtfully and thoroughly.

Yet the undertone of this 241-page guidebook -- not yet publicly released, but obtained by Steven Aftergood and posted last week on Secrecy News , his online newsletter -- is one of grim caution.

Counterinsurgency involves rebuilding a society, keeping the population safe, boosting the local government's legitimacy, training a national army and fighting off insurgents who are trying to topple the government -- all at the same time. As the manual puts it, "The insurgent succeeds by sowing chaos and disorder anywhere; the government fails unless it maintains order everywhere."

From the first page to the last, the authors stress that these kinds of wars are "protracted by nature." They require "firm political will and extreme patience," "considerable expenditure of time and resources," and a large deployment of troops ready to greet "hand shakes or hand grenades" without mistaking one for the other.

"Successful . . . operations require Soldiers and Marines at every echelon to possess the following," the authors write. They then list a daunting set of traits: "A clear, nuanced, and empathetic appreciation of the essential nature of the conflict. . . . An understanding of the motivation, strengths, and weaknesses of the insurgent," as well as rudimentary knowledge of the local culture, behavioral norms and leadership structures. In addition, there must be "adaptive, self-aware, and intelligent leaders."

Meanwhile, one high-profile infraction can undo 100 successes. "Lose moral legitimacy, lose the war," the authors warn, noting that the French lost Algeria in part because their commanders condoned torture.

Two big questions emerge: First, can American armed forces maintain such exacting standards over a long, hazy conflict? The all-volunteer U.S. military is full of extraordinarily smart, dedicated and disciplined troops. But there are sluggards, too, and the Army has also been lowering standards lately to meet recruitment targets.

Second, can Americans maintain a long-term commitment to civil or insurgent wars at a cost of hundreds of billions of dollars and perhaps thousands of lives? The issue isn't whether we should, but whether we can -- whether the political system, with its competing demands and aversion to risk, is capable of it.

The panel of officers and experts that put together the manual had no mandate to address such questions. But one consultant on the project who spoke on the condition of anonymity told me, "If we did, we would have probably put in some caveat like: 'If the nation and its leaders are not prepared for the long, hard fight that counterinsurgency entails, they should not begin it in the first place.' "

Certainly, one cause of the missteps in Iraq was the failure of top U.S. officials to foresee that after Saddam Hussein fell, they might find themselves battling an insurgency. As recently as last November, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld was still refusing to call the enemy " insurgents ."

The manual at one point lists various practices that have proved successful and unsuccessful in past counterinsurgency campaigns. The list came from a memo written in November 2004 by Kalev Sepp, a professor at the Naval Postgraduate School who was advising Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the U.S. military commander in Iraq.

It must have been clear that U.S. forces had followed many of the unsuccessful practices, among them: "Place priority on killing and capturing the enemy, not on engaging the population; Concentrate military forces in large bases for protection; . . . Focus special operations forces primarily on raiding"; and "Ignore peacetime government processes, including legal procedures."

The manual cites other principles of counterinsurgency that the U.S. military violated:

"The more force used, the less effective it is."

"An operation that kills five insurgents is counterproductive if the collateral damage or the creation of blood feuds leads to the recruitment of fifty more."

"A defection is better than a surrender, a surrender better than a capture, and a capture better than a kill."

One page of the manual summarizes Napoleon's occupation of Spain in 1808: "Napoleon believed the conquest of Spain would be little more than a 'military promenade.' [He achieved] a rapid conventional military victory over Spain's armies but ignored the immediate requirement to provide a stable and secure environment for the people. . . . The French failed to analyze the history, culture, and motivations of the Spanish people, or to seriously consider their potential to support or hinder the achievement of French political objectives. Napoleon's cultural miscalculation resulted in a protracted struggle that lasted nearly six years and ultimately required approximately three-fifths of the French Empire's total armed strength."

No reader can miss the parallel to Rumsfeld and Iraq.

Would a smarter U.S. strategy have produced a more stable Iraq? Or were the long-suppressed sectarian feuds destined to gush forth once Hussein was removed?

A better question: Should we follow the authors' advice in the hope of waging a better counterinsurgency the next time around? Or should we give up these sorts of wars as futile and -- do what instead?

THE COSTS OF WAR (WP)

By Rachel Dry

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

The civilian death toll in Iraq is either 100,000, or 50,000, or 43,273, or, as President Bush said in December, "30,000, more or less."

Most people doing the counting say that the number is more than the president's 30,000, but hedge the total, as he did, because of the impossibility of accurately recording every fatality throughout the war-torn country.

One of the most frequently cited numbers is the total from Iraq Body Count, an organization of antiwar British researchers who've been working since 2003 on maintaining civilian death statistics. John Sloboda, co-founder of the group, said that he and his colleagues compile civilian death statistics from media reports and the Baghdad morgue, carefully documenting incidents where possible, to avoid double counting. Their current count ranges from 38,843 to 43,273, reflecting that numbers vary from report to report and that some deaths are recorded simply as "Iraqi" with no distinction made for civilians.

Late last month, the Los Angeles Times offered its own tally: at least 50,000 Iraqi deaths, mostly civilian, since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. That count is from the morgue, the Iraqi Health Ministry and other sources.

Michael E. O'Hanlon at the Brookings Institution maintains the Iraq Index, with a civilian casualty count of 20,600 to 37,200, not including deaths from crimes.

In 2004, a team of public health researchers published a study in the British medical journal the Lancet estimating a death toll based on a sample of documented deaths. It was a big, round and roundly disputed number: at least 100,000 Iraqi civilians dead in the 18 months following the invasion.

Though the Lancet study stirred up a fight over methodology, Sloboda thinks the real battle shouldn't be over how the counting is being done, but over who is doing the counting. He'd prefer that the Pentagon take charge. "We consider it a disgrace and obscenity that the world's largest superpower leaves this job to 12 unpaid volunteers."

Medical Oaths Betrayed (WP)

By Steven H. Miles

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

In November 2003, an Iraqi guard smuggled a pistol into the U.S. military prison at Abu Ghraib and gave it to a prisoner, Ameen Saeed al-Sheik. Tipped off, military police quickly began a cell-to-cell search. When they reached his cell, Sheik went for the hidden pistol; gunfire was exchanged and a sergeant was hit. According to sworn testimony, the soldiers wrestled the prisoner to the {fllig}oor and sent him to the hospital with a dislocated shoulder and shotgun wounds to his legs.

When Sheik returned to prison, he was beaten with a baton and his arms were handcuffed over his head, putting stress on his injured shoulder and leg. On a cold night, a medic, Sgt. Theresa Adams, saw Sheik naked and bleeding from a catheter that should have been connected to a bag to prevent infection. According to a sworn statement, the physician on call (who held the rank of colonel) agreed that the hospital had erred in leaving the catheter open but refused to remove it or to transfer Sheik to a hospital. When Adams asked him whether he had ever heard of the Geneva Conventions, the physician answered, "Fine, Sergeant, you do what you have to do; I am going back to bed."

In May 2004, photographs of prisoners being abused at Abu Ghraib shocked the world. When I saw the pictures, a simple question came to mind: Where were the prison doctors, nurses and medics while this abuse was happening?

Based on my review of tens of thousands of pages of declassi{filig}ed government documents, congressional testimony, press accounts and reports by human rights organizations, the answer is clear: Many armed forces physicians, nurses and medics have been passive and active partners in the systematic neglect and abuse of prisoners. At facilities in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, the United States often failed to provide prisoners with minimally adequate medical and health systems. Some physicians and psychologists provided information that was used to determine the harshness of physically and psychologically abusive interrogations, which were then monitored by health professionals. Some doctors responsible for the medical records of detainees omitted evidence of abuse from their official reports. Medical personnel who knew of this system of neglect, abuse and torture remained silent.

Certainly, the vast majority of military clinicians are responsible and competent. But even silence or indifference concerning prisoners' injuries was common enough to enable prison abuse to continue in Iraq, Afghanistan and at Guantanamo Bay. My new book on this subject cites incidents involving 120 to 150 clinicians at these locations -- most remaining quiet in the face of abuse, at least 10 delaying or suppressing death certificates in cases of abuse, and at least 30 involved in designing or monitoring harsh interrogations.

These were not isolated acts of medical complicity; rather, they formed a pattern of abuse authorized (or ignored) by senior U.S. officials.

In November 2002, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld appointed a working group to develop an interrogation policy for the prison at Guantanamo Bay. Upon receiving the working group's reports, Rumsfeld approved techniques such as isolation, interrogation for 20 hours, deprivation of light and sound and the use of loud sounds, as well as "manipulation of the detainees' emotions and weaknesses."

But his April 2003 directive also proposed three roles for medical professionals in interrogations. First, "the use of isolation as an interrogation technique requires detailed implementation instructions, including . . . medical and psychological review." Second, application of such interrogation methods was contingent on the detainee being "medically and operationally evaluated as suitable." Third, the interrogations required "the presence or availability of quali{filig}ed medical personnel."

Rumsfeld's vision was {fllig}eshed out in Army prisons in Iraq, Afghanistan and at Guantanamo Bay, with health professionals cooperating in all phases of coercive interrogation. Some provided information from medical records and clinical interviews for use in designing interrogation plans. Others recommended ways to break down prisoners, using insights from cross-cultural psychology to degrade and demoralize them.'The Man Was Old'

Although few records describing interrogations have been declassified, investigative files con{filig}rm that clinicians were present during some harsh inquiries. Guantanamo Bay interrogators and officers reported that doctors observed such questioning from behind a mirror or were in the room while it was occurring. And in Samarra, various soldiers offered sworn testimony about a particular interrogation:

[Linguist -- name redacted]: I witnessed concern on the part of the primary interrogator toward preventing the detainee from going into a medical crisis as a result of the questioning. He stopped the questioning several times so that a medical professional could examine him and determine if he was still doing {filig}ne. All indications were that, aside from the stress of being captured and questioned, he was suffering no health crisis.

Q: During any interrogations did Staff Sergeant [name redacted] ever have to stop it because of medical problems?

A: I don't think so. The only one was [same inmate as above] but Staff Sergeant never stopped it. He only voiced concern that we ease up on the detainee so he could remain calm and keep his blood pressure down. . . .

[Interrogator -- name redacted]: [Name redacted] and I were the agents while [name redacted] sat in as the medic on standby. . . . Every time, maybe two or three times, the [detainee] showed any sign of difficulty, [co-interrogator] would take a break to allow [medic] to attend to him. . . . We took several breaks that night. The man was old and in the middle of the interrogation, we gathered up his pills (or medication) and gave it to him .

One log that detailed the medical monitoring of interrogations was leaked from Guantanamo Bay, excerpted in Time magazine and later authenticated by the Pentagon. According to the log, in 2002 psychologist John Leso monitored the interrogation of Mohamed al-Qahtani, making suggestions on how to increase the stress on the prisoner. The 50-day chronology details the techniques employed: isolation, sleep deprivation, masking, head shaving, shackling, threatening with a dog and so on. The log shows regular monitoring by medics, who, at one point, administered nearly three bags of medical saline intravenously while the prisoner was tied to a chair. When Qahtani asked to urinate, he was told to do so in his pants. He was treated twice for a slow heart rate caused by hypothermia that was intentionally induced by air conditioning.

Medical examinations of prisoners -- both before and after interrogations -- were often skipped. In 2005, the Army's surgeon general found that 15 to 50 percent of prisoners in Iraq, Afghanistan and at Guantanamo Bay were examined before being questioned, and less than 15 percent were examined for injuries afterward. Even when such exams took place, however, they were not necessarily for the prisoners' bene{filig}t. According to the 2004 report by Army Maj. Gen. Antonio M. Taguba on abuse at Abu Ghraib, medical personnel vetted prisoners for interrogations that were designed in accordance with the medical {filig}ndings to include stress positions, sleep deprivation, isolation and dietary manipulation.

This process required the use of Behavioral Science Consultation Teams (BSCTs or "biscuits"), which helped design interrogation plans to exploit prisoners' psychological and physical vulnerabilities. The BSCTs used clinical information to clear prisoners for harsh interrogation plans; they also used medical information to develop a plan to break a prisoner's resistance to questioning. Clinicians at Guantanamo Bay met with BSCT personnel to offer insight on prisoners' weaknesses, according to the report by Maj. Gen Geoffrey D. Miller, who took command of the Abu Ghraib prison after the abuse scandal broke out.

At times, behavioral clinicians reportedly micromanaged some interrogations; one Guantanamo Bay psychiatrist even suggested rationing toilet paper to seven sheets per day and limiting water for bathing. Similarly, a military intelligence specialist in Iraq applied her background in psychology to design approaches to "interrogate those who could not be broken." She approved coercive interrogation plans involving sleep deprivation but vainly protested the use of dogs or nudity. She eventually asked to be relieved of interrogation duties.'The Dude Eventually Died'

In December 2002, Rumsfeld empowered Guantanamo Bay interrogators to deny a prisoner's "medical visits of a non-emergent nature." Although he later revoked the order on advice of legal counsel, the practice of punitive denial of treatment apparently continued throughout the prison system.

In Iraq, Army investigators reviewed a video showing a prisoner with bound wrists lying on the ground near a checkpoint. Entry and exit gunshot wounds are visible. While the soldiers discuss whether to summon medical care, one soldier tells the moaning prisoner to "shut up" and kicks him in the face or upper chest, according to the report of an Army criminal investigation. A soldier who was present during the videotaping later joked that they "weren't in any hurry to call the medics," adding that he "thought the dude eventually died."

A recently filed lawsuit and an FBI memo describe four prisoners, three at Guantanamo Bay and one apparently in Afghanistan, who were denied a prosthetic limb, antibiotics for wounds (two cases), and treatment for constipation until they cooperated with interrogators. An FBI memo tells of a prisoner, arrested in Afghanistan, who was denied treatment for a gunshot wound and was tortured for at least three days before being taken to a hospital.

At Guantanamo Bay, a psychology technician complained to an officer who refused to allow a prisoner to receive a medical evaluation for back pain. According to "Inside the Wire," a 2005 book co-written by former Army linguist Erik Saar, the officer answered, "I run this cellblock the way I see {filig}t. If I think a detainee is complaining about back pain just to get to walk across the camp to the medical clinic one sunny afternoon, then I'm not going to put it in my log. Now leave my block and next time stay in your lane."

Another Guantanamo Bay interrogator, who had read a prisoner's medical files, asked for medical treatment for the prisoner's eyes, according to a June 2005 report by Jane Mayer in the New Yorker. His commander replied, "He should have gotten the medical help before he went on jihad.'"Blood on the Wall'

Investigations of prison abuse describe clinicians who could not "see" abuse. A Navy medic, Petty Officer Carlton Blay, testified in a prison-abuse trial that he watched a guard slap and punch prisoners at Camp Whitehorse in Iraq. Blay said that the beatings were meant to get the prisoners "to know that these people were now in charge." He testified that he did not report the beatings because he thought they were reasonable.

The records also show instances of clinicians who did not confront abusive acts. In late 2003, Sgt. Neil Wallin, a medic, was called to a cell after Abu Ghraib guards slammed a prisoner into a wall, lacerating his chin. He saw the prisoner with a sandbag over his head and blood running down his clothes from a 2 1/2 -inch cut. According to a sworn statement, he saw "blood on the wall near a metal weld, which I believed to be the place where the detainee received his injury." He sutured the wound with 13 stitches but did not report it because he said he did "not know how he was injured or if it was done by himself or another."

Physicians are responsible for collecting medical evidence from patients who report being assaulted. Bruises disappear, fractures heal and witnesses move on, so a physician's job includes describing and, if possible, photographing injuries. One Abu Ghraib record recounts a prisoner's story of beatings, stress positions, being forced underwater until he vomited and being sodomized with an "industrial penis."

But such records were the exception. Red Cross medical monitors described a number of prisoners with injuries from beatings or burns that had not been recorded in clinical notes. In 2003, U.S. soldiers arrested Sadiq Zoman and imprisoned him at their base in Tikrit. A month later, soldiers dropped him off at a hospital, according to a New York Times account. His family found him there four months later, unconscious, with three skull fractures, a broken thumb and burns on the soles of his feet. The Army had given the hospital a medical record saying that Zoman had suffered a heart attack and heatstroke.'The Authority of God'

A medic who beat prisoners during his service in Iraq described his experience to a reporter like this: "You get a burning in your stomach, a rush, a feeling of hot lead running through your veins and you get a sense of power. . . . Imagine wearing point-blank body armor, an M-16 and all the power in the world and the authority of God."

In his 1973 study of Vietnam veterans, psychiatrist Robert Jay Lifton wrote that "atrocity-producing situations" arise at the con{fllig}uence of extreme stress, a dehumanized enemy and the assurance from authorities that ordinary limits on conduct do not apply. However, a torturing society also needs the passive assent or active complicity of its medical profession. In the 20th century, such circumstances came together on several occasions. How does U.S. medical culpability in the war on terrorism compare to the role physicians played in the horrific abuse in Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union, or to medical complicity in the "dirty wars" of Argentina and Chile?

Nazi and Soviet physicians were architects of torture. Nazi doctors put their profession at the service of the party. They built a pseudoscienti{filig}c foundation for anti-Semitism, called race hygiene. Physicians and politicians then used that "science" to build and operate the machinery for fascist eugenics, {filig}rst killing the chronically ill and then, in the Holocaust, committing genocide. Soviet physicians constructed a diagnosis of "sluggish schizophrenia" and put it at the service of the state for incarcerating political dissidents. By contrast, the torture physicians of Argentina and Chile simply went to work in the prisons. They did what was asked of them and did not report what they saw.

The complicity and silence of U.S. clinicians and military medical commanders are more like the behavior of physicians in this second category. There were enough clinicians who were willing to be culpably ignorant, silent or actively complicit to staff the prisons and to allow the abuse to continue without medical challenge. Many civilian and military health professionals knew nothing of the abuse and bear no responsibility. But some senior military medical commanders, and the leadership of civilian medical associations, should have known or should have taken steps to know.

Clinicians are frontline monitors for human rights abuse in prisons. We are in prisons in which the Red Cross never goes and we are there when it is not. We can discern physical and psychic injuries even if they are not disclosed. Torturers need medical accomplices to keep prisoners alive as trauma is in{fllig}icted, to predict how severely detainees can be twisted. Such complicity shows a prisoner that he or she is utterly beyond help; complicit clinicians thus in{fllig}ict the torment of despair.

It will require tenacious professionalism for medicine to remove the stain of its complicity with torture. We might start by recalling the story of the birth of Western medicine in ancient Greece. In grief over his beloved's death, Apollo, the god of healing and reason, dedicated their son, Asclepius, to healing. Asclepius ("Unceasingly gentle") married Epione ("Soothing"), and Hippocrates descended from that lineage. Greek medicine of 2,500 years ago had two foundations: medicine as a natural science and medical practice as a moral enterprise. The Hippocratic Oath speaks of those values in its vow to society, to patients and even to the prisoners at Abu Ghraib: "I will use regimens for the bene{filig}t of the ill in accordance with my ability and my judgment, but from what is to their harm or injustice I will keep them."

Afghan And Coalition Forces Strike Taliban (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, July 8 — Afghan police officers raided mosques across the volatile southern city of Kandahar late Thursday night and arrested more than 100 people sleeping in compounds, according to Afghan officials. The arrests appeared to be the first large-scale raids of mosques carried out by the country's American-backed government and immediately set off a backlash from Afghan religious leaders.

Two clerics in Kandahar condemned the raids, saying they resulted in the arrest of innocent people following a longstanding Afghan tradition of travelers being allowed to spend the night in mosques. The men requested anonymity, fearing reprisal from the government.

Police officials said they had received intelligence that unidentified men were meeting in mosques in Kandahar, which has experienced a sharp increase in suicide bombings this spring.

"Some strange people stay the night at mosques, having meetings," said the Kandahar police chief, Said Aziz Ahmad Wardak.

Mr. Wardak, speaking in a telephone interview Saturday evening, said that all but seven of the people arrested were held overnight and released on Friday. He said seven men who did not have identification cards were released Saturday afternoon.

Crowds of people gathered Friday and Saturday outside police headquarters in Kandahar, he said, but they remained peaceful while while waiting for the prisoners to be released. Local religious leaders also met with police officials after the raids.

Mr. Wardak denied it was Afghan tradition to allow travelers from other regions to stay in mosques, and he called on local clerics to halt the practice. "This is not part of tradition in Kandahar," he said. "A mosque is not a restaurant."

Afghanistan Bomb Kills Peruvian Soldier (AP)

AP, July 9, 2006

A roadside bomb killed a Peruvian soldier and wounded four other NATO troops patrolling western Afghanistan on Sunday, the Spanish Defense Ministry said.

The soldiers were patrolling in an armored convoy near the city of Farah after sunset when a bomb exploded near their vehicles, said Maj. Ian Clooney, spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force.

Clooney would not identify the troops, but the Spanish Defense Ministry said the slain soldier was from Peru and had been serving with Spanish forces under an agreement allowing Peruvians with Spanish ancestry to form part of its forces.

Marine Recruiter In 'Fahrenheit' Mourned (AP)

By Sharon Cohen

AP, July 9, 2006

He was a stern-faced sniper — and a soft-hearted Marine who handed out candy to kids in Iraq. He was a warrior who wrote poetry about life and death.

He was featured in Michael Moore's antiwar documentary, "Fahrenheit 9/11," portrayed as an overzealous Marine recruiter who targeted poor kids.

But Staff Sgt. Raymond Plouhar was far more complicated than that.

And it was that complicated man who died in Iraq in late June, as he served with some of the same men he had recruited years ago. It was that complex man who was buried Friday, by a family that honored his service but would never forget his humanity.

"He had a huge heart," says his widow, Leigha.

Plouhar was a Marine for 10 of his 30 years, but he had dreamed of joining the military ever since he was a little boy who liked to watch "M-A-S-H" on television and dress in fatigues and a camouflage shirt.

He entered the Corps straight out of high school, was trained as a sniper and traveled the world — Bosnia, Sudan and Israel. He had a ramrod posture and a fierce pride in his appearance: He once ironed his uniform and polished its brass buttons for two hours before allowing his mom to photograph him.

"He told me lots of times that he learned what could be accomplished .. if you put your heart and soul in it — and he put his heart and soul in the Marine Corps," says his father, also named Raymond. "He was gung-ho from the time he signed his name until the day he died."

His signature was a memorable one.

His birth certificate read Raymond James Byron Anthony Charles Plouhar — he was named after all his grandfathers. He followed a long family tradition of military service that included a grandfather who earned a Purple Heart in World War II and an older sister, Toni, who was in the Army.

Plouhar carried a Bible from his grandfather, Raymond, to Iraq. He kept it in his left shirt pocket next to his heart. Tucked inside was a photo of his wife and their two sons, Raymond, 9, and Michael, 5.

As devoted as he was to the Marines, Plouhar had a full life outside the military. He liked to hunt and camp, take canoe trips and fish with his boys.

He was known as a charmer, a good talker, a champion of the underdog (always defending and befriending kids picked on in school) and though he was trained to fight and kill, he preferred the role of peacemaker.

"He didn't like turmoil," recalls his mother, Cynthia. "He wanted everybody to be happy, to get along. ... He'd say 'Life's too short to sweat the small stuff.'"

As family members gathered last week in their lakefront home 30 miles north of Detroit, they lined the walls and windows with photo collages that tell Raymond Plouhar's life in chapters.

There's the grinning kid with the protruding ears (a coach once joked he looked like a Volkswagen with the doors open) proudly holding up the bass he caught.

There's the sturdy athlete grappling with an opponent around a wrestling circle and posing in the green-and-white football uniform of the Lake Orion Dragons.

DOJ_NMG_0039187

There's the young man in love, sitting with high school sweetheart, Leigha, on his dad's Harley on their way to the prom, then years later, together again, he in Marine blue, she in white, on their wedding day.

Then there's the tough-minded Marine in helmet and combat gear — doling out candy from a plastic bag two months ago to schoolchildren in Iraq.

"He admired the Iraqi people," his father says. "He said, 'Dad, even though I can't understand a word they're saying, if we were back home ... we'd be buddies.'"

Plouhar was killed on June 26 by a roadside bomb in Anbar province in his second tour of duty in Iraq, weeks before he was to return home. He was assigned to the 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division, I Marine Expeditionary Force in Camp Pendleton, Calif.

Plouhar's family says he had no qualms about returning to Iraq and he believed conditions had improved since his first tour in 2005.

"I never worried," Leigha says, "because ... in my head, he was indestructible and nothing could ever happen to him because he was so good at what he did."

His mother says her son preferred to be at the center of the action. In an undated entry in a blog on MySpace.com, Plouhar said "you can call me crazy" but he liked being in Iraq. "Someone has to do it plus I love what I do," he wrote.

Plouhar did step back from active duty for four years and worked as a recruiter in Flint so he could donate a kidney to his uncle.

It was as a recruiter that Plouhar was seen in Moore's award-winning "Fahrenheit 9/11." The segment shows Plouhar and another Marine in a mall parking lot in a depressed suburb of Flint; it suggests the two men were cynically hunting for poor teens to sign up, rather than go to a wealthy suburb where they'd likely be rejected.

Plouhar's father says his son told him he had been misled and believed he was being filmed for a documentary that would appear on the Discovery Channel. (Moore's office didn't return calls or e-mail messages seeking comment.)

"He cried when he found out what it really was," his father says. "He never dreamed that it was going to be something to slam the country, which he dearly loved."

The movie, to be precise, is primarily a criticism of the Bush administration's actions after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

And yet, the elder Plouhar also says he doesn't see anything wrong with his son's actions. "If you really watched just the part with my son in it," he asks, "how could you not say that he was standing tall and proud?"

His parents say they've seen only the segment featuring their son. Leigha Plouhar says her husband asked her not to watch the film — and she never has. Nor has Stephen Wandrie, his friend of 20 years, who says Plouhar was hurt by the film, but told him:

"'You know what? I know what I do is good for this country and every one of those people I'm recruiting — those guys are my brothers.' "

In the past month, the bloodshed that has become part of the daily life in Iraq seemed to edge closer and closer. He was shaken up in two explosions.

Two weeks before he died, his mother says, he called and she could hear the strain in his voice. But he tried to be reassuring. "He said, I'll be all right. I don't have much longer. ... I'm ready to come home. I'm ready."

And yet he seemed prepared for the possibility he wouldn't.

In a poem he sent to his family last year — a poem now enlarged to floor-to-ceiling size, and covering a wall of the Plouhar home — Plouhar said he knew he could die serving his country and was ready to make the sacrifice.

"I will leave my loved ones, my kids, my wife ...," he wrote. "Do not feel pity for me, for this is my choice. ... This is me. This is who I am. I am a Marine to the very end."

Book Review: There's Less To The Attorney General Than Meets The Eye (AAS)

By Sanford Levinson, SPECIAL TO THE AMERICAN-STATESMAN

Austin American-Statesman, July 9, 2006

Local journalist's book suggests Alberto Gonzales does not challenge his president's views.

Very few attorneys general of the United States have been the subject of biographies. To this short list Austin journalist Bill Minutaglio now adds his study of current Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, though the book concludes just as Gonzales is taking his oath of office. Only a few pages at the end discuss the first year of his tenure.

There are two major problems with "The President's Counselor." The first, which is no fault of Minutaglio's, is that Gonzales is an almost completely opaque subject. The second, for which Minutaglio does bear some responsibility, is that there is no evidence that Gonzales has risen to "power" so much as "prominence." The two are not the same.

As to the first problem, it is widely acknowledged that Gonzales is a taciturn individual. (One infers that he did not cooperate with this book inasmuch as there is no indication that Minutaglio ever interviewed Gonzales.) Former Texas Supreme Court justice Raul Gonzalez is quoted as saying that his friend is "very difficult to read because he plays everything close to the vest." State Rep. Pete Gallego, a West Texas Democrat who is described as a "good friend" of Gonzales, describes him as "just very reserved. . . . Al's a difficult to guy to get to know. . . ."

Minutaglio himself describes Gonzales as displaying "a mortician's calm" at all times. While giving a speech in Virginia, his response to learning about the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, was, "Well, keep me informed. Call me if there is anything else." Similarly, there is no evidence that he ever truly engaged in the debates swirling around the topics of torture and executive power that have turned out to be the leitmotifs of his service as White House Counsel and U.S. Attorney General. He was the passive conduit through which zealots such as John Yoo in the Department of Justice and David Addington in Vice President Dick Cheney's office led the government to adopt as policy what most people would describe as torture, coupled with an extravagant theory of presidential power that threatens the basic structures of American democracy.

Perhaps in this day of confessional memoirs, when millions can be made by publicizing — or even making up — childhood tales of woe, one ought to be grateful for a public figure who adamantly resists letting the public in on the emotional details of what has been an extraordinary life. Gonzales was born to parents who initially worked as migrant laborers; he once commented that his grandparents lived in a home with "no telephone, no television, no hot running water, no porcelain toilet, we went to the outhouse by the railroad tracks that ran along the back of their property."

His father, an alcoholic, built with his own hands a small home in Humble, Texas — if this were a novel, one would object to placing the family in a town called Humble! — where Gonzales was raised. He was the only one of eight children to go to college, graduating from Rice University, where, we repeatedly read, he sold peanuts in the football stands. From Rice he went to Harvard Law School, where, typically, he left no traces. From Harvard he went to the Houston law firm of Vinson & Elkins LLP, where he became one of the first Hispanic partners, specializing in real estate law (including work for one of V&E's largest clients, Enron Corp.). Gonzales went on to serve as Gov. George W. Bush's general counsel and then to sit on the Texas Supreme Court before moving to the White House with his sponsor.

Gonzales does exemplify one version of the American dream, though he appears to be notably unreflective about what is to be learned from it. Does he believe that such success is available to anyone with similar ambition and perseverance? Has he pondered the meaning of the fact that none of his siblings went to college? Does the possibility that he benefited from affirmative action at various points in his career lead him to have any qualms about the Bush administration's attempt to invalidate such programs at the University of Michigan?

If Gonzales has ever offered an answer to any of these questions — or even a single truly interesting observation about any of the great events of our time — it is absent from this book. The closest exception concerns a moderate abortion opinion he wrote during his brief service on the Texas Supreme Court, involving exceptions to parental notification requirements. He castigated his far-right colleague Priscilla Owen for engaging in aggressive judicial activism in the service of her anti-abortion commitments. This opinion received much attention when President Bush nominated Owen to serve on the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, for it contradicted Bush's assurances that she believed in judicial restraint. Moreover, it generated great suspicion on the part of social conservatives who publicly opposed the possibility, once much-rumored, of Bush naming Gonzales as the first Hispanic to the United States Supreme Court. Still, it is impossible, as Minutaglio admits, to infer much, if anything, about what Gonzales himself believes about abortion or how he might respond were he to become a Supreme Court justice free to overrule unacceptable precedents.

Gonzales might simply be stunningly unreflective. Or he might be remarkably self-disciplined for reasons going back to his childhood, when he seemingly developed a tendency to keep hidden what he considered problematic aspects of his life. As a child, he never invited his school friends over to his home; Minutaglio suggests that this is because he was ashamed of his family's poverty. Similarly, he seems unwilling to invite anyone — or at least anyone willing to speak to Minutaglio — into his interior life.

The second, and possibly more serious, problem with this book is captured in the title itself, which leads us to believe that Gonzales is a more significant political figure than the evidence in the book supports. It is true that Alberto Gonzales has been George W. Bush's "counselor" both in the Texas Governor's Office and then in the White House. The problem is that nothing in this book suggests that Gonzales has ever once genuinely "counseled" George W. Bush, in the sense of asking probing questions or offering challenges to his client's already well-known views. Minutaglio twice compares Gonzales to Tom Hagen,

Don Corleone's consigliere in "The Godfather." Some readers might find the comparison to be in questionable taste; more to the point, Hagen is a genuinely powerful person who commands the Godfather's respect, as distinguished from merely being well-liked for the use that can be made of him. If Gonzales has a genius, it is, as Minutaglio himself says, for telling his clients exactly what they want to hear, not challenging them to reflect on what it is they believe they want.

Gonzales, for example, was in charge of bringing Bush appeals for executive clemency before prisoners were executed in Texas. Alan Berlow published a devastating article in The Atlantic, on which Minutaglio draws, that suggests that Gonzales never thought seriously about the grievously flawed process of the Texas capital punishment system. Although we cannot know the details of private conversations between the two men, the written record of the memoranda that Gonzales prepared for Bush's review, and what is known about their personalities, leads one to believe that Gonzales simply reinforced Bush's own complacence. Characteristically, his one visit to Huntsville to observe an actual execution seems to have made no impression on him.

Perhaps the most illuminating paragraph in the book is drawn from an article that appeared in the Austin American-Statesman in 2001, shortly after Gonzales left the Texas Supreme Court to join Bush in the White House. Dan Shelley, who had been the governor's legislative director, described what he no doubt viewed as Gonzales' "growth" during his time serving Gov. Bush as his counsel: "Al would say, 'This piece of legislation is unconstitutional, veto it.' He was probably absolutely right. But then it would come to me, and I was the political guy. If Al had marked veto and the reason was it was unconstitutional, I would say, 'Go ahead and sign it, Governor.' It's not up to us to say whether it's unconstitutional. That's for the Supreme Court to decide. Al, I don't think, was comfortable with that at first."

It speaks well for Gonzales that he was uncomfortable, at least "at first." But, presumably, he learned to place any constitutional scruples to one side and to view himself, first and foremost, as serving the governor's (and then the president's) political interests. One term for this is the betrayal of a lawyer's oath to uphold the Constitution at all times.

Gonzales has never given Bush anything other than what Bush primarily values, which is absolute loyalty, and nothing in the first year and a half of his attorney generalship suggests any deviation. Most of his time has been spent defending unrestrained presidential power, including threatening to prosecute journalists who are attempting to engage in the oversight that a Republican Congress has failed to do. (Freedom of the press seems to be yet another issue that Gonzales has not seriously thought about.)

This book is no doubt as illuminating as it could be about Alberto Gonzales, which is not very, save for detailing his remarkable rise from poverty to the halls, if not the actuality, of power. It is ultimately more illuminating about George W. Bush, who has no desire to welcome into his political family anyone who will seriously challenge any of his views. He found the kind of man he was looking for in Alberto Gonzales.

Sanford Levinson teaches constitutional law at the University of Texas and is the author, most recently, of 'Wrestling With Diversity.'

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

When Manipulation Might Equal Fraud (LAT)

By Tom Petruno, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

The investigation of companies' stock-options practices has the look of a regulatory free-for-all: The Securities and Exchange Commission, the Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service all are interested in whether executives manipulated options contracts.

The companies may have violated SEC rules on accounting and disclosure. They may have violated criminal statutes if deception was deliberate. And they, and their executives, may have cheated the tax man in the process.

Many companies aren't waiting for a prosecutor to knock on the door.

"Right now boards all over the country are hiring outside counsel and forensic accounting experts to look at their option practices," said Kevin Cameron, president of shareholder advisory firm Glass, Lewis & Co.

"But that's not something you can do quickly," he said. Which means it could be a long second half of the year for investors who are worried that their companies could be implicated.

Prosecutors don't announce their investigations, but many companies choose to disclose to shareholders if they've become a target of a civil or criminal probe. That is how most of the companies implicated so far have come to light — firms such as

Irvine-based semiconductor maker Broadcom Corp., computer hardware producer Brooks Automation Inc. and tax software giant Intuit Inc.

Yet it isn't clear that some of the games played with options in the past actually broke any laws. Backdating of options, without public disclosure, may be cut-and-dried fraud. But simply timing option awards ahead of expected favorable company news makes good business sense, SEC Commissioner Paul Atkins said at a conference in Washington last week.

He suggested that such so-called spring-loaded option awards were in "the best interests of shareholders," because the options would be worth more to the executives, and the companies therefore could issue fewer options to reach a desired level of capital gain for the executives.

Fewer option grants would mean that existing shareholders would face less dilution from additional shares in the marketplace, Atkins said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

But It Will Remain In Effect For Awhile (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert, Washington Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, July 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A 45-day seal on materials seized in a raid on U.S. Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office legally expires today -- but will be continued anyway, as lawyers and politicians wrangle over unprecedented constitutional issues.

On May 25, President Bush ordered the seal in hopes that his Justice Department and House negotiators could "in good faith and with mutual institutional respect" resolve their disagreement over the legality of the first-ever search of a congressional office.

Agents seized documents and computer hard drives as part of a federal corruption probe of the eight-term New Orleans Democrat.

The seal will remain in place consistent with a previous statement by the chief judge for the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., Thomas Hogan, that the president's directive should continue until "further order of the court."

On June 16, Hogan heard oral arguments during which Jefferson's lawyer and the attorney for the bipartisan leadership of the House of Representatives accused the Justice Department of an attack on the constitutionally established separation of powers.

Hogan, who had granted the government's request for a search warrant for Jefferson's office, strongly suggested during the hearing that he didn't find the legal arguments by Jefferson's lawyers and the House counsel's office convincing. He promised a quick ruling. But as of late Friday, both sides were still awaiting his ruling, which is now expected early next week.

"I think he sees the need to lay out a carefully crafted written opinion because this is an historic first," said Carl Tobias, a constitutional law professor at the University of Richmond. "He knows the difference between the routine search warrants he handles all the time, and the first one in the history of the nation in which a congressional office has been searched."

Jefferson has said he has an honorable explanation for the allegations that he engaged in a bribery scheme to promote projects in West Africa and predicts he will be cleared of any wrongdoing.

Probably won't be last word

Hogan's ruling, while eagerly anticipated, probably won't be the last word in the case. If the judge accepts the Justice Department's argument that the search didn't violate the separation of powers or the speech or debate clause of the Constitution, Jefferson's lawyers and probably the House counsel's office will almost certainly appeal the ruling.

The still-open question is whether Hogan, appointed to the federal bench in 1982 by President Reagan, will continue to keep the material taken from Jefferson's office sealed until the appeal is decided.

Tobias said it's likely the Justice Department will argue that the material should be made available immediately so the government can move expeditiously with its investigation of Jefferson and decide whether to seek an indictment from the Northern Virginia grand jury hearing the case.

Tobias said that, as with other issues in this case, there isn't a lot of precedent on whether the documents should remain sealed while the appeals process continues. If an appeal is filed, it initially would be heard by a three-judge panel in the district court. After that, it most likely would go the U.S. Supreme Court.

For now, according to a recent Justice Department filing, the documents remain in "heat-sealed evidence envelopes" placed inside a General Services Administration-approved combination safe.

30 In State Charged In FEMA Fraud (BN)

By Val Walton, News Staff Writer

The Birmingham News (AL), July 9, 2006

More investigations are under way

At least 30 people have been charged in Alabama federal courts with scamming the Federal Emergency Management Agency of thousands of dollars by posing as Hurricane Katrina victims.

As federal officials try to get a handle on the scope of FEMA aid fraud, questionable disaster-relief claims continue to mount in Alabama and across the country months after the August storm.

In the North Alabama District, which includes the 31 northernmost counties and is based in Birmingham, nine people have been charged with FEMA-related fraud. The latest three were indicted in May:

Joshua D. Moscato, 22, of Huntsville is accused of giving a fake residence to get $2,000 in FEMA money.

Jennifer L. Young, 22, of Huntsville lied about her place of residence to get $4,348, prosecutors say.

Christy L. Smith, 33, of Gadsden also is accused of giving bogus information to get $2,000 in assistance.

In the state's Middle District, based in Montgomery, 13 cases have been charged, said Retta Goss, a court spokeswoman.

So far in the Mobile-based Southern District, eight cases have been filed, with officials expecting more. "Many investigations are under way," said Charlie McNichol, a spokesman for the district's U.S. attorney's office.

Nationally, prosecutors in 23 districts have charged more than 212 people with hurricane-related crime, according to the Department of Justice's Hurricane Katrina Task Force February statistics, the latest available. The task force was initiated in September 2005 by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

"There will be consequences for those who have engaged in such fraud and deceit," U.S. Attorney Alice Martin of north Alabama said.

After Hurricanes Katrina and Rita pummeled Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi, millions of people were left homeless and living out of motels and shelters. FEMA had the challenge of providing quick assistance while having adequate controls to assure that benefits were paid to eligible people.

FEMA provided $2,000 per household in Individual Household Program payments through check, debit card or bank deposit.

The payments were supposed to go to speed aid to disaster victims. FEMA estimates more than 2.5 million people applied for Katrina or Rita benefits.

A Government Accountability Office review released last month found that the program was riddled with fraud. The agency estimates that it cost FEMA at least $1 billion.

Misspent aid:

While debit cards were used to get cash, food, clothing and other personal necessities, some went for adult entertainment, bail bond services and to buy guns. The government sent checks to thousands of people who registered with FEMA using information belonging to prison inmates or provided a post office box as the address of their damaged home.

Like other Louisiana residents, Theresa Clark and Angie Harris applied for $2,000 in financial assistance from FEMA. The women told federal officials their home in Slidell, La., was damaged, though Clark misspelled her place of residence as "Slydell." The American Red Cross paid for their stay at a motel in Attalla.

Instead of being hurricane victims, federal prosecutors said, the women are among the dozens of Alabama residents who turned out to be con artists.

"We knew they didn't live in Slidell," said Dennis Weaver, chief investigator for the Attalla Police Department. "They were a couple of people we dealt with before."

Clark and Harris, indicted by a Birmingham-based federal grand jury, pleaded guilty to their crimes. Clark is to be sentenced Aug. 2. Harris received 36 months of probation and was ordered to pay $2,000 in restitution.

Two identities:

In Birmingham, Gladys Mae Whitt was arrested by Birmingham Police on Nov. 23, 2005, for shoplifting. At the time, Whitt had a hospital bracelet, an open piece of mail, an Alabama Electronic Benefit Transfer card and a red plastic hospital card identifying her as Margaret Shear, a Hurricane Katrina evacuee.

Whitt, posing as Shear, gave an address of Walker Street in New Orleans. On. Sept. 15, 2005, a $2,000 check was mailed to Margaret Shear at a Birmingham address. That address, prosecutors said, was where Gladys Whitt lived with her mother through October 2005.

Whitt pleaded guilty. She is to be sentenced Aug. 17.

In March, a Montgomery grand jury indicted Bernetta Willis, 27, charging her with submitting applications to FEMA claiming that the property she rented in Louisiana sustained damage. The indictment said Willis lived in Montgomery and got four benefit checks totaling $8,716.

Willis also is charged with using a gun to threaten a witness who was to testify about her FEMA claims.

Weaver, the Attalla investigator, said it's not unusual for con artists, who may have substance abuse problems, to try to scam.

"You have to figure if they will steal from their own parents, they don't mind stealing from the government or taxpayer," he said. "They are not upstanding citizens."

Law Enforcement Officials Lurking All Over The Web (PPG)

By Torsten Ove, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, July 9, 2006

Open season on predators

A 53-year-old press secretary for the U.S. Department of Homeland Security uses the Internet to arrange a tryst with a young girl but worries she's a cop.

"Law enforcement is very good at this," he writes to "Ashlynne." "I have soooo much to lose."

He did. "Ashlynne" was a Florida sheriff's deputy.

A 44-year-old Georgia school superintendent uses a computer at work to arrange sex with 15-year-old "Holly" but worries about "loosing [sic] everything."

He did. "Holly" was a local police officer.

A 52-year-old sports editor at the Washington, Pa. Observer-Reporter arranges for sex with 12-year-old "Jessica," according to an e-mail transcript, but worries that he "could get in really big trouble."

He did. "Jessica" was an agent from the Pennsylvania attorney general's Child Predator Unit.

Across America, online sex stings are booming.

Arrests have doubled since 2001, and so many cops are online that the federal Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force program is expanding its intelligence database so that police don't trip over each other in cyberspace.

Cyberstings also are getting unprecedented exposure with Dateline NBC's controversial "To Catch a Predator" series, which features a civilian group called Perverted Justice nabbing suspects while cameras roll.

The growth of this phenomenon raises big questions:

Are stings deterring predators? Or is the Internet creating more of them? And why are so many men -- almost all of them white and many well-educated -- trolling online for teens when they know they're being hunted?

The short answers: Probably, maybe and because they can't help themselves.

But as is often the case with the subject of child molestation, the issues are a good deal more complicated than that.

The best evidence, for example, indicates that there has been a dramatic overall decline in sexual abuse of children in America over the past 15 years.

Yet at the same time, those who examine this sort of thing -- and those who put predators in jail for a living -- are pretty sure that Internet sex crimes are increasing.

Federal prosecutions certainly are. Cases against those who prey on children or collect kiddie porn have jumped from 344 in 1995 to 1,576 last year.

Chart: Online predators / Arrests and characteristics

"I know we're getting better at catching them," said William Shore, a supervisory agent for the Pittsburgh FBI office. "I think the Internet is breeding this stuff."

Dennis Guzy, head of Pennsylvania's Child Predator Unit, thinks so, too. He's been working stings for 25 years. In pre-Internet days, he worked with U.S. postal inspectors to catch predators by placing fake ads in hard-to-find porn magazines.

Now he and his six agents cast their net online, setting up Yahoo profiles in which they pose as 11- or 12-year-olds. They're not hurting for targets.

The unit has arrested 53 men since January 2005, including suspects from Latrobe, Baldwin Township and Oakland just last month.

DOJ_NMG_0039193

"This whole problem is driven by the Internet," said Agent Guzy, a veteran of the Philadelphia Police Department's sex crimes unit. "Child porn is so readily available on the Internet. I think individuals get out there and see the numerous teen sites, they see the wealth of child porn, and it starts to take them into a new world. I think that's what drives them into the chat rooms."

Even when they know better -- or should.

One suspect on the Dateline show wrote to his pen pal: "now a days you have to be careful ... you know cops pulling stings."

Agent Guzy remembers a case in which agents arranged to meet a suspect in the parking lot of a Harrisburg hotel. Before the meeting, the man warned them that they had to be careful because he'd heard that the attorney general's office was setting up stings in hotel parking lots around Harrisburg.

It's not that these people are dumb.

"It's an irresistible urge," said Agent Guzy. "You might think the guy has to be the stupidest guy in the world. But when you ask him about it, he says, 'Yeah, but in spite of all that, I couldn't pass up the opportunity to have sex with a 9-year-old girl. So I took the risk.' "

Many suspects will write in their correspondence, "I hope you're not a cop," but they accept the answer when a cop says that he's not.

"Why do they accept that [lie]? Because they need to," said consultant Kenneth Lanning, formerly of the FBI's Behavioral Sciences Unit. "This is need-driven behavior, not thought-driven behavior."

Police prowling this netherworld have to keep up with accelerating technology. Stings have moved from snail mail to e-mail and now instant messenger, requiring cops to react more quickly or risk losing their mark.

The Bush administration has been trying to streamline investigations.

Across the country, 46 Internet Crimes Against Children Task Forces funded by the Justice Department supply money and training for state and local police.

The program is expanding, adding more law enforcement agencies and beefing up a "deconfliction" computer system that allows police to share intelligence.

Lt. Dave Peifer of the Delaware County district attorney's office, who heads Pennsylvania's task force, says officers need to avoid duplicating efforts.

"You could have a situation where four other task forces are communicating with the same guy," he says.

Authorities also occasionally bump into each other online. Not every cop in cyberspace is posing as a 12-year-old. Some investigators, such as postal inspectors, work reverse stings in which they pose as adults trading child pornography or as parents offering young children for sex.

With a central data base, everyone will know what everyone else is doing in this vast hunting ground.

Civilians with organizations like Perverted Justice probably won't have access; many in law enforcement consider them vigilantes.

But Dateline is getting huge ratings covering Perverted Justice sting operations, exposing a seedy subculture to millions of Americans.

One man was shown bringing his little boy to a tryst. Another showed up with whipped cream. Another stripped off all his clothes the instant he arrived.

It's enough to make a viewer wonder just how many of these men are out there. Researchers don't know, but they have examined who gets caught.

The most recent study by David Finkelhor, a Point Breeze native who heads the Crimes Against Children Research Center at the University of New Hampshire, shows that 91 percent of suspects are white men with full-time jobs.

"The people that law enforcement are accessing tend to be your white-collar technical people," says Mr. Finkelhor. "Minorities are not as represented in that group."

Many are married, too, and police have noticed that in most cases, women stand by their husbands throughout a prosecution.

How big a threat are these men?

Those caught in stings clearly planned to molest a child, but no one knows how many times Internet predators may have been successful. But many obviously are.

Former Baden police officer Kenneth Jones, for example, cruised homosexual chat rooms and arranged a tryst with a 14-year-old boy who also was victimized by several other local men. Those are the cases that motivate police in undercover efforts.

"We capture these predators before they steal the innocence of a child for the first time or molest a child again," said Kevin Harley, spokesman for the attorney general's office. "A lot of these guys have real victims."

DOJ_NMG_0039194

Once stung, defendants offer a number of excuses, according to law enforcement officials. Among the more popular: they were trying to teach a young target about the dangers of the Internet; they were doing their own investigation; they weren't really going to have sex.

In court, they typically argue that they were entrapped or merely engaging in fantasy. A newer defense is the "impossibility" claim, which recently surfaced before the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia.

Todd Tykarsky of Trenton, N.J., had traveled to Philadelphia to have sex with a 14-year-old who turned out to be an FBI agent. Because the girl wasn't real, he said, he could not have formed a true intent to have sex with her.

The 3rd Circuit rejected that argument. Few defense strategies succeed -- the conviction rate for online stings is nearly 100 percent.

The proliferation of Internet sex cases involving children worries law enforcement, because cyberspace forums provide places where people can find kindred spirits no matter what their passions.

Chat rooms can serve to validate even the most deviant behavior, said Mr. Lanning. "No one is telling you it's wrong," he said.

The increasing availability of online child pornography -- much of it produced in the states of the former Soviet Union -- also could be lowering inhibitions and driving some men to seek trysts with children.

"Child porn is more accessible, so people are maybe developing a taste for it. There seems to be a market for these images," said Mr. Finkelhor. "But we don't have any evidence that it is [creating more predators]."

Mr. Finkelhor, Mr. Lanning and others encourage a sense of perspective. That's difficult in an era of 24-hour news, when a child abduction halfway across the country gets saturation coverage that in the old days would have been limited to the place where it happened.

But the cases that strike the most fear in parents -- stranger abductions of children -- are not increasing. There are between 100 and 150 annually in the U.S., a number that has remained steady for years.

Other crimes against children also seem to be declining.

The most complete study by the Crimes Against Children Research Center shows that substantiated cases of sex abuse dropped nearly 50 percent between 1992 and 2004. The rate per 1,000 children also went down, although the figures represent only abuse reported to youth agencies and don't reflect stranger abductions or most Internet crimes.

Mr. Finkelhor said more awareness of child abuse, better parenting, improved social services and more effective law enforcement seem to be making a difference.

"Overall," he says, "I do think child sex abuse is declining."

Pacific Bases Grapple With Series Of Child Porn Incidents (S&S)

By David Allen, Stars and Stripes Pacific edition

Stars & Stripes, July 9, 2006

Expert: Recent prosecutions reflect national epidemic

CAMP FOSTER, Okinawa — The best way to protect children from online predators is to know what they are doing when they log on to the Internet, military investigators say.

“It’s dangerous for kids to know more about computers than their parents,” said Lt. Col. Janice Pegram, commander of Detachment 624 of the Air Force Office of Special Investigation on Kadena Air Base, Okinawa. “Never allow them to download anything from an unknown source, and have them tell you if they get any unsolicited instant messages.

“As parents, we try to give our children some liberty and support their privacy,” she said. “But some things (like child porn) they have to be aware of. There are pedophiles and predators out there and they have a lot of tricks.”

Some Web services, such as AOL, have special blocks on teen chat rooms, Pegram said. And parents can get their own accounts on other Web services that offer homepage and blog sites, such as the popular MySpace.com, so they can sign on and examine the content of the sites their children visit.

Special Agent Randy Dulay of the Okinawa branch of the Naval Criminal Investigative Service said parents should never allow a child to have a computer in his or her bedroom.

“Put the computers in a general area of the house, the living room or dining room, someplace where they can be monitored,” he said. “Also, give them set hours for using the computers and have them ask you for permission before they log on.”

He also suggests parents learn how to view the history section of the computer’s Web browser to see what Web sites have been visited.

To report an incidence of child pornography or an online predator, servicemembers should call their base criminal investigations office.

Parents also can get more information from the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children's Web site at www.missingkids.com.

CAMP FOSTER, Okinawa — There's an epidemic of child pornography and exploitation in the United States, the government says, and don't think you're immune if you're stationed overseas.

In recent months, several servicemembers on Okinawa have been court-martialed on charges of downloading child pornography on the Internet.

In one case, an Air Force technical sergeant on Kadena Air Base was found guilty of using his home computer to solicit sex from a 13-year-old girl who also lived on base. In April he was sentenced to 5 years in prison and a bad-conduct discharge for child solicitation and downloading child porn.

Child pornography, the images of people younger than 16 engaged in sex, is illegal "anywhere at any time," said Lt. Col. Janice Pegram, commander of the Air Force Office of Special Investigation's Detachment 624.

In the past year, Pegram said, there have been five cases of child pornography on Kadena and other investigations are ongoing. Most of the cases involve downloading the pictures from the Internet, she said. A few involved sharing child porn with other Internet users.

"Only one was a predator," someone who tries to solicit sex from a minor directly, Pegram said.

During the investigations, all computer equipment seized is sent to the Defense Computer Forensics Laboratory in Virginia, part of the Defense Cyber Crime Center. Earlier this year, center director Steven Shirley said child porn made up 50 percent of the cases the center handled.

Pegram emphasized there is nothing harmless about downloading and viewing child porn.

"The children depicted have all been abused," she said. "They have all been exploited and victimized."

People found guilty of downloading and possessing child porn face lengthy prison sentences and bad-conduct or dishonorable discharges, and they also must register as sex offenders.

Pegram said there is not a greater incidence of child pornography in the military than among civilians.

"We're just a smaller version of what exists on the outside," she said, adding that dependents of military members and civilian workers can be charged and tried in a stateside federal court.

Most of the child porn cases on Okinawa Marine bases have involved individuals being turned in by others who came across the material on the suspect's personal computer, said Randy Dulay, a special agent with the Naval Criminal Investigative Service.

"We've had cases where the material was discovered by a family member or a friend who had been looking for something else on the computer and this stuff turned up," Dulay said. He said none of the three cases in the past year or so investigated by NCIS involved a predator.

"Most of the time they were just visiting Web sites and downloading pictures," he said. In the most recent case, a Navy hospitalman at the U.S. Naval Hospital on Camp Lester was handed a dishonorable discharge and sentenced to 30 months in prison for downloading and possessing child porn.

"It's a violation of a federal statute," Dulay said. "You could get up to five years in prison for just one picture."

He said most of the suspects at first claim they regularly viewed legal adult porn and downloaded the child porn by accident. But an examination of their hard drives, the search terms they used and the Internet cache history usually shows they were seeking child porn.

Supervisory Special Agent Joe Kennedy, also with the Okinawa NCIS office, said he's encouraged by people stepping forward to report child porn.

"Our cases were initiated by our Marines coming forward and doing what's right," he said. "They knew this was wrong and that it had to be reported."

Recently, all of the supervisors in the Okinawa NCIS office went to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children for a three-day seminar on child porn.

In April, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales visited the headquarters of the center in Alexandria, Va., and spoke about child pornography on the Internet. He praised the center's new CyberTipline (www.missingkids.com/cybertip) and said he supported a bill that would strengthen criminal penalties for Internet service providers who fail to report child pornography on their systems.

DOJ_NMG_0039196

Gonzales said child porn collectors evolve into producers, “driving them to molest even more children and to make new and increasingly vulgar material.”

Most troubling, he said, new forms of abuse have taken root on the Web. One form is molestation on demand, where pedophiles molest children while others watch the act live through streaming video.

In May, the Department of Justice launched Project Safe Childhood, which will focus on the online exploitation and victimization of children.

Powerful GOP Activist Sees His Influence Slip Over Abramoff Dealings (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

For more than a decade, Grover G. Norquist has been at the nexus of conservative activism in Washington, becoming a Bush administration insider whose weekly strategy sessions at his Americans for Tax Reform have drawn ever-larger crowds of lawmakers, lobbyists and even White House political adviser Karl Rove.

Over the past six years, Norquist has been a key cheerleader and strategist for successive White House tax cuts, extracting ironclad oaths from congressional Republicans not to even think about tax increases. And even before President Bush's election, he positioned himself as a gatekeeper for supplicants seeking access to Bush's inner circle.

But in the aftermath of reports that Norquist served as a cash conduit for disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, the irascible, combative activist is struggling to maintain his stature as some GOP lawmakers distance themselves and as enemies in the conservative movement seek to diminish his position.

"People were willing to cut him a lot of slack because he's done a lot of favors for a lot of people," said J. Michael Waller, a vice president of the right-leaning Center for Security Policy who for several years was an occasional participant at Norquist's Wednesday meetings. "But Grover's not that likable."

Norquist has lashed back at his critics, accusing them of dishonesty, personal vendettas and political gamesmanship. He has saved his choicest words for Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), whose Senate Indian Affairs Committee last month stated in a report that for a small cut, Americans for Tax Reform served as a "conduit" for funds that flowed from Abramoff's clients to surreptitiously finance grass-roots lobbying campaigns.

"The idea that our friend John McCain yelling at me would hurt me misses McCain's position" among conservatives, Norquist said. "John McCain thinks he can't be president if I'm standing here saying he's got a problem with taxes."

Mark Salter, McCain's longtime aide, replied: "Obviously, Grover is not well. It would be cruel of us to respond in kind."

For now, Norquist's well-publicized financial links to Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to corruption charges and is cooperating with prosecutors, have had little obvious impact on Norquist's prominence. Nor have they affected his signature event: the meeting every Wednesday morning at Americans for Tax Reform, where officials of conservative organizations, activists and lobbyists gather with Republican politicians to swap notes, make plans and coordinate messages. The June 28 meeting in downtown Washington was packed.

"I don't think he's lost one iota of influence in conservative circles," said Cesar Conda, a Republican lobbyist and a former top aide to Vice President Cheney.

But beneath the outward signs of normalcy, the infighting is taking a toll on Norquist's standing. Some social conservatives who have jousted with him over his more libertarian views on the regulation of television and its depictions of violence and depravity are exploiting his weakness to press their positions on Capitol Hill. Security-minded defense hawks who for years have questioned his ties to Muslim activists are resurrecting charges that Norquist has turned a blind eye to terrorist sympathizers.

Republican lawmakers who have chafed at his dogmatic position on taxes are also ready to shrug off his heavy hand. In recent interviews, a half-dozen conservative GOP lawmakers said they are consciously avoiding Norquist's meetings, and they have begun questioning the purity of an activist who has always portrayed himself as motivated by ideals, not money.

"For someone like Grover Norquist, his influence stems from the sense that he is not doing this for the money," said Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.). "To the extent that he may be seen playing both sides of an issue, that will give people pause."

One Republican lobbyist with close ties to the House leadership said doors are not swinging open for Norquist the way they once did.

"Grover is about action and achievement; money has always been way down the list," said Gary Maloney, a political consultant and Norquist friend. "Something like this tying him to Washington-as-usual is unhelpful. But it will be short-lived in impact, assuming, as most expect, that this is the sum of it."

DOJ_NMG_0039197

At the heart of his troubles is the Indian Affairs Committee report, which depicted Norquist as an avid participant in Abramoff's schemes to channel money from affluent clients, especially Indian gaming interests, to former Christian Coalition executive director Ralph Reed.

"Call Ralph re Grover doing pass through," Abramoff wrote in an e-mail reminder to himself in 1999, a year in which Norquist moved more than $1 million in Abramoff client money to Reed and Christian anti-gambling groups. In another e-mail, from 1995, Abramoff told a colleague that Norquist would fight a tax opposed by a beverage company client, if the firm became "a major player in ATR."

"What is most important however is that this matter is kept discreet," Abramoff wrote in the e-mail. "We do not want the opponents to think that we are trying to buy the taxpayer movement."

In 1999, when ATR was receiving large donations from the Choctaw tribe, Norquist e-mailed Abramoff: "What is the status of the Choctaw stuff? . . . I have a 75g hole in my budget from last year. ouch."

Norquist said McCain and his aides "dishonestly" and selectively published e-mails that take ATR's work out of context. The group's collaboration with the Choctaws went back more than a decade, as the tribe sought to create a low-tax, free-enterprise government, he said. The $75,000 referred to in the e-mail, he said, was simply a promised contribution that was late.

But for Norquist, defending his business practices rather than fighting political battles is a vulnerability. Rivals and foes in the conservative movement have pounced on the report to stir up suspicions that Americans for Tax Reform may not be the pure free-market, small-government group Norquist says it is.

L. Brent Bozell III, president of the conservative Media Research Center, has been pushing hard for legislation that would allow cable subscribers to purchase channels "a la carte," rather than in large packages prescribed by cable companies. That way, he said, indecent and profane channels will not be subsidized by consumers who have no interest in viewing them.

Now, Bozell is accusing Norquist of forsaking his principles by opposing a la carte cable choice. Norquist says the bill would give federal regulators the ability to set prices and play favorites with cable programming.

"With cable choice, you do have to wonder whose interests Grover is serving," Bozell said.

Frank J. Gaffney Jr., the firebrand director of the Center for Security Policy, has developed an anti-Norquist presentation, complete with charts and graphs, that he has shopped around to other conservatives, saying it shows Norquist's ties to terrorist sympathizers.

"This is the perfect moment to get the truth, because guys like Abramoff . . . have a powerful incentive to cooperate and get out the truth. At the very least, the questions should be asked," Gaffney said.

At issue is the Islamic Free Market Institute, which Norquist created in 1998 to steer Muslim voters to the GOP. To run the institute, Norquist tapped Khaled Saffuri, whose dealings with the American Muslim Council linked him to Abdurahman M. Alamoudi, a founder of the council, who pleaded guilty in 2004 to accepting hundreds of thousands of dollars from top Libyan officials and admitted participating in a Libyan plot to assassinate then-Crown Prince Abdullah of Saudi Arabia.

Norquist dismisses Gaffney's charges as anti-Muslim bigotry and part of a long-standing vendetta against him. And he says he has never violated his small-government principles to raise a buck.

But he conceded that there are Republican lawmakers who want to see him weakened. He has been brutal at enforcing the no-new-taxes pledge he extracts from the candidates he endorses, so much so that many in the party are beginning to chafe, he said.

But the apparatus he has created for conservatives -- with fundraisers, social dinners and weekly meetings not just in Washington but in 43 states and even Europe -- has become too important to destroy.

"Grover supplies grass-roots power, which is why lobbyists want him on their side," said John Feehery, executive vice president of the Motion Picture Association of America. "He senses where he can get activists around the country riled. He's a master organizer on specific issues."

As for Wednesday mornings at ATR, Feehery added, "I still think it's still the place to be."

Cunningham Probe Zeros In On Contractor (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, July 9, 2006

SAN DIEGO (AP) -- The prosecutors who sent former U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham to prison for taking bribes now are focusing their attention on his friend Brent Wilkes, a San Diego defense contractor who won nearly $100 million in contracts in the past decade.

Mr. Wilkes also has links to other corruption investigations.

DOJ_NMG_0039198

Cunningham was sentenced in March to more than eight years in prison after pleading guilty to taking $2.4 million in bribes -- including payments for a 7,628-square-foot mansion, a Rolls-Royce and a 65-foot yacht -- in return for funneling contracts to certain companies.

Mr. Wilkes' attorneys have confirmed he is the unidentified "Co-Conspirator No. 1" in Cunningham's plea agreement. Prosecutors won't comment on their investigation but purport he paid Cunningham more than $600,000 to win government contracts.

No one else has been indicted in the Cunningham case. However, a grand jury is meeting regularly and is focusing on Mr. Wilkes, according to two attorneys close to the investigation. The attorneys spoke on the condition of anonymity because grand jury proceedings are secret.

A second co-conspirator in Cunningham's plea agreement, Mitchell Wade, is cooperating with prosecutors after pleading guilty in February to bribing Cunningham in exchange for more than $150 million in government contracts since 2002.

Bringing a public corruption case is not easy, says Randall Eliason, former head of the public corruption section of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Washington.

"There's a lot of stuff that goes on that's sleazy and unethical that does not rise to the level of a crime," he said. "The key is always an expressed deal, where someone says, 'I give you this and you do that for me.' "

Mr. Wilkes, 52, has not spoken publicly since his name surfaced in the investigation last year. Attempts to reach him were unsuccessful. Through his attorneys, Michael Lipman and Nancy Luque, he has denied any wrongdoing.

Public corruption has become a major campaign issue this election year, and Mr. Wilkes has been connected to several of the investigations.

He has been subpoenaed in the Texas case against former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. He gave money to Rep. John T. Doolittle, California Republican, who has acknowledged helping Mr. Wilkes win contracts and whose name has surfaced in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

Mr. Wilkes is a childhood friend of Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, the former high-ranking CIA official whose home and office were raided by FBI agents in May as part of the Cunningham investigation. Mr. Foggo left his job after disclosures that he participated in poker games organized by Mr. Wilkes. FBI officials also have been investigating whether Mr. Wilkes provided prostitutes for the parties.

Last week, the California Fair Political Practices Commission released a complaint purporting Mr. Wilkes tried to circumvent rules on campaign contributions by reimbursing two persons, including one of his own employees, for donations to a San Diego mayoral candidate in 2000.

CIVIL LAW:

Carnival Puts Bite On Hillary's Brother (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, July 9, 2006

A bankruptcy trustee for a carnival company whose owners received a pardon from President Clinton is seeking to garnish the bank accounts of Mr. Clinton's brother-in-law to recoup more than $100,000 in loans.

Anthony D. Rodham, one of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's two brothers, got the loans from United Shows of America Inc. after its owners obtained the presidential pardon in March 2000 over the objections of the Justice Department.

Michael E. Collins, trustee for United Shows, filed papers in Alexandria bankruptcy court seeking the return of $107,000 plus $46,034 in interest from Mr. Rodham, 51, for the loans he received from the carnival company, which went bankrupt in 2002.

Mr. Rodham "received the benefit of the loans without making any repayment," reads a related document filed last year in bankruptcy court in Nashville, Tenn.

United Shows' owners, Edgar Gregory Jr. and his wife, Vonna Jo Gregory, were convicted of bank fraud in 1982 on charges of illegally giving loans to friends. Mr. Gregory died in 2004, within four years of the presidential pardons.

At the time Mr. Clinton pardoned the Gregorys, Mr. Rodham reportedly said he worked for Tennessee-based United Shows as a consultant and denied taking money to lobby for presidential favors.

Mr. Collins, in his June 26 bankruptcy filing, said each of 16 checks from United Shows written to Mr. Rodham had a note at the bottom indicating the payments were loans.

Mr. Rodham, known as Tony and a resident of Vienna, Va., did not return several calls seeking comment.

DOJ_NMG_0039199

His being named in the bankruptcy case is the latest distraction to Mrs. Clinton's political aspirations caused by her two younger brothers. Mrs. Clinton, a Democrat, is seeking re-election in November to her Senate seat from New York and is weighing a presidential bid in 2008.

Mr. Rodham got into a brawl in August 2001 at the Rodham family's summer cottage in Pennsylvania with a man who said he caught Mr. Rodham having sex with the man's girlfriend.

Mrs. Clinton's other brother, Hugh E. Rodham Jr., intervened in that fight. Hugh Rodham, 56, also came under scrutiny for his role in Mr. Clinton's pardons. An attorney, he returned about $400,000 he received for lobbying for a presidential pardon and prison commutation for two clients.

Both brothers were criticized in 1993 when they sought corporate contributions to pay for festivities surrounding their brother-in-law's first inauguration.

Neither Mrs. Clinton nor the former president returned messages seeking comment on the new court filing.

According to bankruptcy court records, Tony Rodham began to receive the loan checks on May 10, 2000. The final loan of $2,500 was made on Feb. 12, 2002, about six months before United Shows filed for bankruptcy protection.

Mr. Collins won a default judgment in the Tennessee court against Mr. Rodham because Mrs. Clinton's brother filed no legal papers to contest the matter, records show.

Mr. Collins said the recent filing in Alexandria begins the process of determining Mr. Rodham's assets, placing liens and garnishing wages.

"The default judgment is only as good as your ability to collect on it," he said.

United Shows also placed a judgment lien certificate against Mr. Rodham in the District, according to records in the D.C. office of the Recorder of Deeds.

If a lien on his property is enforced, creditors eventually could force a sale.

The House Government Reform Committee criticized Mr. Rodham in a 2002 report on President Clinton's pardons. The report said he lobbied for pardons for Mr. Gregory and his wife while receiving $244,769 in salary and $79,000 in loans from the couple since 1997.

The committee report found the loans to Mr. Rodham were consolidated into a $72,000 promissory note due in December 2001.

However, there is "no evidence that Rodham has repaid this loan, and the Gregorys' attorney informed committee staff that he believes that Rodham has not repaid the loan," the committee report stated.

The Gregorys had sought pardons because they thought their criminal records would disqualify them from winning state carnival contracts, according to the report. The committee found that the Gregorys asked Mr. Rodham at a party in late 1999 or early 2000 for help in winning approval for their pardon applications.

"According to Edgar Gregory, Rodham gave them the impression that he could not help much with their pardon petition but that 'if he could do anything, he would,' " the report said.

The committee also found Mr. Gregory had no documentation showing what kind of work Mr. Rodham performed for United Shows.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

OFFICER-INVOLVED SHOOTINGS : Police Defend Practices (LVRJ)

By Francis Mccabe, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, July 9, 2006

Officials say criminal element has grown more prone to violence

The image of Tarance Hall's limp body being pulled from a car onto the Strip and cuffed after he was fatally shot by Las Vegas police late Tuesday resonated across the valley and was broadcast nationwide.

And though critics wonder whether the Metropolitan Police Department is resorting to deadly force too soon, police continue to defend their use of guns because, they say, the criminal element has become less cooperative and more prone to engage officers violently.

Hall's shooting was the 18th officer-involved shooting this year by the police department and the 15th since police Sgt. Henry Prendes, 37, was slain by Amir Rashid Crump on Feb. 1. Hall's shooting also was the eighth fatal shooting this year. In at least three of the 18 shootings, nobody was injured.

Some national experts suggest an officer's death can play a role in the mentality of other officers to reach more quickly for their firearms.

Lt. Nelson Andreu, a retired detective for the Miami Police Department and an expert on officer-related shootings, said the shooting of a police officer can cause other officers to become more concerned with their own safety, which can lead to officer-related shootings.

But local police say that's not a factor.

The numbers don't tell the whole story, said Undersheriff Doug Gillespie.

"It's really important we don't overreact, as an organization, to the numbers," Gillespie said. "We look very closely at what led up to the situation and the decisions the officers made."

THE NUMBERS

Last year, there were 12 officer-related shootings involving Las Vegas police, nine of which were fatal. In 2004, there were 21, 10 of which were fatal.

So far, seven of the eight fatal shootings by officers this year have been found to be justified after Clark County coroner's inquests. An inquest has yet to be set for Hall's death.

Those fatal shootings include officers shooting a murder suspect in the back while he was handcuffed and running from police, and officers shooting unarmed men who police say were using their cars as a weapon while trying to escape.

Gillespie, who is one of 16 candidates running to be Clark County's next sheriff, said the department reviews officer-involved shootings on a case-by-case basis to determine whether the officers acted properly or whether any changes are needed to department policies or training.

In the past five years, the number of officer-involved shootings has been as high as 33 and as low as 13, Gillespie said, citing annual totals different from those provided by the department's public information office. Gillespie said he did not think the recent spike in shootings is attributable in any way to Prendes' slaying.

Department leaders review policies on a regular basis and after police shootings, he said. Policies change from time to time, but Gillespie said he has no plans to change current protocols.

Allen Lichtenstein, general counsel of the American Civil Liberties Union of Nevada, said officers "have the right and the duty to engage in the use of deadly force in situations where there is a serious threat of loss of life or bodily injury to them or other people."

"But a shoot-first-ask-questions-later attitude is clearly unacceptable for both the public as well as the officers themselves," he said.

"It does appear that there is a pattern where police officers lack either the training or the supervision to take situations where deadly force is not required, such as where people are not armed, are not threatening anyone, or perhaps under the influence or mentally ill, and being too quick to use deadly force," Lichtenstein said.

An informal survey of major cities across the country shows fluctuation in the number of officer-involved shootings. In the past year and a half, San Jose, Calif., with a population of 912,000, has seen just two fatal shootings compared with Las Vegas' 17 during the same period. Los Angeles, a city of 3.8 million, has had 17 fatal shootings since the beginning of 2005.

Philadelphia, the sixth most dangerous large city, according to Kansas-based research group Morgan Quitno Press, has seen its officer-related fatal shootings jump from two last year to 15 this year to date.

A Philadelphia police officer was shot and killed May 8, said Philadelphia police Capt. Ben Nash. The shooting, which occurred when the officer was responding to a robbery, has taken a toll on the officers mentally, he said. But the spike in the city's shootings reflects the violent crime in the community, he said.

"A lot of bad guys have guns," Nash said.

PRENDES SHOOTING

It was a sunny February day when 14-year veteran Sgt. Henry Prendes responded to a domestic violence call at 8336 Feather Duster Court, near Durango Drive and the Las Vegas Beltway.

He was confronted by a fledgling rapper with an assault-style rifle.

Prendes was shot and fell to the ground. As he began to get back up, 21-year-old Amir Rashid Crump went up to him, aimed and fired the rifle into the sergeant's head, executing him.

Crump was killed after engaging other officers in a gunbattle.

Prendes was the first Las Vegas police officer in 17 years to be slain in the line of duty.

Several sheriff's candidates disagreed with the notion that Prendes' death foreshadowed the recent officer-involved shootings, arguing instead that the increase is a symptom of the increasing violence in the community.

DOJ_NMG_0039201

"I think segments of society are getting more violent and more prone to confronting officers," said candidate Bill Conger, a 29-year veteran of the department.

"I'm sure that when we have an officer lost due to a police shooting, that would be on officers' minds," he said. "But I don't think there is now more of a willingness to use deadly force. I think it heightens their awareness of what's going on and the potential danger."

Retired Lt. Moe Mattingly, a 20-year department veteran and also a candidate for the sheriff's job, agreed.

"Officers are briefed daily on officers killed in the country," he said.

The reason is twofold, he said: to heighten the awareness of officers and remind them how dangerous the job is and to look at what the officers did or did not do that would have allowed them to be alive today.

"You also have to put the numbers in perspective. There have already been a half million (calls) so far this year, and all of those can be dangerous, and we have only had 18 officer-involved shootings," Mattingly said. In that regard, he said, the numbers are not that high.

"The 20 years I served, I never fired my weapon," Mattingly said. "But there were many times that I have come close."

Las Vegas police officer Laurie Bisch, a 13-year veteran and the only female sheriff's candidate, said the Prendes shooting was a wake-up call for many officers.

"We have criminals out there who are not afraid to use deadly force," she said. "With the population growth there comes a whole new element, and those criminals are brazen."

Bisch works patrol in the South Central Area Command, an area inundated with gangs and drug use. She said Las Vegas has developed a reputation among criminals in California and Arizona.

"They think it's easy to beat the system here. In California, they are tough with their three-strikes rule, and Arizona has tough new laws that are keeping criminals in jail for longer periods of time. Vegas is often the place of choice for these criminals."

And there are not enough officers to patrol Las Vegas, she added.

"We used to have two to three officers handling a call. Now there may only be one officer."

'LACK OF ACCOUNTABILITY'

Lichtenstein said the coroner's inquest system, which he labeled a farce, leads to a "real lack of accountability."

"When an officer knows he will go before a coroner's inquest and not be asked important, tough questions before the event, maybe the unacceptable number of police shootings is not that surprising."

One candidate running to be Clark County's next sheriff agrees.

Lt. Ron Williams said he would like to see a Blue Ribbon commission review what he believes is an outdated inquest process.

"The public trust has deteriorated in our police department because of the current system," he said. "The bottom line is we need to be more open with the public in what goes on in these situations."

Williams added that he doesn't have a problem with the current use-of-force policies.

Dean Ishman, president of the Las Vegas branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said his group is looking at the number of shootings and the situations that led to them. Five of the suspects killed this year were black.

The group is planning to present suggestions and ask for changes to the police department's deadly-force policy and the coroner's inquest process Tuesday.

"We are not coming and pointing fingers," Ishman said. "These guys do have a tough job to do, but we are still concerned about the ... surging number of officer-involved shootings."

Lichtenstein said it might be helpful for an agency such as the U.S. Justice Department to look into the matter.

But Gillespie said the system of checks and balances that includes the coroner's inquest process helps ensure that police shootings are thoroughly reviewed.

"I think our policies and procedures are sound," he said.

Bisch concurred, defending the police department's training as being the best in the nation and saying officers must abide by a strict "use of force" policy.

Bisch also pointed to the internal investigation done after an officer-involved shooting. She praised the coroner's inquest process as one that "leaves no stone unturned."

"Personally, I think it is fine the way it is. And the families have the option of pursuing the case in civil court."

Bisch said the public needs to be better educated on what to expect when contacted by the police.

DOJ_NMG_0039202

"None of us (police officers) want to be involved in a shooting," she said. "But I don't want one officer to have to worry what the public is going to think when they are doing their job. A deadly force scenario can take place in a split second. It's important the public realizes we don't have trigger-happy cops."

Sarasota Says Proposed Fines By Feds Too Onerous (HTRIB)

By Doug Sword

The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida), July 9, 2006

SARASOTA COUNTY -- Federal civil rights officials want to levy $5 million in fines, penalties and damages against Sarasota County as part of what would amount to the county admitting it discriminated against people with disabilities.

That was the negotiating stance of the U.S. Justice Department's Civil Rights Division before it filed a lawsuit June 30 against the county alleging violations of the federal Fair Housing Act.

County officials say the proposed penalties are too onerous and believe they can defend their 2004 actions which prevented Renaissance Manor, a nonprofit organization, from operating six group homes known as Tammi House in Warm Mineral Springs. The Justice Department, however, has been aggressive in defending the disabled in housing discrimination cases and has filed 94 such lawsuits against local governments, businesses and individuals since 2000. The federal demand from Sarasota County appears to be bigger even than a high-profile lawsuit that led last year to the housing authority in Baltimore agreeing to $1 million in penalties and spending several million dollars on housing for the disabled.

The Tammi House group homes are all near one another on Sevilla Street, and each house has up to six residents. The federal suit says Renaissance Manor lost more than $1 million in grants because of the county's actions. The county violated the Fair Housing Act, a federal law prohibiting discrimination against buyers or renters because of a handicap, the suit says.

County officials deny the allegations, saying they objected to the clustering of the six homes in one neighborhood. State law requires "community residential homes" to be licensed and located at least 1,000 feet from each other. Renaissance Manor, which has also sued the county, and the justice department say these are "family" homes that don't require licensing or separation.

Sarasota County commissioners are set to meet Tuesday in a rare behind-closed-doors session to discuss the new federal lawsuit and the ongoing suit with Renaissance Manor.

The last time county commissioners met in a closed-door session was in December 2004 about a legal dispute with North Port, said County Commissioner Jon Thaxton.

Thaxton called the federal lawsuit "the most serious charge" against the county during his six years as a commissioner.

Thaxton said his younger brother Bob is mentally disabled and lives in a group home in Texas with four others. The suburban setting and sense of "home" is "the best thing that ever happened to him."

"I'm a big fan of these things, and I want to support them," Thaxton said. "So for me, a member of the Board of County Commissioners, to be accused by the Department of Justice of discriminating, I not only take it seriously, I take it personally."

The consent decree proposed by the federal government was too onerous to accept, said County Administrator Jim Ley. Besides the magnitude of the fines and penalties, the document would have included an admission of wrongdoing by the county and a requirement to hire an employee to monitor the county's compliance with the Fair Housing Act.

Locating six group homes adjacent to one another defeats the purpose of what state law requires and the county wants to accomplish, Ley said. Clustering the homes creates a small "ghetto" instead of making the disabled persons in the house a part of the surrounding suburban community, he said.

The Economics Of Discrimination (WP)

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

Discrimination and economic development just don't mix. For proof, look at the Jim Crow South, where economic growth lagged the rest of the nation from the end of World War II until the mid-1960s. Racism undermined prosperity. Then, as segregation waned, economic growth accelerated.

In November, Virginians will have the chance to self-inflict a fresh discriminatory wound on their economy. The Marshall-Newman amendment, the so-called "marriage amendment," seeks to amend Virginia's Constitution to ban gay marriage and to impose other legal limitations on unmarried couples, including heterosexual couples. The amendment is not only useless -- gay marriage has been outlawed in Virginia for 30 years -- but it is downright harmful to the state's economy in two important ways.

First, the amendment makes Virginia less attractive to companies that seek top employees without regard to race, religion or sexual orientation. Capital One, for example, is one of Virginia's biggest and best employers. It provides domestic-partner benefits for unmarried employees' partners, both for same-sex and heterosexual couples. The Marshall-Newman amendment could prohibit Capital One from providing these benefits. That would make it harder for Capital One and for the 15 other Fortune 500 companies based here that provide such benefits to hire the people they want to hire in Virginia.

Second, the amendment marks our Commonwealth as a place where people who are "different" or who have "different" ideas are not welcome -- be they gay or straight. This consequence is perhaps the most serious. Economic development today is all about attracting the best, most talented and most creative employees. These workers will determine in large part whether Virginia's economy roars or whimpers and whether Virginia companies can compete against overseas firms with cheaper labor pools.

Not surprisingly, these talented workers and the high-tech, high-wage companies that employ them tend to locate in communities that are diverse and open-minded. These communities are also ones that attract gays and lesbians, and for the same reasons. In his influential book "The Rise of the Creative Class," Richard Florida notes that the most statistically reliable indicator of a successful high-tech-friendly environment is the size and vitality of the gay population. Gays and lesbians "signal a diverse and progressive environment that fosters the creativity and innovation necessary for success in high-tech industry." That environment attracts talented gays but, in far larger numbers, it also attracts talented heterosexuals who want to work for companies and in communities that respect diversity and individual freedom. Virginia needs that type of environment if it wants to attract the best companies and most talented employees.

Virginia tried the economics of discrimination once before. It didn't work in the 1950s and '60s, and it left our state's economy at the bottom of the national heap. Surely we have learned from that.

Virginians should vote no this fall on the Marshall-Newman amendment not only because it's wrong but also because it's bad for business.

-- Michael Schewel Richmond was Virginia's secretary of commerce and trade under Gov. Mark R. Warner (D).

Gay Marriage Fight Crosses The Hudson (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

Now that New York's highest court declined to legalize gay marriage last week, where's the next battleground?

Next door, in New Jersey. Gay rights advocates are storing hopes in that state's Supreme Court, which will most likely rule on the issue sometime this summer; a similar case is also pending in Washington State.

Lawyers on both sides of the issue said New Jersey might legalize gay marriage when New York did not.

"As a general matter, the court has maintained an expansive view of its Constitution," said Lawrence S. Lustberg, who argued before the New Jersey court in February in favor of gay marriage. "The focus has long been on safeguarding rights."

The New Jersey court usually applies a more flexible standard in discrimination cases than the New York court. And in arguments, the New Jersey judges did not dwell on child-rearing or the needs of parents, central issues in the New York decision.

Even if the court legalizes same-sex marriage, it might not reverberate nationally. "I'm not sure New Jersey will matter much in the nationwide contest over gay marriage, simply because of the reputation of the New Jersey Supreme Court," said Monte Stewart, president of the Marriage Law Foundation, which opposes gay marriage.

'Gettysburg' For Gay Marriage? (WP)

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

The decision by a New York court changes little.

THE DECISION last week by New York's highest court not to legalize same-sex marriage is being portrayed as a big defeat for gay rights activists. Monte Stewart, president of the traditionalist Marriage Law Foundation, told the New York Times: "When people look back and write the history of this issue, they will view the New York decision as the Gettysburg in this big contest." New York was among a relatively small number of states whose courts might plausibly have followed the lead of the Massachusetts high court in requiring marriage equality. Its refusal to do so suggests that the high-water mark of judicial recognition of marriage rights for gay men and lesbians might not be all that high.

Yet since the Massachusetts decision in 2003, it's become clear that democratic majorities, not judges, ultimately will decide how evenhanded state marriage laws are going to be. In many states, ballot initiatives have preempted any litigation by amending state constitutions to prohibit same-sex marriage. In others, legislatures have moved to liberalize marriage laws. Even in Massachusetts, where the courts purported to resolve the issue, an amendment to overturn the decision could be in front of voters in 2008.

In other words, the most a state court can do is change the legal baseline. State laws, and even state constitutions, are generally easy enough to change that courts cannot force same-sex marriage on an unwilling populace. The fight for marriage equality in New York will simply move to the legislative arena.

So the task for Americans who support same-sex marriage, as we do, has not changed. It is to convince a majority that couples who love each ought to have the state's recognition for lifelong relationships -- and that such recognition poses no threat to heterosexual marriage. Once that happens, it won't matter what the New York court thinks. And until that happens, no victory there, or in any state court, will be safe.

Long Haul To Acceptance (WP)

30 Years On, Gains and Trials for Women at Annapolis

The words were spoken 30 years ago, and yet they are as jarring as they were the day when Sharon Hanley arrived at the U.S. Naval Academy -- 17 years old and about to make history as one of the first female undergraduates.

"I don't like you here," she recalls an upperclassman telling her. "I don't like women at my school, and so I'm going to be on your butt every waking minute. . . . If my plan works, you're going to be long gone before I graduate. Is that clear?"

She remembers her shock and dismay, then her momentary confusion about how to answer. As a plebe, she was not allowed to object or comment.

"Yes, sir," was all she could say.

Now, on the 30th anniversary of the integration of women in the Naval Academy, Sharon Hanley Disher finds herself in history's view again, the first of the earliest female graduates to be followed to Annapolis by a daughter. She watched teary-eyed in the late June heat as her daughter and son, who are twins, stood solemnly in Navy whites for their swearing-in on the campus's tree-lined grounds.

They are part of an academy class that includes a record number of women -- 22.4 percent, compared with 6 percent in the beginning -- and comes together as the country is at war, with women serving on destroyers and in fighter planes.

But though much has improved since women first arrived -- and many female graduates express great loyalty to the storied 161-year-old institution -- a complex and sometimes troubling portrait of student life emerges from three recent studies sponsored by the Defense Department.

The most recent study found that in the 2004-05 school year, 59 percent of female midshipmen and 14 percent of men reported sexual harassment, defined as crude and offensive behavior, unwanted sexual attention or sexual coercion. Sexist behavior -- put-downs and offensive comments -- was reported by 93 percent of women and 50 percent of men.

What the academy experience is like for young women is coming into greater focus as Congress looks into the subject and as the quarterback on the academy's football team faces a court-martial trial starting tomorrow on a charge of raping a female midshipman.

All of this happens as three decades of gender integration are marked this month, with women recalling their unsettling early days in a college dedicated to the making of military men.

"The name of our game was survival," Disher said. The attitude was "boys will be boys and 'You're coming to an all-male school; what did you expect?' " At her home in Annapolis last week, Disher happened upon a C-SPAN broadcast of Vice Adm. Rodney P. Rempt, the academy's superintendent, testifying before Congress.

"Sexual harassment and misconduct and assault should not be tolerated in the Navy-Marine Corps," he said, "and I can assure you that they are not tolerated at your Naval Academy."

To Disher, this was another sign of changed times. "You have to talk about the problem to fix it," she said.

Meagan Varley was 10 when she decided to become a fighter pilot. She had seen the movie "Top Gun" and set her heart on flying. Her father, a teacher, suggested the Naval Academy, and in 1998 she found herself on the Annapolis campus as part of a class that was 16 percent female.

"You're aware that the things you do are going to be watched more closely and that you could be stereotyped more easily," she said. But as time went on, she found that her sex "kind of faded into the background."

Flight school followed graduation, and now, four years later, she is a fighter pilot, having flown F-14 Tomcats and F/A-18F Super Hornets, opportunities not open to the first female graduates. "They really broke the way for the rest of us," she said.

In the early years, women had fewer job choices because, under law, they could not serve on combatant ships or aircraft. Those who did not want women at the academy often complained that they were taking men's slots but could not do men's jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0039205

That complaint grew louder in 1979, when Washingtonian magazine published an article, "Women Can't Fight," by James Webb, a much-heralded academy graduate and Marine war hero who is now the Democratic candidate for U.S. Senate in Virginia. He wrote then that the presence of women poisoned the academy's mission and that the academy's massive dormitory was "a horny woman's dream."

"The men went crazy; they loved it," recalled Disher, who wrote a book, "First Class," about women's experiences.

Webb has said recently that the article was published a long time ago and that as secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration he tripled the number of jobs that were open to women and ordered a crackdown on sexual harassment.

An array of jobs opened to women in the early 1990s, and after that, said Georgia Sadler, a retired Navy captain and the academy's first female faculty member, women "didn't feel so much like second-class citizens."

As more women enter the academy -- 273 this year, up from 81 in 1976 -- they have come closer to achieving a "critical mass" that ceases to be seen as a minority, said Mady Wechsler Segal of the Center for Research on Military Organizations at the University of Maryland. She put the tipping point at 25 to 35 percent.

Meghan O'Mara, Class of 2002, was never sexually harassed, but she said she "certainly had people who said inappropriate things" to her.

O'Mara, 26 and honorably discharged from the Navy, said more openness is needed, recalling the time one of her friends reported a rape. Academy officials, she said, "were definitely trying to make her keep quiet about it. . . . I don't think the environment makes a lot of women feel they can come forward and there will be a fair response."

That kind of concern touched off a 2003 scandal at the Air Force Academy, amid revelations of more than 140 reported rapes and sexual assaults over 10 years.

Since then, government studies have looked into harassment and sexual assault at the service academies. A recent Defense Department survey of midshipmen found that more than half of women who said they had been sexually assaulted did not report it. In all, 83 of 652 women -- more than 12 percent -- said they were victims of sexual assault between 1999 and 2004, the report said.

It also noted that women "do not report sexual harassment because they live and deal with it daily; it almost becomes normal. . . . They fear being ostracized and abandoned by their peers, both male and female."

One woman wrote that the academy was "one of the most emotionally devastating places I can imagine. Most of the women came here expecting mental and physical challenges. We thought we'd have to put up with overdoses of testosterone. What we did not expect was to be looked down upon for being women -- to be suddenly less than human in their eyes."

Before Congress, Rempt spoke of efforts to improve training and reporting. He cited an academy survey that found that 5 percent of women believe they would be resented by peers for reporting harassment, down from 50 percent five years ago.

In 2001, surrounded by hundreds of classmates, Candice Sarlese climbed up a lard-slicked granite monument, called Herndon, at the end of her plebe year. It is a tradition, and Sarlese had heard about women being pushed off. For her, it was different. A fellow midshipman turned to her and said, "Don't worry. I'm not going to let you fall."

Sarlese, 25 and now a first lieutenant in the Marines, said she believes some women "look for things. Some guys will make a joke, and they will take it as hurtful."

Over 30 years, relations between women and men have become better and more complex.

Sandee Irwin, part of the first class, recalls the insult of a midshipman two years her junior. "Why are you here, anyway?" he sniped.

Irwin took the young man aside and told him squarely: "You knew we were here when you signed your name on that piece of paper. If you don't like it, go home!"

Disher, the 1976 plebe, recalls blatant hostility after she joined the cheerleading team.

Worst of all was an Army-Navy football pep rally, in her second year on campus, she said. As Disher and the other cheerleaders came bouncing out onstage, the crowd stopped clapping.

"Get off the stage!" she heard. Then boos. "Get out of my school!"

A generation and more than 2,770 female graduates later, Disher had no reservations about sending her twins to the academy, where they will be part of the Class of 2010, with women such as Ashley Houston, 18.

"I think women are just as capable as men," said Chelsea Wright, 18, of Valley Forge, Pa., getting her hair cut to above the collar -- not far from where men were being shorn to the nub -- as she imagined herself on a Navy ship or jet, possibly in combat.

"I'm sure the level of respect has changed" over 30 years, ventured Margaret Boyle, 17, of Leonardtown.

The young man next to her in line nodded in agreement.

"I'd rather have them here than not," said John Howser, 17. "I've grown up with them."

ANTITRUST:

Talk Of Alliance Is Opening Floodgate Analysis (FREEP)

By John Gallagher, Free Press Business Writer

Detroit Free Press, July 9, 2006

GM drama offers many endings

As General Motors Corp. formally began Friday to explore a possible alliance with Nissan Motor Co. and Renault SA, the process seemed firmly in the hands of GM Chairman and CEO Rick Wagoner.

But in the world of corporate mergers and acquisitions, events can quickly spin out of control.

So far, there's nothing in the proffered Nissan-Renault overture to buy part of GM to indicate it's anything but friendly. But even this mild-mannered gesture could lift the lid off a box of snakes.

A rival suitor could ante up a better offer. At some point, GM's Board of Directors might launch a spirited, even ugly, defense. And talk of a GM deal might stimulate merger or takeover offers to cross-town rival Ford Motor Co.

Auto insiders doubt any of those possibilities will happen this time. Most GM watchers expect the company to politely study the Nissan-Renault overture before turning it down.

Even so, with the fate of the world's biggest automaker on the line, along with the jobs and livelihoods of tens of thousands of metro Detroiters, the unexpected becomes the expected.

Beyond a potential three-way alliance, other possibilities include:

Another suitor turns up. Once two or more companies initiate friendly discussions about a deal, it is common for another, unfriendly suitor to make a rival offer.

Wall Street's most notorious example came in 1988. As recounted in the popular book and movie "Barbarians at the Gate," F. Ross Johnson, RJR Nabisco's chief executive, initiated a buyout plan to take his own company private. Other bidders suddenly jumped in, most notably the leverage-buyout experts at Kohlberg Kravis Roberts.

The battle escalated into a frenzy of bidding and defensive moves. KKR finally won, paying $25 billion for the company.

Jim Seward, professor of finance at the University of Wisconsin at Madison who has studied mergers and acquisitions, said something like that could happen with GM.

"This certainly puts them in play, as far as I'm concerned," he said. "If anybody is out there waiting in the wings, this will probably nudge them to step up and move forward."

A multi-party battle is possible, but some industry watchers think it's unlikely, given GM's daunting problems, including its high labor, pension and health-care costs, and its declining market share.

"Anything is possible, I suppose," said M.P. Narayanan, professor of finance at the University of Michigan. "But I can't see why GM is such an attractive takeover candidate for most car companies."

Ford becomes a target. David Cole, chairman of the Center for Automotive Research in Ann Arbor, said the proposed GM deal has Wall Street analysts talking about a similar deal for Ford.

"Once something like this starts, then you have a lot of people thinking, 'What does that mean for us? Maybe we better get moving. What other deals are out there?' In that sense, Ford is really inexpensive, too, and could be a good partner for somebody," Cole said.

Experts on mergers and acquisitions say the auto industry long has been ripe for consolidation.

"Certainly throughout history, M&A transactions have occurred in waves," said Seward of the University of Wisconsin. "And those waves tend to have an industry concentration to them."

He cited telecommunications as an industry that has been consolidating rapidly in recent years. A century ago, steel, oil and auto manufacturing all went through waves of mergers and takeovers.

"Once something like this starts, it's kind of like a disease. It's contagious," Cole said. "There are too many players in the game right now, and we're going to see some form of consolidation, and this is often the way something starts."

Politicians get involved. In late 2002, Simon Property Group of Indianapolis launched a hostile takeover bid for Taubman Centers Inc., the Bloomfield Hills-based mall company founded by A. Alfred Taubman. The nasty fight dragged on for almost a year, costing each side millions of dollars.

Simon finally withdrew its offer after Taubman-friendly Michigan lawmakers passed anti-takeover legislation to thwart the attempt.

Over the past several years, proposed combinations between Northwest and Continental airlines in one case, and United and US Airways in another, collapsed after the U.S. Justice Department raised anti-trust objections.

DOJ_NMG_0039207

Since the GM-Nissan-Renault alliance would be international, other governing bodies, such as the European Union, could raise their own objections.

The least likely outcome. In a way, the least likely outcome is that nothing happens -- that Nissan-Renault simply goes away after GM rejects its overture.

Kirk Kerkorian, the mercurial investor and GM shareholder who prompted the alliance talks, gives no indication that he's in any mood for a letdown. As GM's largest individual shareholder, Kerkorian has pushed relentlessly to unlock what he perceives to be the company's unrealized value.

Seward suggested this week that if the Nissan-Renault plan doesn't work, Kerkorian would try again with someone else.

"In the end," he said, "Kerkorian is the kind of guy who doesn't care who pays him, as long as he gets paid."

Texas Lawsuit Includes A Mix Of Race And Water (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

DeBERRY, Tex. — Frank and Earnestene Roberson no longer need to drive the 23 miles to a Wal-Mart near Shreveport for a safe drink of water.

Instead, it is delivered to them in five-gallon jugs, courtesy of the Environmental Protection Agency.

But they and neighbors in this historically black enclave in the East Texas oilfields seem no closer to being able to drink, cook or bathe safely from their own wells since the E.P.A. found the groundwater contaminated with pollutants that included arsenic, benzene, lead and mercury.

Calling themselves victims of "environmental racism," community members in June filed suit in federal court, accusing the Texas Railroad Commission, which regulates the state's oil and gas industry, of failing to enforce safety regulations and of "intentionally giving citizens false information based on their race and economic status."

The commission said it had yet to receive formal notice of the lawsuit and had no comment on it.

But almost two decades after Mrs. Roberson first began complaining, setting off years of inconclusive state inquiries, the agency says it is now moving against a large oilfield services company that deposited wastes at a nearby disposal site that has since been closed.

The inspector general of the E.P.A. is also concluding a separate investigation into the handling of the problem.

With 30,000 oilfield waste disposal sites throughout Texas, there is no clear evidence that the community here was singled out for dumping, although residents said it followed a pattern, documented by the E.P.A., of pollution hazards that disproportionately affect minorities.

They said that pleas for help, including letters to President Bush, were bounced from one agency to another, and that their treatment stood in sharp contrast to a $1.7 million cleanup last summer by the railroad commission in Manvel, a largely white suburb of Houston.

"They worked very fast and were very diligent," said Mayor Delores M. Martin of Manvel.

Resentment is dying hard among the Robersons and their relatives on County Road 329. They are the descendants of a black settler, George Adams, who paid $279 and a mule for 40 acres here in 1911.

"This is America? It looks worse than the third world," said the Rev. David Hudson, the Robersons' nephew. Mr. Hudson, a retired California radio and television station manager, pointed out where wells had been plugged and where an elderly relative died last year in a home cut off from running water.

"I look at this as poisoning the only source of groundwater," he said, "as tantamount to lynching."

The tangled history of the disposal site, which began around 1980 as a deep injection well for saltwater wastes from drilling operations, makes apportioning blame difficult. Since then, according to records of the railroad commission, the disposal site has been under the control of six different operators. It was last operated by Basic Energy Services of Midland, which describes itself on its Web site as the nation's third largest contractor servicing oil and gas wells and used open holding tanks to store waste for pumping to a second injection well nearby.

DOJ_NMG_0039208

The railroad commission said that Basic Energy had operated the tanks for more than two years without a permit, resulting in a demand by Panola County in 2003 that the disposal line under the county road be shut down. The commission has been asking the company to track any migration of pollution.

"Basic has been slow to respond to our requests," said John Tintera, the commission's assistant director for site remediation.

Ken Huseman, the president and chief executive of Basic Energy, would not respond to specific questions but said in a statement that the company's goal was to have no adverse impact on the environment, and that it would be responsive to the railroad commission.

But Mr. Hudson, who runs a local family ministry and teaches at the Church of the Living God, said the commission had close ties to the industry and had denied that DeBerry had a problem.

Mr. Hudson said he had directed his appeals, in vain, to the sole black member of the commission, Michael L. Williams, a former assistant secretary of education for civil rights at the federal Department of Education. A spokeswoman said Mr. Williams could not comment on the DeBerry case because it was "still in enforcement."

Mr. Hudson recently settled a state civil lawsuit against Basic Energy under terms that remain confidential. "We didn't get enough to get shoelaces," he said.

The lawsuit was settled, he said, after his lawyer found that the railroad commission had fined one of the site's operators, Falco S & D Inc. of Shreveport, La., $27,747 in 2000 for having illegally dumped about 3,000 barrels of chemical waste there. That made it difficult to determine Basic Energy's liability, Mr. Hudson said.

The E.P.A. has acknowledged a potential danger in the groundwater. "We found that the groundwater in the Panola County community is indeed contaminated with several substances," wrote Johnny D. Ross, project manager in the Inspector General's office in a January memo. Those substances, Mr. Ross wrote, "pose a threat to human health and the environment."

In 2003, the railroad commission found in residents' wells benzene, barium, arsenic, cadmium, lead and mercury "at concentrations exceeding primary drinking water standards," said Peter Pope, a specialist with the commission.

But the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality, in tests taken last August, found no excessive contamination there, said Andrea Morrow, a spokeswoman. She said she could not explain the discrepancy.

The problems go back at least to 1987 when, railroad commission records show, Mrs. Roberson began complaining of spillovers from the injection well. Her well water was discoloring her bathtub, she reported, "and it causes bad stomach problems when consumed."

The railroad commission took samples in October 1996, finding "no contamination in the Robersons' household supply water that can be attributed to oilfield sources."

By April 2003, however, commission tests found barium and chloride above maximum contaminant levels in Mr. Hudson's well, along with traces of two oilfield chemicals. The source was unclear. He plugged his well and moved to another house connected to the Bethany-Panola Public Water System.

Last year, Mr. Hudson said he obtained a $375,000 federal loan to connect the community to the same municipal supply, but the water company, concerned that the residents would be unable to repay the money, rejected the application.

The E.P.A. arranged last August for the delivery of bottled water to the Robersons and others with tainted wells. Some residents, however, have been less fortunate. Maggie Golden, a 73-year-old cousin of Mr. Hudson's mother, had been getting water piped in by Basic Energy to replace her hand-pumped spring-fed system which had been contaminated, said her sister, Mary Lee Kellum, a Houston teacher.

"Then all of a sudden they cut it off," Ms. Kellum said.

Mr. Hudson said he appealed to Basic Energy, which restored the water for about a month but then shut it off after the disposal site was closed down. They drank bottled water, but to bathe, Ms. Kellum said, "we'd go to the church and borrow water in big barrels and heat it up: the pioneer days were back again."

Her sister died in the house on June 17, 2005, Ms. Kellum said. "She just went to sleep during the night," she said. "It was stressful stuff. She said, 'I'm tired of struggling.' "

IMMIGRATION:

GOP Immigration Tactic: Blast Away, But Be Nice (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi And Mark Z. Barabak, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0039209

Still split themselves, candidates hammer Democrats but try not to alienate Latino voters.

DENVER — Hoping to use the volatile issue of illegal immigration to avert a November election disaster, Republican candidates across the country increasingly are attacking their Democratic opponents on the subject.

But mindful of a possible voter backlash, they are attempting to do so without seeming intolerant or divisive.

In Pennsylvania, Sen. Rick Santorum has launched an ad accusing his challenger of favoring amnesty for people in the country illegally and giving them "preference over American workers." Rep. Bob Beauprez criticizes his Democratic opponent in the Colorado governor's race for supporting state benefits for illegal immigrants. In the Chicago suburbs, congressional hopeful David McSweeney is attacking Democratic incumbent Melissa Bean on immigration — even though she voted in favor of the crackdown bill that passed the House in December.

Immigration is a tricky issue for Republicans, and there are deep divisions in the party over what policy and strategy to pursue.

Many blame former California Gov. Pete Wilson's backing in 1994 of anti-illegal-immigrant Proposition 187 for alienating Latinos nationwide.

In California, it sparked a wave of Latino political activism that hurt the GOP's political standing — a blow from which the party has yet to fully recover.

Still, Republican strategists have "made a decision that, whatever the risk, this is simply a very bad year and the issue is too hot not to put it in the quiver," said Floyd Ciruli, a Denver-based independent pollster.

The stepped-up Republican assault comes as House GOP leaders began a nationwide series of hearings last week bashing the Senate's bipartisan immigration bill, which they have branded the "Kennedy-Reid" bill — focusing on two prominent Democratic supporters while ignoring the lead Republican sponsor, Sen. John McCain of Arizona.

The linguistic dodge reflects the wide split in the GOP over two competing approaches to immigration. President Bush and pro-business Republicans favor a guest worker program and path to citizenship contained in a bill approved by the Senate.

The president reiterated his support for a guest worker program Friday during a press conference in Chicago. "To enforce this border, we've got to have a rational way that recognizes there are people sneaking across to do work Americans aren't doing," he said.

But hard-liners in the party back the tough measures contained in the House's enforcement-only legislation and fiercely oppose the president's guest worker approach.

The official GOP position is that the party will not use immigration as a political bludgeon against Democrats. Karl Rove, the president's chief political advisor, has made courting Latinos a priority through his years in the White House and has avoided the harsh rhetoric used to rally partisans on other issues.

"It's extremely important that our party be a party of principle, which is to say we're a pro-law enforcement and pro-immigrant party," said Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, who worked alongside Rove in Bush's 2004 reelection campaign.

Still, many Republicans hope a tough-on-illegal-immigration platform can help overcome the political drag of an unpopular president and growing public sentiment against the war in Iraq in November's midterm election.

"That is voiced around here often," Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), a House leader in the immigration debate, said in a telephone interview from the Capitol. "The plates have shifted politically, and if you want to get elected, you better not be perceived as being soft on illegal immigration."

Democrats say the GOP assault comes at the party's own peril, especially with immigration bills stalled by infighting in Washington.

"Republicans have signaled they're going to run a single-issue campaign on an issue on which they ultimately don't have a single accomplishment," scoffed Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

In some states, Democrats are more hawkish on illegal immigration than their GOP rivals. In Nebraska, for instance, Sen. Ben Nelson is running to the right of his Republican challenger, who backs Bush's proposed guest worker program.

But analysts say the immigration issue could be most potent in the hands of Republicans, who traditionally are associated with a tougher stance against lawbreaking.

"The focus in Washington has been almost exclusively on the risk among Republicans," said Amy Walter, who tracks congressional races for Washington's nonpartisan Cook Political Report. "But there are also Democrats, especially Democrats in conservative-leaning districts, who may also have to find themselves distancing themselves from the national party."

With the election four months away and several key states still conducting primaries, the shape of the fall contests is evolving. In some places, including California, immigration does not seem to be as significant in the major statewide contests.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and his challenger, Democratic state Treasurer Phil Angelides, show no sign of making it a campaign wedge issue.

Republicans were encouraged last month, though, when their candidate for California's 50th Congressional District, Brian Bilbray, won with a tough-on-illegal-immigration platform in a special election to fill the seat vacated by Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

But in an example of the issue's treacherous terrain, efforts by Tancredo and other hard-liners to unseat incumbent Republican Rep. Chris Cannon in Utah failed a few weeks later. Cannon, who supports a guest worker program but also voted for the House bill, won 56% of the vote June 27 in a state that prides itself on welcoming newcomers.

In Colorado, illegal immigration has become a defining issue in both the gubernatorial race and in statehouse contests. The state Supreme Court last month removed from the November ballot a proposed initiative to ban state services to illegal immigrants.

The state's termed-out Republican governor, Bill Owens, has called a special session of the Legislature to pass a ban on services such as the one called for in the initiative — or to put it back on the ballot in November. Democrats objected but, under intense political pressure, eventually agreed to a compromise agenda and started the session Thursday.

Bill Ritter, the Democratic nominee for governor, opposed the ballot initiative and spoke against the special session. His opponent, Beauprez, seized on that in his first radio ad: "It's an outrage, isn't it?" Beauprez says in the spot. "When our own government refuses to enforce our laws against illegal immigration … Bill Ritter and I disagree on this, but I oppose taxpayer benefits for illegal immigrants."

In an interview, Beauprez said it was logical to talk about illegal immigration. "It's the top issue for everyone," he said.

Ritter has struck back, accusing Beauprez of being part of the logjam in the Capitol that has allowed problems to fester. "This has been a failure on the part of Washington, D.C.," Ritter said in an interview. He added that his role model on the issue was none other than Bush. "The person I'm closest to on this is the president of the United States," Ritter said, underscoring the paradox the issue often presents.

Bush's agreement with many Democrats on a guest worker program and on finding a way to legalize the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the country makes it tougher for party hard-liners to draw contrasts in the fall. "It makes brand distinction more difficult," said Tancredo.

Some Republicans say they're trying to be careful so they don't offend legal immigrants as they go after those here illegally.

"The language that has been used in the past … turned off people in the Hispanic community," said McSweeney, a Republican investment banker challenging Bean in Illinois' 8th Congressional District. "As a party, we need to make sure we're being inclusive and framing this issue as law and order, not some kind of measure to keep out of this country just a certain group of people."

McSweeney has attacked Bean for taking varying stands on immigration. The Bean campaign rejects that assertion, saying she has been consistent and contending that the challenger has been taking procedural votes in Congress out of context.

In Pennsylvania, Santorum's first TV ad stresses that his grandparents were legal Italian immigrants, then decries illegal immigration.

In a separate radio spot, he bashes his Democratic challenger, Bob Casey, for supporting the Senate immigration bill. "How liberal has Casey become?" the ad asks. Santorum voted against the bill.

"There's a huge contrast between Sen. Santorum and his opponent on this issue, and Pennsylvania citizens deserve to know that," said Virginia Davis, a campaign spokeswoman.

Larry Smar, a spokesman for Casey, contended that Santorum is trying to exploit an issue he's rarely talked about or acted upon. "Santorum was pretty quiet on illegal immigration until the Senate vote," he said.

Recently, Santorum made a point of dropping by a Philadelphia cheesesteak stand made famous for hanging a sign demanding that all customers speak English.

A 2004 Call For Overhaul Set Showdown In Motion (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

The nation's immigration policies are a hot topic both in Congress and around the country. Following are some frequently asked questions.

--

DOJ_NMG_0039211

Question: What sparked the current furor over immigration laws?

Answer: Early in 2004, President Bush called for a general overhaul of the U.S. immigration system. Speaking of "millions of hardworking men and women condemned to fear and insecurity in a massive, undocumented economy," Bush urged Congress to rewrite the laws to allow the nation's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants to gain legal status "as temporary workers." This would allow the U.S. to draw people out of the shadows and improve security, Bush argued. Then, as now, Bush stressed four other elements of an overhaul: controlling the country's borders, imposing sanctions on employers who hire illegally, creating a guest worker program for seasonal industries, and emphasizing assimilation for immigrants already here. Soon after, the House and Senate began drafting their own legislation.

Q: What did Congress do?

A: Without holding public hearings, the House, in less than two weeks in December 2005, passed a bill that addressed only border control issues. That enforcement-only bill would build a 700-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexico border, make illegal presence a felony, criminalize those who help illegal immigrants, and increase fines for noncompliant employers. After months of tough negotiations — and after large rallies in Los Angeles, New York, Washington and other major cities by pro-immigrant advocates — the Senate responded in May with a bill that included not only enforcement, but also a guest worker program and a path toward legal status for most illegal immigrants.

Q: What is happening with the immigration bills now?

A: Instead of starting negotiations on a final bill, the House announced that it would spend the summer holding town-hall-style hearings on the Senate bill. The Senate then announced its own summer hearings.

--

Q: Why are the House and Senate holding these hearings?

A: House Majority Leader Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) has said the hearings are intended to "strengthen our hand going in" to talks with the Senate. Critics say House leaders are demagoguing the issue, using the hearings to stir passion among the Republican Party's conservative base in advance of the fall elections. Senators say their sessions are meant to inform the public about why they think their approach is best.

Q: How common is it for the House to announce public hearings on a Senate bill?

A: It is highly unusual. House historian Robert Remini told Bloomberg News that he was "unaware of any other instance" when congressional leaders held hearings on the other chamber's proposal before negotiating on a final bill.

Q: Why does it matter if the House takes the time to hold hearings?

A: The hearings, which cost taxpayer dollars, increase the possibility that attempts to revamp immigration law will fail because this session of Congress will run out of time. The hearings continue into August, so negotiations on a final bill will not start until after Labor Day. But lawmakers traditionally avoid serious business in the run-up to November elections, and Congress has other issues on its plate. The issue may not be resolved until a lame-duck session after the elections. If lawmakers cannot pass a law at that point, they will have to start from scratch in the next Congress.

Q: Why are the Senate and House having trouble reaching an agreement?

A: The core conflict between the two chambers is about current illegal immigrants. House Republicans decry the Senate's "amnesty" provision, as they call it, which gives illegal immigrants a way to gain legal status. They see it as rewarding lawbreakers, and they argue that tough enforcement measures at work sites would force people to leave the United States because they would no longer be able to find jobs. Senate bill supporters say that approach is not enough, pointing to estimates that 500,000 people enter the country illegally every year despite more than $20 billion in government spending on enforcement over the last decade. Many senators are skeptical that illegal immigrants would go home, and say that Congress has to deal with them to avoid creating a permanent fugitive underclass. Bush has said that illegal immigrants come to support their families by accepting jobs that "Americans won't do."

--

Q: Why do House Republicans oppose an approach Bush backs?

DOJ_NMG_0039212

A: With elections looming and Bush's approval ratings in a slump, House Republicans feel they can ignore the president. They argue that they are more in tune with American opinion than the president or the Senate, and that the people want border security first.

--

Q: What is the White House doing?

A: In recent weeks, as it appeared that the hearings would delay and possibly derail talks, Bush and administration officials such as Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez have been speaking often about the need to act and about the benefits of a Senate-style bill. Tuesday in Los Angeles, White House political strategist Karl Rove is scheduled to speak about immigration at the annual conference of the National Council of La Raza, a Latino civil rights and advocacy organization.

--

Q: What are the chances of a House-Senate compromise?

A: Speaking in Chicago on Friday, Bush sounded upbeat about the prospects for compromise. "We're working in Washington to reconcile the differences…. It's not an easy assignment. But I'm confident … we can get a comprehensive bill done," he said.

One possibility lawmakers are considering is adding "triggers" into a final bill, so that provisions such as a guest worker program could start only after certain benchmarks were met. That would enable the House to claim victory for its enforcement-first approach, and still allow the Senate's other proposals to follow. Senators argue that their bill works this way in practice, and say that border security improvements have already begun. The crucial question involves what kind of triggers might be chosen. One senator tried to add an amendment to the Senate bill that would have required the secretary of Homeland Security to certify that the border was secure before any other steps could be taken. That measure was defeated, because critics said it would be impossible ever to certify complete security along the 3,000-mile southern border.

Q: What is the next step for organizers of the pro-immigrant rallies earlier this year?

A: Immigrant advocates are working on a "Democracy Summer" campaign, registering voters for the November elections and helping immigrants who are legal permanent residents to gain U.S. citizenship.

Clinton Praises Bush On Immigration Reform (AP)

By Robert Jablon

AP, July 9, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton praised President Bush on Saturday for supporting reforms that would allow millions of illegal immigrants to seek citizenship but said the debate in Congress is being fomented by Republicans who want to divide America.

"I'm proud of him for doing it and I thanked him for doing it," he said of Bush during a "Cafe con Clinton" breakfast speech to the annual conference of the National Council of La Raza, the nation's largest Hispanic civil rights advocacy group.

Clinton said Bush's roots in Texas — which has one of the nation's largest Hispanic populations — have helped him view immigrants as people rather than statistics.

"It's hard to demonize people if you know them," he said.

But Clinton also argued that the nation's government is controlled by Republican ideological hard-liners who want to use immigration to divide Americans and distract them from issues such as the war in Iraq and the health care crisis.

Instead of equal opportunity, they support a "financial elite" because they favor "concentrated wealth and power," Clinton said.

"They believe in a government that is secret, unaccountable and that maximizes its own power," he said. "They really believe the world works better if they run it and we keep our mouths shut."

Clinton supported an immigration reform measure passed by the Senate that would provide a way for many of the estimated 12 million foreigners living in the country illegally to become citizens. A House-approved bill would make illegal immigrants felons and build 700 miles of border walls. House and Senate negotiators so far have not been able to work out a compromise.

Bush has said he wants to enforce the borders so fewer people sneak across but also provide a way for those already in the United States to become legal. He has praised Hispanic immigrants as hardworking and family oriented. Clinton used similar language in his own speech.

The message played well with La Raza, which opposes the House bill and whose current president, Janet Murguia, was an assistant in the Clinton White House.

DOJ_NMG_0039213

Before Clinton's speech, Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa noted a string of rallies over the immigration issue, including one in March that sent 500,000 people into the streets of Los Angeles and garnered international attention.

"You literally reshaped the political landscape of our nation ... we can still see a movement blooming before our very eyes," he said.

Both Democrats and Republicans have been looking for ways to court Hispanics, whose fast-growing population gives them the potential to become an enormous voting force. Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove, was scheduled to address the convention on Tuesday.

Clinton Speaks Out On Illegal Workers (LAT)

By Jeffrey L. Rabin, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

Addressing the La Raza event, he calls the debate a divisive distraction.

Former President Clinton told one of the nation's largest Latino civil rights groups Saturday that the conservative wing of the Republican Party is using the immigration issue to divide Congress and the nation.

"It is a way of creating a divided community and distracting people from the real challenges facing the country, whether it is in Iraq and Afghanistan, or homeland security, or how to build a clean energy future, or how to solve the healthcare crisis, or how to create new jobs for America," he said.

Clinton made the remarks, some of his most extensive since the issue of illegal immigration heated up in Washington this year, before several thousand people at the opening session of the four-day National Council of La Raza convention in Los Angeles.

He was welcomed to the event, key for those who hope to sway Latino voters, by Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and later greeted Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in the parking area. Clinton's appearance comes as competing congressional proposals for immigration reform are being debated this summer in committee hearings around the country.

Clinton said hard-liners are "basically saying these undocumented broke the law, send them home — never mind that they are 5% of the workforce and a far bigger percentage in certain critical areas."

"It's crazy to think about sending 11 million people home" to their native countries, said the former president, who called the recent demonstrations for immigrant rights "incredibly moving."

He said he favors the Senate's approach to changing immigration laws, although there are some elements of the bill he dislikes. The Senate legislation would enhance border security, create a guest worker program and put most of the nation's illegal immigrants in line for citizenship.

"At least it says we ought to provide a path to citizenship for these hard-working, law-abiding people," Clinton said. "We ought to do it in a way that does not put them ahead of those who patiently waited in the legal process."

Clinton, perhaps in deference to his wife, Hillary's, presidential ambitions, has been all but silent on the immigration issue in recent months. He was careful Saturday to stake out middle ground, crediting prominent members of both parties who had shown a willingness to collaborate. (After a lengthy silence of her own, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) in May endorsed a legalization process for illegal immigrants, but emphasized the importance of protecting national security.)

Bill Clinton thanked President Bush for siding with moderates in his own party regarding immigration. He suggested that Bush had a different understanding of the immigration issue because of his ties to Texas, where Latinos have been part of the history and culture for many generations. "It's hard to demonize people if you know 'em."

Clinton said he agreed with New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, a Republican, that it was important to talk about the enormous consequences to the nation's economy if the House of Representatives version of immigration reform becomes law. That bill stresses enforcement, making illegal immigration a crime and beefing up sanctions against employers of undocumented workers.

Clinton also praised Villaraigosa's view of "America as a family, an inclusive family, a family that will let everyone in."

Clinton received a sustained standing ovation from the members of the council, which includes Latino officials and activists from across the nation. Clinton, 59, appeared rested, healthy and cheered by his warm welcome. He enjoyed strong support from Latinos during his two terms as president.

Clinton's speech underscored some of his core political values. "America is and always will be a nation of immigrants," he said. "We have to create one America based on our diversity, not trying to deny it."

He urged his audience to acknowledge that steps must be taken to strengthen border security.

As Clinton left the Los Angeles Convention Center he briefly crossed paths with Schwarzenegger.

DOJ_NMG_0039214

The Republican governor, who is seeking reelection in November, joined Villaraigosa in officially opening the convention's vast exhibit area, where major corporations and businesses seek to build ties with the nation's growing Latino population.

As they toured the exhibit hall, Villaraigosa and Schwarzenegger stopped at a booth honoring Latinos in the military who had received Medals of Honor. The pair later discussed efforts to combat childhood obesity by removing calorie-rich refreshments from California schools.

Before a crush of television cameras and reporters, the governor reiterated that he came to California as an immigrant from Austria.

Schwarzenegger has not taken a position on the pending bills in Congress. Without addressing the immigration issue, the governor said: "I want to make sure that other people have the chance to realize their dreams."

In his luncheon speech to the convention, Schwarzenegger recalled receiving a check in the early 1970s from champion boxer Sugar Ray Robinson. "He never asked any question about my papers or anything like that."

The remark drew applause but not of the same intensity accorded Clinton.

Schwarzenegger, however, offered advice similar to Clinton's: "Don't just reach out to one party, because you need both parties in order to be successful. You need the Democrats. And you need the Republicans."

Rudy For President? (NOVAK)

By ROBERT D. NOVAK

Robert Novak, July 8, 2006

Well-connected public figures report that they have been told recently by Rudolph Giuliani that, as of now, he intends to run for the Republican Presidential nomination in 2008.

The former mayor of New York was on top of last month's national Gallup poll measuring Presidential preferences by registered Republicans, with 29 percent. Sen. John McCain's 24 percent was second, with former House Speaker Newt Gingrich third at 8 percent. National polls all year have shown Giuliani running either first or second to McCain, with the rest of the Presidential possibilities far behind.

Republican insiders respond to these numbers by saying rank-and-file GOP voters will abandon Giuliani once they realize his position on abortion, gay rights and gun control. Party strategists calculate that if he actually runs, he must change on at least one of these issues.

DEMOCRAT LIEBERMAN

Supporters of Sen. Joseph Lieberman promise he will continue as a member of the Senate Democratic caucus even if he loses the Democratic primary in Connecticut Aug. 8 and is elected as an independent.

Lieberman's decision announced last week to seek petitions to give him an independent ballot position probably helped businessman Ned Lamont's antiwar Democratic primary campaign. Although Lieberman's support of President Bush on the Iraq war is not popular in Connecticut, he would be heavily favored in a three-way race against Lamont and Republican former state Rep. Alan Schlesinger.

Lieberman's Republican Senate colleagues privately despair of the GOP picking up the Connecticut seat. But they hope Lieberman, if elected as an independent, would be more inclined to vote with Republicans than he is now, even if he still caucuses with the Democrats.

WOOING HISPANICS

Presidential adviser Karl Rove and Sen. Sam Brownback, two conservative Republicans who favor a guest-worker program for immigrants, will address the left-wing Hispanic advocacy group La Raza in Los Angeles this week.

La Raza was active in increasing participation in nationwide work stoppages and demonstrations April 10 after the House passed a tough border enforcement bill. La Raza in Spanish means "The Race."

Former President Bill Clinton heads the list of speakers for the annual meeting of La Raza's national council. The Rev. Jesse Jackson will appear on a panel.

TRIAL LAWYER POLITICS

Although it attracted no news media attention, a subcommittee hearing of the normally bipartisan House Financial Services Committee erupted in partisan furor June 28 when Republican Rep. Richard Baker of Louisiana proposed controls on lawyers engaged in securities litigation.

Baker's subcommittee focused on the recent federal indictment of the Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman law firm in connection with class-action lawsuits. The firm in recent years has contributed $2.78 million to Democratic candidates and $22,000 to Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0039215

The Financial Services Committee's top two Democrats -- Barney Frank of Massachusetts and Paul Kanjorski of Pennsylvania -- vigorously objected to a federal judge testifying about current defendants in a federal prosecution. Vaughn R. Walker, chief district judge for Northern California, gave the subcommittee his views on the indictments and Baker's legislation.

NO DIRTY TRICKS

Independent, pro-labor candidate Bill Scheurer remained on the ballot after last Monday's deadline without challenge in the Chicago suburban congressional district where freshman Democratic Rep. Melissa Bean is a priority Republican target for 2006.

It had been widely expected that state House Speaker Mike Madigan, the Illinois Democratic chairman, would challenge Scheurer collection of the necessary 14,000 petition signatures for ballot access. Scheurer had filed a lawsuit alleging dirty tricks by Madigan and other Democratic leaders.

Bean was the most spectacular Democratic winner in the 2004 elections with a victory over Phil Crane, the senior Republican member of the House. She had considerable labor support in that campaign, but she lost Teamsters and state AFL-CIO backing after reneging on her campaign commitment to oppose the Central American Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA). Labor votes switching over to Scheurer would benefit the Republican candidate, investment banker David McSweeney.

The Immigration Equation (NYT)

By Roger Lowenstein

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

The day I met George Borjas, cloistered in his office at the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard while graduate students from Russia, India, China and maybe Mexico mingled in the school cafe, sipping coffee and chattering away in all their tongues, the United States Senate was hotly debating what to do about the country's immigration policy. Borjas professed to be unfazed by the goings-on in Washington. A soft-spoken man, he stressed repeatedly that his concern was not to make policy but to derive the truth. To Borjas, a Cuban immigrant and the pre-eminent scholar in his field, the truth is pretty obvious: immigrants hurt the economic prospects of the Americans they compete with. And now that the biggest contingent of immigrants are poorly educated Mexicans, they hurt poorer Americans, especially African-Americans, the most.

Borjas has been making this case — which is based on the familiar concept of supply and demand — for more than a decade. But the more elegantly he has made it, it seems, the less his colleagues concur. "I think I have proved it," he eventually told me, admitting his frustration. "What I don't understand is why people don't agree with me."

It turns out that Borjas's seemingly self-evident premise — that more job seekers from abroad mean fewer opportunities, or lower wages, for native workers — is one of the most controversial ideas in labor economics. It lies at the heart of a national debate, which has been encapsulated (if not articulated) by two very different immigration bills: one, passed by the House of Representatives, which would toughen laws against undocumented workers and probably force many of them to leave the country; and one in the Senate, a measure that would let most of them stay.

You can find economists to substantiate the position of either chamber, but the consensus of most is that, on balance, immigration is good for the country. Immigrants provide scarce labor, which lowers prices in much the same way global trade does. And overall, the newcomers modestly raise Americans' per capita income. But the impact is unevenly distributed; people with means pay less for taxi rides and household help while the less-affluent command lower wages and probably pay more for rent.

The debate among economists is whether low-income workers are hurt a lot or just a little — and over what the answer implies for U.S. policy. If you believe Borjas, the answer is troubling. A policy designed with only Americans' economic well-being in mind would admit far fewer Mexicans, who now account for about 3 in 10 immigrants. Borjas, who emigrated from Cuba in 1962, when he was 12 (and not long after soldiers burst into his family's home and ordered them at gunpoint to stand against a wall), has asserted that the issue, indeed, is "Whom should the United States let in?"

Such a bald approach carries an overtone of the ethnic selectivity that was a staple of the immigration debates a century ago. It makes many of Borjas's colleagues uncomfortable, and it is one reason that the debate is so charged. Another reason is that many of the scholars who disagree with Borjas also hail from someplace else — like gardeners and seamstresses, a surprising number of Ph.D. economists in the U.S. are foreign-born.

Easily the most influential of Borjas's critics is David Card, a Canadian who teaches at Berkeley. He has said repeatedly that, from an economic standpoint, immigration is no big deal and that a lot of the opposition to it is most likely social or cultural. "If Mexicans were taller and whiter, it would probably be a lot easier to deal with," he says pointedly.

Economists in Card's camp tend to frame the issue as a puzzle — a great economic mystery because of its very success. The puzzle is this: how is the U.S. able to absorb its immigrants so easily?

After all, 21 million immigrants, about 15 percent of the labor force, hold jobs in the U.S., but the country has nothing close to that many unemployed. (The actual number is only seven million.) So the majority of immigrants can't literally have "taken" jobs; they must be doing jobs that wouldn't have existed had the immigrants not been here.

The economists who agree with Card also make an intuitive point, inevitably colored by their own experience. To the Israeli-born economist whose father lived through the Holocaust or the Italian who marvels at America's ability to integrate workers from around the world, America's diversity — its knack for synthesizing newly arrived parts into a more vibrant whole — is a secret of its strength. To which Borjas, who sees a different synthesis at work, replies that, unlike his colleagues, the people arriving from Oaxaca, Mexico, are unlikely to ascend to a university faculty. Most of them did not finish high school. "The trouble with the stories that American journalists write about immigration," he told me, "is they all start with a story about a poor mother whose son grows up to become. . . . " and his voice trailed off as if to suggest that whatever the particular story — that of a C.E.O., a ballplayer or even a story like his own — it would not prove anything about immigration. What economists aim for is to get beneath the anecdotes. Is immigration still the engine of prosperity that the history textbooks describe? Or is it a boon to business that is destroying the livelihoods of the poorest workers — people already disadvantaged by such postmodern trends as globalization, the decline of unions and the computer?

{ The Lopsided-Skill-Mix Problem }

This spring, while militias on the prowl for illegal immigrants were converging on the Arizona border and, on the other side of the political fence, immigrant protesters were taking to the streets, I sampled the academic literature and spent some time with Borjas and Card and various of their colleagues. I did not expect concurrence, but I hoped to isolate what we know about the economic effects of immigration from what is mere conjecture. The first gleaning from the Ivory Tower came as a surprise. All things being equal, more foreigners and indeed more people of any stripe do not mean either lower wages or higher unemployment. If they did, every time a baby was born, every time a newly minted graduate entered the work force, it would be bad news for the labor market. But it isn't. Those babies eat baby food; those graduates drive automobiles.

As Card likes to say, "The demand curve also shifts out." It's jargon, but it's profound. New workers add to the supply of labor, but since they consume products and services, they add to the demand for it as well. "Just because Los Angeles is bigger than Bakersfield doesn't mean L.A. has more unemployed than Bakersfield," Card observes.

In theory, if you added 10 percent to the population — or even doubled it — nothing about the labor market would change. Of course, it would take a little while for the economy to adjust. People would have to invest money and start some new businesses to hire all those newcomers. The point is, they would do it. Somebody would realize that the immigrants needed to eat and would open a restaurant; someone else would think to build them housing. Pretty soon there would be new jobs available in kitchens and on construction sites. And that has been going on since the first boat docked at Ellis Island.

But there's a catch. Individual native workers are less likely to be affected if the immigrants resemble the society they are joining — not physically but in the same mix of skills and educational backgrounds. For instance, if every immigrant were a doctor, the theory is, it would be bad for doctors already here. Or as Borjas asked pointedly of me, what if the U.S. created a special visa just for magazine writers? All those foreign-born writers would eat more meals, sure, but (once they mastered English, anyway), they would be supplying only one type of service — my type. Bye-bye fancy assignments.

During the previous immigrant wave, roughly from 1880 to 1921 (it ended when the U.S. established restrictive quotas based on country of origin), the immigrants looked pretty much like the America into which they were assimilating. At the beginning of the 20th century, 9 of 10 American adults did not have high-school diplomas, nor did the vast majority of immigrants. Those Poles and Greeks and Italians made the country more populous, but they did not much change the makeup of the labor market.

This time it's different. The proportion of foreign-born, at 12 percent, remains below the peak of 15 percent recorded in 1890. But compared with the work force of today, however, the skill mix of immigrants is lopsided. About the same proportion have college degrees (though a higher proportion of immigrants are post-graduates). But many more — including most of the those who have furtively slipped across the Mexican border — don't have high-school diplomas.

The latest estimate is that the United States has 11.5 million undocumented foreigners, and it's those immigrants — the illegal ones — who have galvanized Congress. The sponsor of the House legislation, Representative James Sensenbrenner, a Republican from Wisconsin, says bluntly that illegals are bad for the U.S. economy. His bill would require employers to verify the status of their workers from a national database and levy significant penalties on violators. But H.R. 4437 isn't primarily an economics bill — it's an expression of outrage over the porousness of America's borders. Among many other enforcement measures, the bill forces the U.S. to build hundreds of miles of fencing on its Southern border.

The Senate bill is irreducibly complex (more than 800 pages), but basically, it seeks to cure the problem of illegals by bringing them in from the shadows. Those already here would be able to continue working and get on track toward a more normalized status. In the future, employers could bring in guest workers — what Senate draftsmen refer to hopefully as temporary workers — as long as they paid them the going wage.

This latter bill, the product of an alliance between John McCain and Edward Kennedy, isn't really an economics bill, either, at least not the way economists see it. Its premise is that if you legalize undocumented people and reinforce the borders, then whatever negative impact immigrants have on the labor market will go away. The theory is that newly minted green-card holders, no longer having deportation to fear, will stick up for their rights and for higher wages too. Interestingly, some big labor unions, like the Service Employees International Union, are supporters. But economists are skeptical. For one thing, after the U.S. gave amnesty to the nearly three million undocumented workers who were in the country in 1986, their wages didn't budge. Second, economists, as you might expect, say market forces like supply and demand, not legal status, are what determine wages.

It baffles some economists that Congress pays so little heed to their research, but then immigration policy has never been based on economics. Economic fears played a part in the passage of the exclusionary acts against Chinese in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, and in the 1920's of quotas (aimed in particular at people from southern and eastern Europe), but they were mostly fueled by xenophobia. They were supplanted in the Civil Rights era by the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965, which ended quotas and established a new priority based on family reunification. That law, also sponsored by Kennedy, had nothing to do with economics, either. It made the chief criterion for getting in having a relative who was already here.

If economists ran the country, they would certainly take in more immigrants who, like them, have advanced degrees. (The U.S., which is hugely dependent on foreigners to fill certain skilled occupations like scientific research and nursing, does admit a relative handful of immigrants each year on work visas.) Canada and Australia admit immigrants primarily on the basis of skills, and one thing the economists agree on is that high earners raise the national income by more than low earners. They are also less of a burden on the tax rolls.

With the exception of a few border states, however, the effect of immigration on public-sector budgets is small, and the notion that undocumented workers in particular abuse the system is a canard. Since many illegals pay into Social Security (using false ID numbers), they are actually subsidizing the U.S. Treasury. And fewer than 3 percent of immigrants of any stripe receive food stamps. Also, and contrary to popular wisdom, undocumented people do support local school districts, since, indirectly as renters or directly as homeowners, they pay property taxes. Since they tend to be poor, however, they contribute less than the average. One estimate is that immigrants raise state and local taxes for everyone else in the U.S. by a trivial amount in most states, but by as much as $1,100 per household per year in California. They are certainly a burden on hospitals and jails but, it should be noted, poor legal workers, including those who are native born, are also a burden on the health care system.

{ Parsing the Wage Gap }

Economists focus on Mexicans not because many are undocumented but because, relative to the rest of the labor force, Mexicans have far fewer skills. And Mexicans and other Central Americans (who tend to have a similar economic background) are arriving and staying in this country at a rate of more than 500,000 a year. Their average incomes are vastly lower than those both of native-born men and of other immigrants.

Native-born workers: $45,400

All immigrants: $37,000

Mexican immigrants: $22,300

The reason Mexicans earn much less than most Americans is their daunting educational deficit. More than 60 percent of Mexican immigrants are dropouts; fewer than 10 percent of today's native workers are.

That stark contrast conveys, to economists, two important facts. One is that Mexicans are supplying a skill level that is much in demand. It doesn't just seem that Americans don't want to be hotel chambermaids, pick lettuce or repair roofs; it's true. Most gringos are too educated for that kind of work. The added diversity, the complementariness of skills, that Mexicans bring is good for the economy as a whole. They perform services that would otherwise be more expensive and in some cases simply unavailable.

The Americans who are unskilled, however, must compete with a disproportionate number of immigrants. One of every four high-school dropouts in the U.S. was born in Mexico, an astonishing ratio given that the proportion of Mexicans in the overall labor force is only 1 in 25. So it's not magazine writers who see their numbers expanding; it's Americans who are, or would be, working in construction, restaurants, household jobs, unskilled manufacturing and so forth.

That's the theory. But economists have had a hard time finding evidence of actual harm. For starters, they noticed that societies with lots of immigrants tend, if anything, to be more prosperous, not less. In the U.S., wages in cities where immigrants have clustered, like New York, have tended to be higher, not lower. Mississippi, on the other hand, which has the lowest per-capita income of any state, has had very few immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0039218

That doesn't necessarily mean that immigrants caused or even contributed to high wages; it could be they simply go where the demand is greatest — that their presence is an effect of high wages. As statisticians are wont to remind us, "Correlation does not imply causation." (The fact that hospitals are filled with sick people doesn't mean hospitals make you sick.) Maybe without immigrants, wages in New York would be even higher.

And certainly, wages of the unskilled have been a source of worry for years. From 1970 to 1995, wages for high-school dropouts, the group that has been the most affected by immigrants, plummeted by more than 30 percent, after adjusting for inflation. Look at the following averages (all for male workers):

College graduates: $73,000

People with some college: $41,000

High-school grads: $32,000

Dropouts: $24,800

These figures demonstrate a serious problem, at least if you care about wage inequality, and a quick glance at this list and the previous one shows that native-born dropouts are earning only a shade more than Mexicans working in this country. But that hardly proves that cheap Mexican labor is to blame. For one thing, economists believe that other factors, like the failure of Congress to raise the minimum wage, globalization (cheap Chinese labor, that is) and the decline of unions are equally or even more responsible. Another popular theory is that computer technology has made skilled labor more valuable and unskilled labor less so.

Also, when economists look closely at wage dispersion, the picture isn't wholly consistent with the immigrants-as-culprits thesis. Look again at the numbers: people at the top (college grads) make a lot more than average but from the middle on down incomes are pretty compressed. Since only dropouts are being crowded by illegal immigrants, you would expect them to be falling further behind every other group. But they aren't; since the mid-90's, dropouts have been keeping pace with the middle; it's the corporate executives and their ilk at the top who are pulling away from the pack, a story that would seem to have little to do with immigration.

This isn't conclusive either, Borjas notes. After all, maybe without immigrants, dropouts would have done much better than high-school grads. Economists look for the "counterfactual," or what would have happened had immigrants not come. It's difficult to tell, because in the real world, there is always a lot more going on — an oil shock, say, or a budget deficit — than the thing whose effect you are studying. To isolate the effect of immigrants alone would require a sort of lab experiment. The trouble with macroeconomics is you can't squeeze your subjects into a test tube.

{ Marielitos in Miami, Doctors in Israel and Other Natural Experiments }

The academic study of immigration's economic effects earned little attention before the subject started to get political traction in the 1980's. Then, in 1990, Borjas, who was on the faculty at the University of California at Santa Barbara, published a book, "Friends or Strangers," which was mildly critical of immigration's effects.

That same year, David Card realized that a test tube did exist. Card decided to study the 1980 Mariel boat lift, in which 125,000 Cubans were suddenly permitted to emigrate. They arrived in South Florida with virtually no advance notice, and approximately half remained in the Miami area, joining an already-sizable Cuban community and swelling the city's labor force by 7 percent.

To Card, this produced a "natural experiment," one in which cause and effect were clearly delineated. Nothing about conditions in the Miami labor market had induced the Marielitos to emigrate; the Cubans simply left when they could and settled in the city that was closest and most familiar. So Card compared the aftershocks in Miami with the labor markets in four cities — Tampa, Atlanta, Houston and Los Angeles — that hadn't suddenly been injected with immigrants.

That the Marielitos, a small fraction of whom were career criminals, caused an upsurge in crime, as well as a more generalized anxiety among natives, is indisputable. It was also commonly assumed that the Marielitos were taking jobs from blacks.

But Card documented that blacks, and also other workers, in Miami actually did better than in the control cities. In 1981, the year after the boat lift, wages for Miami blacks were fractionally higher than in 1979; in the control cities, wages for blacks were down. The only negative was that unemployment rose among Cubans (a group that now included the Marielitos).

Unemployment in all of the cities rose the following year, as the country entered a recession. But by 1985, the last year of Card's study, black unemployment in Miami had retreated to below its level of 1979, while in the control cities it remained much higher. Even among Miami's Cubans, unemployment returned to pre-Mariel levels, confirming what seemed visible to the naked eye: the Marielitos were working. Card concluded, "The Mariel influx appears to have had virtually no effect on the wages or unemployment rates of less-skilled workers."

Although Card offered some hypotheses, he couldn't fully explain his results. The city's absorption of a 7 percent influx, he wrote, was "remarkably rapid" and — even if he did not quite say it — an utter surprise. Card's Mariel study hit the cloistered world of labor economists like a thunderbolt. All of 13 pages, it was an aesthetic as well as an academic masterpiece that prompted Card's peers to look for other "natural" immigration experiments. Soon after, Jennifer Hunt, an Australian-born Ph.D. candidate at Harvard, published a study on the effects of the return migration of ethnic French from Algeria to France in 1962, the year of Algerian independence. Similar in spirit though slightly more negative than the Mariel study, Hunt found that the French retour had a very mild upward effect on unemployment and no significant effect on wages.

Rachel Friedberg, an economist at Brown, added an interesting twist to the approach. Rather than compare the effect of immigration across cities, she compared it across various occupations. Friedberg's curiosity had been piqued in childhood; born in Israel, she moved to the U.S. as an infant and grew up amid refugee grandparents who were a constant reminder of the immigrant experience.

She focused on an another natural experiment — the exodus of 600,000 Russian Jews to Israel, which increased the population by 14 percent in the early 1990's. She wanted to see if Israelis who worked in occupations in which the Russians were heavily represented had lost ground relative to other Israelis. And in fact, they had. But that didn't settle the issue. What if, Friedberg wondered, the Russians had entered less-attractive fields precisely because, as immigrants, they were at the bottom of the pecking order and hadn't been able to find better work? And in fact, she concluded that the Russians hadn't caused wage growth to slacken; they had merely gravitated to positions that were less attractive. Indeed, Friedberg's conclusion was counterintuitive: the Russians had, if anything, improved wages of native Israelis. She hypothesized that the immigrants competed more with one another than with natives. The Russians became garage mechanics; Israelis ran the garages.

{ Measuring the Hit to Wages }

By the mid-90's, illegal immigration was heating up as an issue in the United States, prompting a reaction in California, where schools and other public services were beginning to feel a strain. But academics were coalescing around the view that immigration was essentially benign — that it depressed unskilled native wages by a little and raised the average native income by a little. In 1997, a panel of the National Academy of Sciences, which reviewed all of the literature, estimated that immigration during the previous decade had, at most, lowered unskilled-native wages by 1 percent to 2 percent.

Borjas didn't buy it. In 1999 he published a second, more strident book, "Heaven's Door." It espoused a "revisionist" view — that immigration caused real harm to lower-income Americans. Borjas argued that localized studies like Mariel were flawed, for the simple reason that labor markets in the U.S. are linked together. Therefore, the effects of immigration could not be gauged by comparing one city with another.

Borjas pointed out, as did others, that more native-born Americans started migrating out of California in the 1970's, just as Mexicans began arriving in big numbers. Previously California was a destination for Americans. Borjas reckoned that immigrants were pushing out native-born Americans, and that the effect of all the new foreigners was dispersed around the country.

The evidence of a labor surplus seemed everywhere. "If you wanted a maid," he recalled of California during the 90's, "all you had to do was tell your gardener, and you had one tomorrow." He felt certain that Mexicans were depressing unskilled wages but didn't know how to prove it.

After Borjas moved East, he had an inspiration. It was easy to show that high-school dropouts had experienced both lower wage growth and more competition from immigrants, but that didn't settle the point, because so many other factors could have explained why dropouts did poorly. The inspiration was that people compete not only against those with a like education, but also against workers of roughly the same experience. Someone looking for a first job at a McDonald's competes against other unskilled entry-level job seekers. A reporter with 15 years' experience who is vying for a promotion will compete against other veterans but not against candidates fresh out of journalism school.

This insight enabled Borjas to break down the Census data in a way that put his thesis to a more rigorous test. He could represent skill groups within each age as a point on a graph. There was one point for dropouts who were 10 years out of school, another for those who were 20 years and 30 years out. Each of these points was repeated for each decade from 1960 to 2000. And there was a similar set of points for high-school graduates, college graduates and so forth. The points were situated on the graph according to two variables: the horizontal axis measured the change in the share of immigrants within each "point," the vertical axis measured wage growth.

A result was a smattering of dots that on casual inspection might have resembled a work of abstract art. But looking closer, the dots had a direction: they pointed downward. Using a computer, Borjas measured the slope: it suggested that wages fell by 3 to 4 percent for each 10 percent increase in the share of immigrants.

With this graph, Borjas could calculate that, during the 80's and 90's, for instance, immigrants caused dropouts to suffer a 5 percent decline relative to college graduates. In a paper published in 2003, "The Labor Demand Curve Is Downward Sloping," Borjas termed the results "negative and significant."

But what about the absolute effect? Assuming businesses did not hire any of the new immigrants, Borjas's finding would translate to a hefty 9 percent wage loss for the unskilled over those two decades, and lesser declines for other groups (which also received some immigrants). As we know, however, as the population grows, demand rises and business do hire more workers. When Borjas adjusted for this hiring, high-school dropouts were still left with a wage loss of 5 percent over those two decades, some $1,200 a year. Other groups, however, showed a very slight gain. To many economists as well as lay folk, Borjas's findings confirmed what seemed intuitive all along: add to the supply of labor, and the price goes down.

To Card, however, what seems "intuitive" is often suspect. He became a labor economist because the field is full of anomalies. "The simple-minded theories that they teach you in economics don't work" for the labor market, he told me. In the 90's, Card won the prestigious Clark Medal for several studies, including Mariel and another showing that, contrary to theory, raising the minimum wage in New Jersey (another natural experiment) did not cause fast-food outlets to cut back on employment.

In a recent paper, "Is the New Immigration Really So Bad?" Card took indirect aim at Borjas and, once again, plumbed a labor-market surprise. Despite the recent onslaught of immigrants, he pointed out, U.S. cities still have fewer unskilled workers than they had in 1980. Immigrants may be depriving native dropouts of the scarcity value they might have enjoyed, but at least in a historical sense, unskilled labor is not in surplus. America has become so educated that immigrants merely mitigate some of the decline in the homegrown unskilled population. Thus, in 1980, 24 percent of the work force in metropolitan areas were dropouts; in 2000, only 18 percent were.

Card also observed that cities with more immigrants, like those in the Sun Belt close to the Mexican border, have a far higher proportion of dropouts. This has led to a weird unbalancing of local labor markets. For example, 10 percent of the work force in Pittsburgh and 15 percent in Cleveland are high-school dropouts; in Houston the figure is 25 percent, in Los Angeles, 30 percent. The immigrants aren't dispersing, or not very quickly.

So where do all the dropouts work? Los Angeles does have a lot of apparel manufacturers but not enough of such immigrant-intensive businesses to account for all of its unskilled workers. Studies also suggest that immigration is correlated with a slight increase in unemployment. But again, the effect is small. So the mystery is how cities absorb so many unskilled. Card's theory is that the same businesses operate differently when immigrants are present; they spend less on machines and more on labor. Still, he admitted, "We are left with the puzzle of explaining the remarkable flexibility of employment demand."

Card started thinking about this when he moved from Princeton in the mid-90's. He noticed that everyone in Berkeley seemed to have a gardener, "even though professors are not rich." In the U.S., which has more unskilled labor than Europe, more people employ housecleaners. The African-American women who held those jobs before the war, like the Salvadorans and Guatemalans of today, weren't taking jobs; they were creating them. { The Personal Is Economic } Though Card works on immigration only some of the time, he and Borjas clearly have become rivals. In a recent paper, Card made a point of referring to the "revisionist" view as "overly pessimistic." Borjas told Business Week that Card's ideas were "insane." ("Obviously I didn't mean he is insane; he is a very bright guy," Borjas clarified when we talked. "The idea that you can add 15 or 20 million people and not have any effect seems crazy.") Alan B. Krueger, an economist who is friendly with each, says, "I fear it might become acrimonious." Card told me twice that Borjas's calculations were "disingenuous." "Borjas has a strong view on this topic," Card said, "almost an emotional position."

Card is more comfortable with anecdote than many scholars, and he tells a story about his wife, who teaches English to Mexicans. In one class, she tapped on a wall, asking a student to identify it, and the guy said, "That's drywall." To Card, it signifies that construction is one of those fields that soak up a disproportionate number of Mexicans; it's a little piece of the puzzle. "Even when I was a kid in Ontario 45 years ago," he notes, "the tobacco pickers were Jamaicans. They were terrible jobs — backbreaking." Card is a political liberal with thinning auburn air and a controlled, smirky smile. His prejudices, if not his emotions, favor immigrants. Raised by dairy farmers in Guelph, Ontario, he remembers that Canadian cities were mostly boring while he was growing up. The ones that attracted immigrants, like Toronto and Vancouver, boomed and became more cosmopolitan. "

Everyone knows in trade there are winners and losers," Card says. "For some reason it doesn't stop people from advocating free trade." He could have said the same of Wal-Mart, which has put plenty of Mom-and-Pop retailers out of business. In fact, any time a firm offers better or more efficient service, somebody will suffer. But the economy grows as a result. "

I honestly think the economic arguments are second order," Card told me when we discussed immigration. "They are almost irrelevant."

DOJ_NMG_0039221

Card's implication is that darker forces — ethnic prejudice, maybe, or fear of social disruption — is what's really motivating a lot of anti-immigrant sentiment. Borjas, a Hispanic who has written in blunt terms about the skill deficits of Mexicans, in particular arouses resentment. "Mexicans aren't as good as Cubans like him," Douglas S. Massey, a demographer at Princeton, said in a pointed swipe.

Borjas lives an assimilated life. He has a wife who speaks no Spanish, three kids, two of whom study his mother tongue as a foreign language, and a home in Lexington, a tony Boston suburb. Yet his mind-set often struck me as that of an outsider — an immigrant, if you will, to his own profession.

When I asked the inevitable question — did his exile experience influence his choice of career? — he said, "Clearly it predisposed me." The seeds of the maverick scholar were planted the year before he left Cuba, a searing time when the revolution was swinging decisively toward Soviet-style communism. His family had owned a small factory that manufactured men's pants. The factory was shut down, and the family made ready to leave the island, but their departure was delayed by the death of Borjas's father. The son had to attend a revolutionary school, where the precepts of Marxism-Leninism were drilled into the future economist with notable lack of success. One day he marched in the band and drummed the "Internationale" in front of Fidel Castro and the visiting Yuri Gagarin, the Soviet cosmonaut. "Since that year I have been incredibly resistant to any kind of indoctrination," he told me — an attitude that surfaces in wry references to the liberal Harvard environs as the "People's Republic of Cambridge" and to American political correctness in general.

Borjas's family arrived with virtually no money; they got some clothing from Catholic Charities and a one-time stipend of, as he recollects, $100. His mother got a factory job in Miami, where they stayed several years. Then the family moved to New Jersey. He at tended Saint Peter's College in Jersey City and got his Ph.D. at Columbia.

I asked him whether the fact that he was Cuban, the most successful Latin subgroup, had affected his views of other Hispanics. "Look, I've never been psychoanalyzed," he said with an air of resignation, as if he were accustomed to hearing such loaded questions. One thing Borjas shares with Card is a view that others treat immigration emotionally. But Borjas takes comfort not in anecdote but in empiricism. As he said to me often, "The data is the data."

{ Immigrants Can Be Complementary }

Economists on Card's side of the debate recognize that they at least have to deal with Borjas's data — to reconcile why the local studies and national studies produce different results. Card shrugs it off; even 5 percent for a dropout, he observes, is only 50 to 60 cents an hour. Giovanni Peri, an Italian working at the University of California, Davis, had a more intriguing response. Peri replicated Borjas's scatter diagram, and also his finding that unskilled natives suffer a loss relative to, say, graduates. He made different assumptions, however, about how businesses adjust to the influx of new workers, and as a result, he found that the absolute harm was less, or the gain was greater, for all native-born groups. By his reckoning, native dropouts lost only 1 percent of their income during the 1990's.

Peri's theory is that most of the wage losses are sustained by previous immigrants, because immigrants compete most directly with one another. It's a principle of economics that a surplus in one part of the production scheme raises the demand for every other one. For instance, if you have a big influx of chefs, you can use more waiters, pushing up their wages; if you have a lot of chefs and waiters, you need more Sub-Zeros, so investment will also rise. The only ones hurt, in this example, are the homegrown chefs — the people who are "like" the immigrants.

Indeed, workers who are unlike immigrants see a net gain; more foreign doctors increases the demand for native hospital administrators. Borjas assumes that a native dropout (or a native anything) is interchangeable with an immigrant of the same skill level. Peri doesn't. If enough Mexicans go into construction, some native workers may be hurt, but a few will get promotions, because with more crews working there will be a greater demand for foremen, who most likely will be natives.

Natives have a different mix of skills — English, for instance, or knowledge of the landscape. In economists' lingo, foreigners are not "perfect substitutes." (Friedberg also observed this in Israel.) In some cases, they will complement rather than compete with native workers. Vietnamese manicurists in California cater to a lower-price, less-exclusive market than native-run salons. The particular skills of an Italian designer — or even an economist — are distinct from an American's. "My work is autobiographical to a large extent," notes Peri, who got into the field when the Italian government commissioned him to study why Italy was losing so many professionals. The foreigners he sees in California are a boon to the U.S. It astonishes him how people like Sensenbrenner want to restrict immigration and apply the letter of the law against those working here.

This is a very romantic view. The issue is not so much Italian designers as Mexican dropouts. But many Mexicans work jobs that are unappealing to most Americans; in this sense, they are not exactly like natives of their skill level either. Mexicans have replenished some occupations that would have become underpopulated; for instance, 40,000 people who became meat processors immigrated to the U.S. during the 1990's, shoring up the industry. Without them, some plants would have raised wages, but others would have closed or, indeed, relocated to Mexico.

{ Are All Dropouts the Same? }

I talked to half a dozen vintners and a like number of roofing-company owners, both fields that rely on Mexican labor, and frequently heard that Americans do not, in sufficient numbers, want the work. In the case of the vineyards, if Mexicans weren't available, some of the grapes would be harvested by machine. This is what economists mean by "capital adjusting." If the human skills are there, capital will find a way to employ them. Over the short term, people chase jobs, but over the long term jobs chase people. (That is why software firms locate in Silicon Valley.)

If you talk to enough employers, you start to gather that they prefer immigrant labor over unskilled Americans. The former have fewer problems with tardiness, a better work ethic. Some of this may be prejudice. But it's possible that Mexican dropouts may be better workers than our dropouts. In Mexico, not finishing high school is the norm; it's not associated with an unsuitability for work or even especially with failure. In the U.S., where the great majority do graduate, those who don't graduate have high rates of drug use and problems with the law.

The issue is charged because the group with by far the highest rate of incarceration is African-American dropouts. Approximately 20 percent of black males without high-school diplomas are in jail. Indeed, according to Steven Raphael, a colleague of Card's at Berkeley, the correlation between wages and immigration is a lot weaker if you control for the fact that so many black men are in prison. But should you control for it? Borjas says he thinks not. It's pretty well established that as the reward for legal work diminishes, some people turn to crime. This is why people sold crack; the payoff was tremendous. Borjas has developed one of his graphs to show that the presence of immigrants is correlated with doing time, especially among African-Americans. Incarceration rates, he notes, rose sharply in the 70's, just as immigration did. He doesn't pretend that this is the whole explanation — only that there is a link. Card retorts: "The idea that the way to help the lot of African-Americans is to restrict Mexicans is ridiculous." Black leaders have themselves mostly switched sides. In the 20's, A. Philip Randolph, who led the Pullman Porters, spoke in favor of immigration quotas, but the civil rights establishment no longer treats immigration as a big issue; instead it tends to look at immigrants as potential constituents. (One person who takes issue with the prevailing view is Anthony W. Williams, an African-American pastor in Chicago who is running for Congress against Representative Jesse Jackson Jr. Black leaders have forsaken their mission, he told me. "Immigration will destroy the economic base of the African-American community.")

In the spring, as the Senate Judiciary Committee was trying to parse these issues into a piece of legislation, Borjas and Card were invited to air their views. Each declined, in part because they don't think politicians really listen. As if to prove the point, the effort to write a joint bill has stalled, following Sensenbrenner's announcement that the House intends to stage a series of public hearings on immigration around the country over the summer. There will be a lot said about border control, many heartfelt stories and probably very little about natural experiments.

The economists do have political opinions, of course. Borjas leans to a system like Canada's, which would admit immigrants on the basis of skills. He also says that, to make sure the problem of illegals does not recur, the U.S. should secure its borders before it adjusts the status of its present illegals.

Advocates of a more open policy often cite the country's history. They argue that the racists of bygone eras were not only discriminatory but also wrong. Card, for instance, mentioned an article penned by a future U.S. senator, Paul Douglas, titled "Is the New Immigration More Unskilled Than the Old?" It was written in 1919, when many people (though not Douglas) held that Jews, Slavs and Italians were incompatible with the country's Anglo and Teutonic stock. Nativism has always been part of the American scene, and it has tended to turn ugly in periods when the country was tired of or suspicious of foreigners. In 1952, quotas were maintained in a law sponsored by Senator Pat McCarran, a prominent McCarthyite. There remains today a palpable strain of xenophobia in the anti-immigrant movement. Dan Stein, president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform, remarked to me, rather meanly, "If someone comes here from China and they go swimming in a dangerous river, a sign in English is enough, but the Mexicans want it in Spanish." Ninety years ago, some signs were in German, as were 500 newspapers on American soil.

But U.S. history, as Borjas observes, can be read in two ways. For sure, earlier waves of immigrants assimilated, but America essentially closed the gate for 40 years. Antipathy toward Germans during World War I forced German-Americans to hide all traces of their origins. The quotas of the 1920's were reinforced by the Depression and then by World War II. The country had time to let assimilation occur.

A reverse process seems to be occurring with Mexican-Americans. Very few Mexicans came north in the decades after 1920, even though they were relatively free to do so. As recently as 1970, the U.S. had fewer than one million Mexicans, almost all of them in Texas and California. The U.S. did bring Mexican braceros to work on farms during the 1940's, 50's and 60's. The program was terminated in 1964, and immigration officials immediately noticed a sharp rise in illicit border crossings. The collapse of the Mexican economy in the 70's gave migrants a further push. Finally, Mexicans who obtained legal status were (thanks to the 1965 reform) able to bring in family members.

The important point is that, ultimately, there was a catalytic effect — so many Mexicans settled here that it became easier for more Mexicans to follow. One story has it that in a village in central Mexico people knew the price of mushrooms in Pennsylvania sooner than people in the next county over. Even if apocryphal, it illustrates what economists call a network effect: with 12 million people born in Mexico now dispersed around the U.S., information about job-market conditions filters back to Mexico with remarkable speed.

Now that the network is established, the exodus feels rather permanent; it is not a wave but a continuous flow. This has led to understandable anxiety, even among economists, about whether Mexicans will assimilate as rapidly as previous groups. Although second-generation Mexicans do (overwhelmingly) speak English, and also graduate from high school at far higher rates than their parents, Borjas has documented what he calls an ethnic "half-life" of immigrant groups: with each generation, members of the group retain half of the income and educational deficit (or advantage) of their parents. In other words, each group tends toward the mean, but the process is slow. Last year he wrote that Mexicans in America are burdened if not doomed by their "ethnic capital," and will be for several generations. In "Heaven's Door," Borjas even wrote forgivingly of the quota system enacted in the 20's, observing that it "was not born out of thin air; it was the political consensus . . . reached after 30 years of debate." These are distasteful words to many people. But Borjas does not advocate a return to quotas. His point is that Americans shouldn't kid themselves: "National origin and immigrant skills are so intimately related, any attempt to change one will inevitably change the other."

{ The Limits of Economics }

Economists more in the mainstream generally agree that the U.S. should take in more skilled immigrants; it's the issue of the unskilled that is tricky. Many say that unskilled labor is needed and that the U.S. could better help its native unskilled by other means (like raising the minimum wage or expanding job training) than by building a wall. None believe, however, that the U.S. can get by with no limits. Richard B. Freeman of Harvard floated the idea that the U.S. simply sell visas at a reasonable price. The fee could be adjusted according to indicators like the unemployment rate. It is unlikely that Congress will go for anything so cute, and the economists' specific prescriptions may be beside the point. As they acknowledge, immigration policy responds to a host of factors — cultural, political and social as well as economic. Migrant workers, sometimes just by crowding an uncustomary allotment of people into a single dwelling, bring a bit of disorder to our civic life; such concerns, though beyond the economists' range, are properly part of the debate.

What the economists can do is frame a subset of the important issues. They remind us, first, that the legislated goal of U.S. policy is curiously disconnected from economics. Indeed, the flow of illegals is the market's signal that the current legal limits are too low. Immigrants do help the economy; they are fuel for growth cities like Las Vegas and a salve to older cities that have suffered native flight. Borjas's research strongly suggests that native unskilled workers pay a price: in wages, in their ability to find inviting areas to migrate to and perhaps in employment. But the price is probably a small one.

The disconnect between Borjas's results and Card's hints that there is an alchemy that occurs when immigrants land ashore; the economy's potential for absorbing and also adapting is mysterious but powerful. Like any form of economic change, immigration causes distress and disruption to some. But America has always thrived on dynamic transformations that produce winners as well as losers. Such transformations stimulate growth. Other societies (like those in Europe) have opted for more controls, on immigration and on labor markets generally. They have more stability and more equality, but less growth and fewer jobs. Economists have highlighted these issues, but they cannot decide them. Their resolution depends on a question that Card posed but that the public has not yet come to terms with: "What is it that immigration policy is supposed to achieve?"

Immigration — And The Curse Of The Black Legend (NYT)

By Tony Horwitz

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

Vineyard Haven, Mass.

COURSING through the immigration debate is the unexamined faith that American history rests on English bedrock, or Plymouth Rock to be specific. Jamestown also gets a nod, particularly in the run-up to its 400th birthday, but John Smith was English, too (he even coined the name New England).

So amid the din over border control, the Senate affirms the self-evident truth that English is our national language; "It is part of our blood," Lamar Alexander, Republican of Tennessee, says. Border vigilantes call themselves Minutemen, summoning colonial Massachusetts as they apprehend Hispanics in the desert Southwest. Even undocumented immigrants invoke our Anglo founders, waving placards that read, "The Pilgrims didn't have papers."

These newcomers are well indoctrinated; four of the sample questions on our naturalization test ask about Pilgrims. Nothing in the sample exam suggests that prospective citizens need know anything that occurred on this continent before the Mayflower landed in 1620. Few Americans do, after all.

This national amnesia isn't new, but it's glaring and supremely paradoxical at a moment when politicians warn of the threat posed to our culture and identity by an invasion of immigrants from across the Mexican border. If Americans hit the books, they'd find what Al Gore would call an inconvenient truth. The early history of what is now the United States was Spanish, not English, and our denial of this heritage is rooted in age-old stereotypes that still entangle today's immigration debate.

Forget for a moment the millions of Indians who occupied this continent for 13,000 or more years before anyone else arrived, and start the clock with Europeans' presence on present-day United States soil. The first confirmed landing wasn't by Vikings, who reached Canada in about 1000, or by Columbus, who reached the Bahamas in 1492. It was by a Spaniard, Juan Ponce de León, who landed in 1513 at a lush shore he christened La Florida.

Most Americans associate the early Spanish in this hemisphere with Cortés in Mexico and Pizarro in Peru. But Spaniards pioneered the present-day United States, too. Within three decades of Ponce de León's landing, the Spanish became the first Europeans to reach the Appalachians, the Mississippi, the Grand Canyon and the Great Plains. Spanish ships sailed along the East Coast, penetrating to present-day Bangor, Me., and up the Pacific Coast as far as Oregon.

From 1528 to 1536, four castaways from a Spanish expedition, including a "black" Moor, journeyed all the way from Florida to the Gulf of California — 267 years before Lewis and Clark embarked on their much more renowned and far less arduous trek. In 1540, Francisco Vázquez de Coronado led 2,000 Spaniards and Mexican Indians across today's Arizona-Mexico border — right by the Minutemen's inaugural post — and traveled as far as central Kansas, close to the exact geographic center of what is now the continental United States. In all, Spaniards probed half of today's lower 48 states before the first English tried to colonize, at Roanoke Island, N.C.

The Spanish didn't just explore, they settled, creating the first permanent European settlement in the continental United States at St. Augustine, Fla., in 1565. Santa Fe, N.M., also predates Plymouth: later came Spanish settlements in San Antonio, Tucson, San Diego and San Francisco. The Spanish even established a Jesuit mission in Virginia's Chesapeake Bay 37 years before the founding of Jamestown in 1607.

Two iconic American stories have Spanish antecedents, too. Almost 80 years before John Smith's alleged rescue by Pocahontas, a man by the name of Juan Ortiz told of his remarkably similar rescue from execution by an Indian girl. Spaniards also held a thanksgiving, 56 years before the Pilgrims, when they feasted near St. Augustine with Florida Indians, probably on stewed pork and garbanzo beans.

The early history of Spanish North America is well documented, as is the extensive exploration by the 16th-century French and Portuguese. So why do Americans cling to a creation myth centered on one band of late-arriving English — Pilgrims who weren't even the first English to settle New England or the first Europeans to reach Plymouth Harbor? (There was a short-lived colony in Maine and the French reached Plymouth earlier.)

The easy answer is that winners write the history and the Spanish, like the French, were ultimately losers in the contest for this continent. Also, many leading American writers and historians of the early 19th century were New Englanders who elevated the Pilgrims to mythic status (the North's victory in the Civil War provided an added excuse to diminish the Virginia story). Well into the 20th century, standard histories and school texts barely mentioned the early Spanish in North America.

While it's true that our language and laws reflect English heritage, it's also true that the Spanish role was crucial. Spanish discoveries spurred the English to try settling America and paved the way for the latecomers' eventual success. Many key aspects of American history, like African slavery and the cultivation of tobacco, are rooted in the forgotten Spanish century that preceded English arrival.

There's another, less-known legacy of this early period that explains why we've written the Spanish out of our national narrative. As late as 1783, at the end of the Revolutionary War, Spain held claim to roughly half of today's continental United States (in 1775, Spanish ships even reached Alaska). As American settlers pushed out from the 13 colonies, the new nation craved Spanish land. And to justify seizing it, Americans found a handy weapon in a set of centuries-old beliefs known as the "black legend."

The legend first arose amid the religious strife and imperial rivalries of 16th-century Europe. Northern Europeans, who loathed Catholic Spain and envied its American empire, published books and gory engravings that depicted Spanish colonization as uniquely barbarous: an orgy of greed, slaughter and papist depravity, the Inquisition writ large.

Though simplistic and embellished, the legend contained elements of truth. Juan de Oñate, the conquistador who colonized New Mexico, punished Pueblo Indians by cutting off their hands and feet and then enslaving them. Hernando de Soto bound Indians in chains and neck collars and forced them to haul his army's gear across the South. Natives were thrown to attack dogs and burned alive.

But there were Spaniards of conscience in the New World, too: most notably the Dominican priest Bartolomé de Las Casas, whose defense of Indians impelled the Spanish crown to pass laws protecting natives. Also, Spanish brutality wasn't unique; English colonists committed similar atrocities. The Puritans were arguably more intolerant of natives than the Spanish and the Virginia colonists as greedy for gold as any conquistador. But none of this erased the black legend's enduring stain, not only in Europe but also in the newly formed United States.

"Anglo Americans," writes David J. Weber, the pre-eminent historian of Spanish North America, "inherited the view that Spaniards were unusually cruel, avaricious, treacherous, fanatical, superstitious, cowardly, corrupt, decadent, indolent and authoritarian."

When 19th-century jingoists revived this caricature to justify invading Spanish (and later, Mexican) territory, they added a new slur: the mixing of Spanish, African and Indian blood had created a degenerate race. To Stephen Austin, Texas's fight with Mexico was "a war of barbarism and of despotic principles, waged by the mongrel Spanish-Indian and Negro race, against civilization and the Anglo-American race." It was the manifest destiny of white Americans to seize and civilize these benighted lands, just as it was to take the territory of Indian savages.

From 1819 to 1848, the United States and its army increased the nation's area by roughly a third at Spanish and Mexican expense, including three of today's four most populous states: California, Texas and Florida. Hispanics became the first American citizens in the newly acquired Southwest territory and remained a majority in several states until the 20th century.

By then, the black legend had begun to fade. But it seems to have found new life among immigration's staunchest foes, whose rhetoric carries traces of both ancient Hispanophobia and the chauvinism of 19th-century expansionists.

Representative J. D. Hayworth of Arizona, who calls for deporting illegal immigrants and changing the Constitution so that children born to them in the United States can't claim citizenship, denounces "defeatist wimps unwilling to stand up for our culture" against alien "invasion." Those who oppose making English the official language, he adds, "reject the very notion that there is a uniquely American identity, or that, if there is one, that it is superior to any other."

Representative Tom Tancredo of Colorado, chairman of the House Immigration Reform Caucus, depicts illegal immigration as "a scourge" abetted by "a cult of multiculturalism" that has "a death grip" on this nation. "We are committing cultural suicide," Mr. Tancredo claims. "The barbarians at the gate will only need to give us a slight push, and the emaciated body of Western civilization will collapse in a heap."

ON talk radio and the Internet, foes of immigration echo the black legend more explicitly, typecasting Hispanics as indolent, a burden on the American taxpayer, greedy for benefits and jobs, prone to criminality and alien to our values — much like those degenerate Spaniards of the old Southwest and those gold-mad conquistadors who sought easy riches rather than honest toil. At the fringes, the vilification is baldly racist. In fact, cruelty to Indians seems to be the only transgression absent from the familiar package of Latin sins.

Also missing, of course, is a full awareness of the history of the 500-year Spanish presence in the Americas and its seesawing fortunes in the face of Anglo encroachment. "The Hispanic world did not come to the United States," Carlos Fuentes observes. "The United States came to the Hispanic world. It is perhaps an act of poetic justice that now the Hispanic world should return."

America has always been a diverse and fast-changing land, home to overlapping cultures and languages. It's an homage to our history, not a betrayal of it, to welcome the latest arrivals, just as the Indians did those tardy and uninvited Pilgrims who arrived in Plymouth not so long ago.

A Run For The Border (WP)

By P.w. Singer

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

Those of us who track federal contracting come across unusual announcements all the time. Sometimes they are a useful indicator of preparations for a policy soon to be enacted. Other times they signify nothing more than a government bureaucracy in all its inane glory. How, then, should we react to the solicitation at right -- a Department of Homeland Security request for an "indefinite quantity, indefinite delivery" of burritos to be stockpiled along the Texas border?

The contract raises a feast of questions: Why didn't Homeland Security just get the super-value meal? More important, is Taco Bell disqualified from bidding because of its slogan "Make a run for the border"?

Posted in late June, the solicitation came on the heels of another spicy tidbit on the same government database -- a contract for as much as $385 million awarded just a few months ago to Dick Cheney's old firm Halliburton to be on call in case the government ever needs to build 5,000-person camps for "temporary detention and processing." Could we have here a bean-and-beef-stuffed sign that the administration is contemplating a showy border sweep before the congressional elections?

That such conspiracy theories should even come to mind is a sad statement about our politics. Rather than serious public debate, we've been served a summer of faux outcries, such as describing flag burning and same-sex marriage as epidemics and treating immigration as a national security crisis. It's enough to give anyone indigestion.

P.W. Singer, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, always gets the Gorditas.

Border Insecurity (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

'OUR BORDER MUST BE SECURE," Rep. Ed Royce (R-Fullerton) said Friday in Laredo, Texas, kicking off the second day of legislative field hearings on immigration reform. Only after this condition is met, he said, should we even begin to think about guest worker programs, visa policies and paths to citizenship.

This is a popular and seductive notion, one that is shaping up as the basis for a tenuous possible compromise between the enforcement-only immigration bill in the House and the comprehensive version in the Senate. It also is a practical pipe dream, one that fails to recognize the reason the border is so porous is that U.S. farms, construction sites, packing plants and restaurants have been relying on undocumented workers for years. To say you want to clamp down on the border before addressing the underlying labor issues is to vote for economic suicide. As New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg aptly put it at the Senate's competing committee hearing in Philadelphia last week: "It's as if we expect Border Patrol agents to do what a century of communism could not: defeat the natural market forces of supply and demand and defeat the natural human desire for freedom and opportunity. You might as well sit on your beach chair and tell the tide not to come in."

An impregnable border cannot prevent illegal immigration. One statistic you probably won't hear much during this silly season is that an estimated two out of five illegal immigrants residing in the United States came here legally, according to the Pew Hispanic Center. You could build a 2,000-mile-long wall along the southern border, as Royce has proposed; sentence ranchers to 10 years in prison if someone else builds a border-crossing tunnel on their land, as Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon) has proposed; send the U.S. military down there, as Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Rancho Santa Fe) has proposed … yet all you'd have to show for it is a crippled economy and an increase in other forms of illegal immigration.

As long as there are foreign tourists, border cards for Canadians and Mexicans and international enrollment at U.S. universities, there will be opportunities aplenty for some legal visitors to linger past their visa expiration dates.

Securing the border and ignoring the rest does nothing to reduce the legal thicket and interminable waiting lists facing those who wish to migrate by the rules. A sane approach would recognize that demand on both sides of the border is far outstripping the supply of legal visas; instead, House supporters of HR 4437 would choke off the number of annual employment visas at a nearly nonexistent 5,200.

House Republicans claim they want to first "certify" that the border is secure. To fully do that, they will need not just 2,000 miles of fence but another 3,145 miles for the northern border, untold thousands of new port inspectors, plus homing devices attached to every foreigner who dares set foot on U.S. soil. The border would be secure, but at the expense of the land of the free becoming a police state.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Surprising Jump In Tax Revenues Is Curbing Deficit (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 8 — An unexpectedly steep rise in tax revenues from corporations and the wealthy is driving down the projected budget deficit this year, even though spending has climbed sharply because of the war in Iraq and the cost of hurricane relief.

On Tuesday, White House officials are expected to announce that the tax receipts will be about $250 billion above last year's levels and that the deficit will be about $100 billion less than what they projected six months ago. The rising tide in tax payments has been building for months, but the increased scale is surprising even seasoned budget analysts and making it easier for both the administration and Congress to finesse the big run-up in spending over the past year.

Tax revenues are climbing twice as fast as the administration predicted in February, so fast that the budget deficit could actually decline this year.

The main reason is a big spike in corporate tax receipts, which have nearly tripled since 2003, as well as what appears to be a big increase in individual taxes on stock market profits and executive bonuses.

On Friday, the Congressional Budget Office reported that corporate tax receipts for the nine months ending in June hit $250 billion — nearly 26 percent higher than the same time last year — and that overall revenues were $206 billion higher than at this point in 2005.

Congressional analysts say the surprise windfall could shrink the deficit this year to $300 billion, from $318 billion in 2005 and an all-time high of $412 billion in 2004.

Republicans are already arguing that the revenue jump proves that their tax cuts, especially the 2003 tax cut on stock dividends, would spur the economy and ultimately increase revenues.

"The tax relief we delivered has helped unleash the entrepreneurial spirit of America and kept our economy the envy of the world," President Bush said in his weekly radio address on Saturday.

Democrats and many independent budget analysts note that overall revenues have barely climbed back to the levels reached in 2000, and that the government has borrowed trillions of dollars against Social Security surpluses just as the first of the nation's baby boomers are nearing retirement.

"The fact is that revenues are way below what the administration said they would be a few years ago," said Thomas S. Kahn, staff director for Democrats on the House Budget Committee. "The long-term prognosis is still very, very bleak, and the administration doesn't have any kind of long-term plan."

One reason the run-up in taxes looks good is because the past five years looked so bad. Revenues are up, but they have lagged well behind economic growth.

The surge could also evaporate as quickly as it appeared. Over the past decade, tax revenues have become much more volatile, alternately soaring and plunging in the wake of swings in the stock market and repeatedly defying government projections.

Nevertheless, the short-term change has been striking. At the beginning of the year, the Congressional Budget Office projected that this year's deficit would be $371 billion and the White House Office of Management and Budget put the figure at $423 billion.

Corporate tax payments are expected to exceed $300 billion, up from $131 billion three years ago. The other big increase is an extraordinary jump in individual taxes that were not withheld from paychecks, usually a reflection of taxes on investment income and executive bonuses.

The jump in receipts is providing Mr. Bush and Republicans in Congress with a new opportunity to assert that tax cuts of 2001 and 2003 are working and that Congress should make them permanent.

Pat Toomey, president of the Club for Growth, a conservative political fund-raising group, said: "The supply-siders were absolutely right. All the major sources of revenue have grown, especially in areas where we said they would."

But budget analysts, supporters and critics of Mr. Bush alike, cautioned that this year's windfall would do little to improve the government's long-term budget woes.

Government spending under Mr. Bush continued to climb rapidly this year, more than twice as fast as the economy. Spending on the war in Iraq has accelerated, to about $120 billion this year.

Far more ominously, the nation's oldest baby boomers will be eligible for Social Security benefits in just two years. Conservatives and liberals alike predict a huge escalation in costs of Social Security and Medicare over the next several decades.

"The long-term outlook is such a deep well of sorrow that I can't get much happiness out of this year," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a former director of the Congressional Budget Office and a former White House economist under President Bush.

Despite almost five years of economic growth, individual income taxes — the biggest component of federal tax revenues — have yet to reach the levels of 2000. Even with surging payments for investment profits and business income, individual tax payments in 2005 were only $972 billion — below the $1 trillion reached in 2000, even without adjusting for inflation.

Over all, individual and corporate taxes have lagged well behind the economy's growth over the past five years. Government spending, by contrast, mushroomed far faster than the economy.

And federal debt has ballooned to $8.3 trillion, up from $5.6 trillion when Mr. Bush took office. Republicans are trying to raise the authorized debt ceiling to $9.6 trillion.

War costs for Iraq and Afghanistan have totaled more than $300 billion since 2003, and the Bush administration has not included any war costs in its budget estimates beyond next year.

DOJ_NMG_0039228

Domestic discretionary programs, like education and space exploration, have slowed their growth after climbing rapidly in Mr. Bush's first term. But entitlement programs, particularly Medicaid and Medicare, are climbing rapidly as a result of rising medical prices and Mr. Bush's prescription drug program.

Outlays for Medicare have climbed 15 percent this year and are expected to hit $300 billion. About half of that increase results from the new prescription drug program, which is expected to cost nearly $1 trillion over the next 10 years.

"Even if spending is not going up as fast as it was before, it's not coming down," said Robert L. Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, a bipartisan group that advocates budget discipline.

Despite a public outcry this year over pork-barrel spending sought by individual lawmakers for local projects, Mr. Bixby said, the main causes of higher spending stem from the war in Iraq and entitlement programs.

Both supporters and critics of Mr. Bush cautioned against attributing much long-term significance to the recent fiscal improvement, in part because tax revenues have become more volatile.

In the late 1990's, revenues exceeded predictions by more than $100 billion a year. After the recession of 2001, revenues plunged about $100 billion below what could be explained by slower economic growth and higher unemployment.

One reason for the increased volatility may be that, contrary to a popular assumption, a disproportionate share of income taxes is paid by wealthy households, and their incomes are based much more on the swings of the stock market than on wages and salaries. About one-third of all income taxes are paid by households in the top 1 percent of income earners, who make more than about $300,000 a year. Because those households also earn the overwhelming share of taxable investment income and executive bonuses, both their incomes and their tax liabilities swing sharply in bull and bear markets.

"These people have incomes that fluctuate much more rapidly, so when the economy is doing well and the stock market is doing well, tax revenues will be up," said Brian Riedl, a budget analyst at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative research organization. "Rapidly fluctuating tax revenues will continue to be the norm for years to come."

Compared with the size of the economy, tax revenues are still below historical norms and far below what the administration predicted as recently as 2003.

Tax receipts amounted to about 17.5 percent of the nation's gross domestic product in 2005, far below the level five years ago and still slightly below the average of 18 percent since World War II. Spending, by contrast, is running at about 20 percent of gross domestic product .

"Spending has not been restrained," Mr. Riedl said. "One hundred percent of the reduced deficit is because taxpayers are sending more money to Washington."

Agency Sees Record Corporate Tax Receipts (LAT)

By From Bloomberg News

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

The report will let the White House announce a $100-billion cut in the U.S. budget deficit.

WASHINGTON — Corporate tax receipts this year will probably cross the $300-billion threshold for the first time, boosting efforts to trim the U.S. budget deficit, the Congressional Budget Office said.

The budget agency, in its monthly review released Friday, estimated that corporate receipts would exceed $330 billion in fiscal 2006, up 18% from 2005. That is double the increase that the agency estimated at the beginning of the government's fiscal year, which ends Sept. 30.

The White House Office of Management and Budget is expected to announce Tuesday that, because of the increased tax receipts, the deficit will be about $100 billion less than what was projected six months ago. President Bush pledged in his 2004 State of the Union address to halve the deficit by 2009.

"We are on track to meet the president's goal," said Rob Portman, White House budget director.

Congressional analysts say the deficit could drop this year to $300 billion, down from $318 billion in 2005 and from an all-time high of $412 billion in 2004.

A smaller deficit might give Republicans ammunition to rebut criticism of their economic policies ahead of the November congressional elections and to deflect arguments that U.S. fiscal policy risks hurting the global economy.

The Congressional Budget Office said federal spending through June was 8.6% higher than in the first nine months of fiscal 2005. It attributed much of the increase to Katrina and Rita recovery efforts, interest on the public debt, and the Medicare prescription drug plan.

The Treasury is drawing an increased share of its revenue from corporations, with companies providing 13% of total tax revenue in fiscal 2005, up from 10% in 2004 and from about 7% in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0039229

Individual tax payments, which make up the bulk of the government's tax revenue, total an estimated $791 billion so far this year, up about 14.1%, the Congressional Budget Office said.

Why U.S. Companies Shouldn't Whine About Taxes (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

WASHINGTON

TO hear some people talk, the United States is the scourge of the Fortune 500. Despite all the tax cuts that President Bush and Congress have passed in the last five years, business groups and their supporters in Washington complain that the United States imposes higher tax rates on corporate profits than almost any other industrialized country.

"Foreign-based competitor companies operate under tax rules that are often more favorable than our own," warned R. Glenn Hubbard, a former economic adviser to President Bush and now dean of the Columbia Business School, at a House hearing two weeks ago. "Current law can result in circumstances that harm the competitiveness of U.S. companies."

Around Washington, the rumblings are growing for "reform" of corporate taxes to improve the global competitiveness of American companies.

Henry M. Paulson Jr., the incoming Treasury secretary, declared at his confirmation hearing that he wanted to increase "competitiveness" in the tax code.

Can it be true that the United States, where bare-knuckled capitalism is a romantic ideal and being nouveau riche is a badge of honor, is harder on big corporations than "old Europe" welfare states like Germany, France and Sweden?

Don't believe it. There are plenty of problems with the corporate tax code — rococo complexity, perverse incentives, antique ideas — but overly high taxes is not one of them.

By most measures, the corporate tax burden is lower in the United States than it is in the European Union or in Japan or most other industrialized countries.

The political danger, at least from a fiscal standpoint, is that arguments for corporate tax reform will be hijacked to justify another round of corporate tax cuts. That was what happened with the corporate tax overhaul of 2004, which became a grab bag of tax breaks to almost every corner of business, at a net cost of $60 billion over 10 years.

Those who see the American corporate tax as oppressive point to a striking fact: the standard corporate tax rate of 35 percent is now higher than that of most other industrialized countries. The average top rate is 25.8 percent in the European Union, where most nations have cut rates to attract investment.

But official tax rates are not the same as actual tax burdens. What American companies lose in high tax rates they more than make up in higher tax breaks.

One indicator of the true tax burden is corporate tax revenue as a share of gross domestic product. According to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, a research organization based in Paris and financed by governments of industrialized nations, corporate taxes in 2003 were 2.1 percent of G.D.P. in the United States, 3.2 percent in the European Union and 4.3 percent in industrialized countries in Asia.

Though comparisons of true tax rates are treacherous, the evidence suggests that the United States more than makes up for high statutory rates with generous tax breaks. Robert S. McIntyre, director of Citizens for Tax Justice, has calculated that the average corporation paid taxes of about 18 percent in 2004.

The European Commission, using a more theoretical approach, calculated that the average effective tax rate in 15 Western European nations has hovered between 20 and 22 percent since 1998. When the 10 new Central European members of the European Union are included, the average corporate tax bite was 17.7 percent.

"There is good reason to believe that the corporate tax burden in the United States could be less than the rest of the world because the rest of the world has been broadening their tax bases while we have been cutting ours," said Martin A. Sullivan, an analyst at the journal Tax Notes.

To be sure, many experts contend that the American tax code does impose some competitive disadvantages. One big complaint is that the United States is one of the very few countries that taxes corporate profits worldwide. Almost all other nations use "territorial" systems, taxing only profits inside their borders.

The difference is significant. Thyssen-Krupp, the German steel conglomerate, owes no German taxes on profits from its operations in Brazil, China or Poland. And European value-added tax on domestic sales does not apply to exports to the United States. United States Steel, by contrast, potentially owes American taxes on profits from its subsidiary in Slovakia and must also charge value-added taxes on exports sold in Germany.

In practice, the disadvantage is smaller than it appears. For one thing, American companies receive tax credits for taxes paid in other countries. More important, American companies have proved extremely adept at shifting profits into low-tax countries like Ireland and then deferring the American taxes on those profits by keeping them outside the United States.

Under current federal law, companies can postpone taxes on foreign profits until those profits return to the United States. By some estimates, American multinationals had accumulated more than $400 billion in profits outside the country.

Last year, Congress rewarded that behavior. First, it widened companies' ability to claim tax credits against their foreign taxes, at a cost to the Treasury of almost $40 billion over 10 years. Second, it gave companies a one-time chance to repatriate their vast hoard of overseas profits at a tax rate of only 5.25 percent — a bonanza for many pharmaceutical and electronics businesses.

"The current U.S. rules, while complex, represent the best of all worlds for multinational taxpayers," declared Stephen E. Shay, a former international tax counsel to the Treasury Department, at a hearing last month of a House Ways and Means subcommittee.

MANY analysts agree that today's rules are a mess: they do not raise much revenue from foreign profits, they encourage companies to invest outside the United States, they encourage profit-shifting schemes and they probably put some American companies at a competitive disadvantage.

The challenge is to change the system without cutting taxes yet again. Michael J. Graetz, a professor at Yale Law School and a proponent of radical tax overhaul, told lawmakers last month that the top corporate tax rate ought to be cut from 35 percent to as little as 15 percent.

But Mr. Graetz said Congress would have to make up for the lost revenue. "It is not possible to achieve this kind of corporate rate reduction without a major restructuring of our domestic tax system," he said.

President Bush called for exactly such a revenue-neutral restructuring during his re-election campaign. But any overhaul would provoke intense battles between potential winners and losers. With Republicans terrified about losing control of Congress in the midterm elections this year, Mr. Bush has postponed making any proposals until at least next year.

Bush Asks Senate To Raise Science Spending (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, July 9, 2006

President Bush on Saturday urged the Senate to back increased government spending on basic scientific research.

The proposal is part of Bush's initiative to boost U.S. competitiveness in the global marketplace through innovation. He also wants to train thousand of new science and math teachers and extend a popular tax credit businesses can receive for investing in research and development. The total price tag over 10 years would be $136 billion.

Some Democrats have expressed concern that Bush is increasing federal math and science education spending while cutting overall discretionary spending on education by trimming money in areas such as the arts, parent-resource centers and drug-free schools.

But Bush said in his weekly radio address that his proposals are vital for America to "remain an innovative nation that competes with confidence" and would help ensure that every U.S. child has the math and science skills needed for the jobs of the future.

The president devoted part of a two-day trip to Illinois to his American Competitiveness Initiative, visiting Cabot Microelectronics Corp., headquartered in Aurora, Ill., in Chicago's exurbs.

Donning protective eyewear and a white lab coat, Bush toured a laboratory of the supplier of products used in making semiconductors. Cabot is in the district of House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., who accompanied Bush to the facility.

"Cutting-edge firms like Cabot are creating good jobs for our workers and helping to keep America competitive in the global economy," Bush said in his radio remarks.

He said the Senate should follow the House's lead and approve full funding of the basic research component of his initiative, which would double federal spending on basic research in the physical sciences.

The president also put a rosy spin on a new jobs report that showed U.S. employers added a disappointing 121,000 jobs last month.

The count of new jobs added to the economy in June did mark an improvement from the 92,000 new positions logged in May — the fewest in seven months. But it still fell short of economists' forecasts for an increase of around 175,000, and the Dow Jones industrials lost 134.63 points Friday to close at 11,090.67.

DOJ_NMG_0039231

The April-to-June average of 108,000 jobs a month also was down from the average of 176,000 a month for the previous quarter. The moderation in job growth comes as companies cope with rising energy prices and interest rates and try to determine how much of a slowdown in overall economic activity the country is likely to encounter in the months ahead.

Still, Bush celebrated 34 straight months of job increases.

"Our economic expansion is lifting the lives of millions of Americans," he said.

Democrats focused on the tepid nature of the growth, noting it was smaller than needed to keep up with population increases.

"Instead of doing something to address sky-high gas prices, expensive loans and outsourced jobs, this president is holding photo ops touting his policies that are failing small businesses," said Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass.

Bush Can't Provide Power For Nationals (WP)

By Adam Kilgore

The Washington Post/AP, July 9, 2006

The former owner of the Texas Rangers came out to RFK Stadium last night to sit with his wife, Laura, watch a little baseball and, hopefully, see the Washington Nationals win, as had happened in both games he attended last season.

As word spread through the Nationals' dugout in the second inning that President Bush had come to his first game this season, players and coaches turned and gazed up at the owner's box, pointing and talking to each other.

Before the game ended, another Ivy League graduate born in Texas -- 6-foot-10, 260-pound right-hander Chris Young -- had stolen Bush's spotlight, limiting the Nationals to just one run after Alfonso Soriano blasted Young's first pitch over the center field fence. Young's counterpart, Pedro Astacio, allowed three home runs, and the Nationals lost, 5-2, to the San Diego Padres.

"Tell him to keep coming out," Nationals shortstop Royce Clayton said. "See how his record stands up."

Make it 2-1 lifetime for Bush, as not even his presence could stop San Diego's dominance in D.C. The Padres swept the Nationals here last season, and last night won their second straight in Washington.

The Nationals had been making progress toward their goal of reaching a .500 record on this homestand, taking the first two series against the Tampa Bay Devil Rays and Florida Marlins. But last night's loss made winning this series impossible and halted any momentum Washington had gathered heading into the all-star break.

"We play good, bad, good, bad," second baseman Jose Vidro said. "That's where we are right now."

By the time Bush left in the seventh inning, the Nationals had used four pitchers because of a short and unsuccessful outing by Astacio, who was making only his second start this season. Nationals Manager Frank Robinson had Astacio on an 85-pitch count, but Astacio couldn't last even that long. He exited after 66 pitches and 3 2/3 innings, having surrendered five runs, four earned, on nine hits.

Many of hits came when he was ahead in the count but left pitches at belt level.

"That's not good pitching," Robinson said. "You just don't do that. He didn't locate the ball well."

The outing contrasted with Astacio's first start this season, when he allowed just one run on three hits in five strong innings on Monday. He equaled that run total in just two batters last night when Mike Cameron hit a long solo home run off the clock in right center.

Astacio navigated through the next two innings without harm, but Adrian Gonzales greeted him in the fourth and knocked the first pitch over the left field fence to give the Padres a 2-1 lead.

After Khalil Greene singled for his fifth hit in two games this series, Mark Bellhorn drove the first pitch he saw into the Nationals' bullpen. The Padres led 4-1, and Astacio's pitch count was growing less and less relevant. Fatigue would not knock him out of this game; the Padres would. They added one more in the inning on a sacrifice fly by Dave Roberts, and Cameron finally chased him with a hard single.

Meanwhile, Astacio's opposite number, Young, mowed down batter after batter. A Princeton grad born in Dallas, Young is becoming one the league's most dominant pitchers in just his second full season. He was the National League pitcher of the month in June after going 3-0 with a 1.17 ERA and striking out 34 in 30 2/3 innings. He entered last night's start with a 3.13 ERA this season, seventh in the National League.

"He's deceptive," Clayton said. "He's a big-framed guy, and the ball kind of jumps out at you. He changed eye levels and pitched well."

But not well enough for Soriano, who crushed Young's first offering, an inside fastball, deep to left center, tying the game at 1. It was Soriano's third leadoff home run this season and 26th off his career.

"I was thinking it was going to be a good night for us," Soriano said afterward.

DOJ_NMG_0039232

But Young, who was originally signed by Nationals scouting director Dana Brown when Brown worked for the Pittsburgh Pirates, cruised through the rest of the first and through the next five innings. The Nationals drew four hits off Young over that span and never threatened to score as the Padres wailed away at Astacio.

The Nationals have scored only four runs in two games against San Diego, which may not be enough if they want to salvage what had been a successful homestand.

"We got to really beat up on them," Robinson said with a sly grin. "Score about three or four runs."

Bush Attends Padres-Nationals Game (AP)

AP, July 9, 2006

President Bush made a low-key appearance at Saturday night's game between the Washington Nationals and the San Diego Padres.

Bush sat between first lady Laura Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice as they and several guests settled into a VIP box during the first inning.

Unlike Bush's previous visits to RFK Stadium, there was no red, white and blue bunting in front of the box to identify the important visitor, and there were no obvious signs of extra security before the game.

There was no advance word that Bush would be attending and reporters accompanying him were not told where he was going until the presidential motorcade neared the ballpark.

The president and his party left at the middle of the seventh inning with San Diego leading 5-1 and were back at the White House minutes later. The Padres went on to win 5-2.

Among others attending the game with the president were his brother Marvin, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Chief of Staff Josh Bolten.

Bush, a former part-owner of the Texas Rangers, has attended three Nationals games at RFK since major league baseball returned to Washington last year. He threw out the ceremonial first pitch amid much fanfare at the 2005 home opener, the stadium's first game since 1971. He and Rice also attended a game in June. The Nationals won both games.

Vice President Cheney threw out the first pitch at this year's home opener and was greeted with what seemed to be more boos than cheers as he walked on the field.

Padres Continue To Rule RFK (WT)

By Ken Wright

The Washington Times, July 9, 2006

Washington Nationals right-hander Pedro Astacio, who pitched for the San Diego Padres last season when they swept a three-game series at RFK Stadium, couldn't keep the Padres from staying perfect in the nation's capital last night.

Padres starter Chris Young outpitched Astacio and the Nationals in a 5-2 victory before 27,060, including President Bush and Laura Bush, who unexpectedly dropped by for the first time this season, accompanied by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. It was the third game President Bush has attended -- and the first loss he has witnessed -- and the first for the first lady since baseball returned to the District last year.

Young (8-4) allowed two runs on seven hits and no walks in six innings. He struck out nine Nationals (38-51), his second-highest total of the season. In his last eight starts, the 6-foot-10 right-hander is 5-1 with a 1.75 ERA. The Padres (47-40) are now 5-0 at RFK since the Nationals moved from Montreal.

"He has a sneaky fastball, changeup and a very good curveball," Nationals manager Frank Robinson said. "He moved the ball around in the strike zone, up, down, in and out with his fastball and mixed in breaking balls."

In 2003, Young was a member of the Montreal Expos organization. The former Princeton basketball player advanced that season to Class AA Harrisburg from Class A Brevard County.

"I don't remember facing him or seeing him around," said second baseman Jose Vidro, the franchise's longest-tenured player. "I heard he was with us. It's another player that left us I guess."

As for Astacio (1-1), the long ball was his downfall last night. He gave up three homers in his 32/3 innings, accounting for four of the five runs he allowed to the National League West-leading Padres.

Mike Cameron hit his 10th homer of the season in the first inning, blasting Astacio's fastball off the clock beyond the center-field fence -- well more than 400 feet away.

The Padres knocked Astacio out of the game in the fourth. San Diego first baseman Adrian Gonzalez hit his second home run in as many nights and 13th of the season -- a towering home run to right field for a 2-1 San Diego lead.

DOJ_NMG_0039233

After shortstop Khalil Greene singled following Gonzalez's home run, Mark Bellhorn delivered his seventh home run of the season for a 4-1 lead.

The Padres added their fourth run of the inning on Dave Roberts' sacrifice fly to center. Astacio gave up five runs on nine hits.

"I left a couple pitches on top of the plate," Astacio said.

Coming in, Astacio had not allowed more than two runs in any of his last eight starts. Granted, those starts spanned 1½ seasons, including a win in Washington last season. The Nationals signed Astacio to a free agent deal during the offseason soon after Brian Lawrence, acquired in a trade from the Padres, blew out his rotator cuff in spring training.

The Nationals signed Astacio to a one-year, $1 million deal March 2. Astacio arrived to camp late and was unimpressive most of the spring. On April 1, in the final exhibition game of the season against the Baltimore Orioles at Camden Yards, Astacio pulled himself from the game before the third inning because of right forearm tightness. That problem turned into a three-month absence from the Nationals for Astacio.

When he finally made his season debut on Monday against the Florida Marlins, the 36-year-old looked good. In the Nationals' 9-1 win, Astacio allowed just one run on three hits in five innings.

Astacio's counterpart last night allowed a homer on his first pitch of the game. Alfonso Soriano's blast off Young was his third leadoff home run of the season and 27th overall.

"When I tied the game at 1-1, I thought it was going to be a good night for us," Soriano said. "Chris Young is a very strong guy and pitched a very good game. It's hard to see the ball."

Soriano, who was voted by fans and players to start in the National League's outfield in Tuesday's All-Star Game, produced the 26th leadoff home run of his career and the second of this 10-game homestand. Soriano also homered to Monday to lead off.

Soriano is the Nationals' lone All-Star this season.

Several of the Padres pitchers, including ace Jake Peavy and closer Trevor Hoffman, thought Young should have been named to the NL's All-Star team. Young was the NL pitcher of the month for June, going 3-0 with a 1.17 ERA in five starts (302/3 innings) with 34 strikeouts.

Young was one of five finalists for the final spot on the NL All-Star team that went to Los Angeles Dodgers first baseman Nomar Garciaparra by a fans vote on the Internet.

The Nationals produced their second run of the game in the seventh when center fielder Alex Escobar doubled to center and then scored on Royce Clayton's RBI single to make it 5-2.

His Hipness, John G. Roberts (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

WASHINGTON

WRITING in April for a unanimous Supreme Court, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. found that the police in Brigham City, Utah, acted properly in entering a home without a warrant after they peered through a window and saw a fight in progress that had left one man spitting blood.

"The role of a police officer includes preventing violence and restoring order, not simply rendering first aid to casualties," the chief justice said, rejecting the argument that the police should have waited until the altercation ended more conclusively. "An officer is not like a boxing (or hockey) referee, poised to stop a bout only if it becomes too one-sided," he explained.

The chief justice's sports imagery galvanized the legal blogs. Some found his boxing reference inapt. "The whole point of boxing is fighting!" wrote a participant on the Althouse blog, run by Ann Althouse, a law professor at the University of Wisconsin.

Others took issue with the hockey reference. "Given all the padding that hockey players wear, being punched by an opponent hardly is more significant than being hit by a toddler," one said.

Finally, another writer took a step back and observed that "this shows another side of Roberts as a good writer: displaying some wry humor and hipness."

It is no surprise that the new chief justice's every vote is being tabulated and scrutinized. But so is his every metaphor. Beyond John Roberts the chief justice, what has this first term revealed about John Roberts the judge?

He wrote eight majority opinions, roughly his fair share, given that there were 69 opinions to divide among the nine justices. He also wrote three dissenting opinions and two concurrences. While not a huge body of work, it is enough to convey at least a preliminary sense of his judicial voice.

It is direct, straightforward, free of legal jargon, the voice of a lawyer who made a living selling complicated ideas to busy appellate judges under tight time constraints.

Prof. Erwin Chemerinsky of Duke University Law School, who spent the past week editing the term's cases for inclusion in his constitutional law textbook, said that the Roberts opinions were refreshingly easy to edit compared with those of most other justices. "His prose style is clear and easy to follow," Professor Chemerinsky said. "He tells you right in the first paragraph exactly what the case is about."

Prof. Akhil Amar of Yale Law School praised the Roberts style for "elegance and economy" as well as for the "occasionally snappy line" that could crystallize a case for lay readers. He gave two examples. One was a majority opinion that rejected the government's application of federal narcotics law to stop a Brazil-based religious group from importing a hallucinogenic tea for use in its rituals. "The government's argument echoes the classic rejoinder of bureaucrats throughout history: If I make an exception for you, I'll have to make one for everybody, so no exceptions," the chief justice wrote.

The second was a majority opinion that found that the state of Arkansas had denied due process to a homeowner by seizing and selling his house for nonpayment of property taxes without taking reasonable steps to notify him of his jeopardy. Referring to Gary K. Jones, the homeowner, Chief Justice Roberts wrote: "In response to the returned form suggesting that Jones had not received notice that he was about to lose his property, the state did — nothing."

"That little dash is brilliant," Professor Amar said. "Every ordinary citizen can understand the frustration of dealing with government stupidity."

Among legal academics, the Roberts opinion that received by far the most attention was the one rejecting a constitutional challenge to the Solomon Amendment, under which universities forfeit all federal grants if they fail to open their doors to military recruiters. A group of law schools argued that the statute violated their rights to free speech and association.

As the case reached the court, many law professors who had supported the challenge began to have second thoughts, fearful that the First Amendment argument, if accepted, would undermine many anti-discrimination laws by permitting bigots to opt out in the name of free association. Even liberals, or perhaps especially liberals, were therefore relieved by the chief justice's conclusion that because the law regulated neither speech nor association, but merely conduct, it raised no First Amendment problem.

Jack Balkin, a professor at Yale Law School, said on his blog that the chief justice's opinion "was carefully and skillfully written to make almost no new law." Professor Balkin said the opinion made the case "look easy by artfully dodging every interesting constitutional law question in sight."

That raises the question of whether the chief justice's performance conforms to his own stated goal: to be a "minimalist" judge who decides no more than necessary, an umpire simply calling balls and strikes. The answer is yes, and no.

"He's 'minimalist' in recognizing that the court is an ongoing enterprise with precedents and history and tradition," said Frederick Schauer, a professor at the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard. "He is not coming in with a big new theory or a big new perspective."

On the other hand, the chief justice joined opinions by Justice Antonin Scalia in environmental and criminal cases that reached beyond the specific disputes at hand to call long-settled assumptions into question. And several of his opinions had a rhetorical edge. "It is a sordid business, this divvying us up by race," he wrote in dissent from a decision that enforced the Voting Rights Act to invalidate a Texas Congressional district.

His seeming allergy to citing law review articles, or any other sources outside the body of the court's published opinions, is a striking feature of the Roberts approach. "It's as if the answers to all questions are already there, completely internal to the court, to be teased out of the existing cases," said David Barron, a professor at Harvard Law School.

Chief Justice Roberts, a former managing editor of the Harvard Law Review, has cited only a single law review article, one written by Judge Henry Friendly, for whom he clerked on the federal appeals court in New York. It was a tip of the hat in his first opinion.

Relying on precedent as the only source of law is an approach with strengths and weaknesses, Professor Barron said, noting that on the one hand, precedent can be a smokescreen, "a rhetorical device to hide the inevitable policy making," while on the other, "it has its own constraining effects," making a judge less likely to embrace dramatic change in the status quo.

Whether John Roberts's first year is a good predictor of his 10th, 20th or 30th is an open question. According to a new study by the political scientists Lee Epstein and Jeffrey A. Segal, Chief Justice Earl Warren voted against criminal defendants and civil rights litigants 62 percent of the time during his first term. Eventually, of course, he became their champion.

But such a trajectory is rare. The other chief justices of the last 50 years, Fred M. Vinson, Warren E. Burger and William H. Rehnquist — Chief Justice Roberts's mentor — all stayed true to their early form.

What Chief Justice Roberts Forgot In His First Term: Judicial Modesty (NYT)

By Adam Cohen

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

At the confirmation hearings for John Roberts, there were two theories about what kind of a chief justice he would be. His critics maintained that he was an extreme conservative whose politics would drive his legal rulings. Judge Roberts, on the other hand, insisted that he was "not an ideologue," and that his judicial philosophy was to be "modest," which he defined as recognizing that judges should "decide the cases before them" and not try to legislate or "execute the laws."

Judicial modesty is an intriguing idea, with appeal across the political spectrum. For all the talk of liberal activist judges, anyone who is paying attention knows that conservative judges are every bit as activist as liberal ones; they just act for different reasons. A truly modest chief justice could be more deferential to the decisions of the democratically elected branches of government, both liberal and conservative, and perhaps even usher in a new, post-ideological era on the court.

That is not, however, how Chief Justice Roberts voted in his first term. He was modest in some cases, certainly, but generally ones in which criminal defendants, Democrats and other parties conservatives dislike were asking for something. When real estate developers, wealthy campaign contributors and other powerful parties wanted help, he was more inclined to support judicial action, even if it meant trampling on Congress and the states.

The term's major environmental ruling was a striking case in point. A developer sued when the Army Corps of Engineers denied him a permit to build on what it determined to be protected wetlands. The corps is under the Defense Department, ultimately part of an elected branch, and it was interpreting the Clean Water Act, passed by the other elected branch. Courts are supposed to give an enormous amount of deference to agencies' interpretations of the statutes they are charged with enforcing.

But Chief Justice Roberts did not defer. He joined a stridently anti-environmentalist opinion by Justice Antonin Scalia that sided with the developer and mocked the corps's interpretation of the law — an interpretation four justices agreed with — as "beyond parody." The opinion also complained that the corps's approach was too costly. Justice John Paul Stevens dryly noted that whether benefits outweighed costs was a policy question that "should not be answered by appointed judges."

In an opinion on assisted suicide, Chief Justice Roberts was again a conservative activist. The case involved Attorney General John Ashcroft's attempt to invoke an irrelevant federal statute to block Oregon's assisted suicide law, which the state's voters had adopted by referendum. Even though it meant overruling the voters, intruding on state sovereignty and mangling the words of a federal statute, Chief Justice Roberts dissented to support Mr. Ashcroft's position.

Chief Justice Roberts voted against another democratically enacted, progressive law when the court struck down Vermont's strict limits on campaign contributions. He joined an opinion that not only held that the law violated the First Amendment, but also engaged in the kind of fine judicial line-drawing — in this case, about the precise dollar limits the Constitution allows states to impose — that is often considered a hallmark of judicial activism.

One of the court's most nakedly activist undertakings in recent years is the series of hoops it has forced Congress to jump through when it passes laws that apply to the states. Judge John Noonan Jr., a federal appeals court judge appointed by President Ronald Reagan, has complained that the justices have set themselves up as the overseers of Congress. But Chief Justice Roberts voted to put up yet another hoop, requiring Congress to put the states on "clear notice" — whatever that means — before requiring them to pay for expert witnesses in lawsuits involving special education. It is a made-up rule that shows little respect for the people's representatives.

These cases make Chief Justice Roberts seem like a raging judicial activist. But in cases where conservative actions were being challenged, he was quite the opposite. When a whistle-blower in the Los Angeles district attorney's office claimed he was demoted for speaking out, Chief Justice Roberts could find no First Amendment injury. When Democrats challenged Republicans' partisan gerrymandering of Texas's Congressional districts, he could find no basis for interceding.

The Roberts court's first term was not radically conservative, but only because Justice Anthony Kennedy, the swing justice, steered it on a centrist path. If Chief Justice Roberts — who voted with Justice Scalia a remarkable 88 percent of the time in nonunanimous cases — had commanded a majority, it would have been an ideologically driven court that was both highly conservative and just about as activist as it needed to be to get the results it wanted.

Chief Justice Roberts still probably views himself as judicially modest, and in some ways he may be. He has been reasonably respectful of precedent, notably when he provided a fifth vote to uphold Buckley v. Valeo, a critically important campaign finance decision that is under attack from the right. He has also been inclined to decide cases narrowly, rather than to issue sweeping judicial pronouncements. But at his confirmation hearings, he defined judicial modesty as not usurping the legislative and executive roles.

His approach to his new job is no doubt still evolving, which could be a good thing. The respect for the elected branches that he invoked while testifying before the Senate Judiciary Committee is hardly a perfect judicial philosophy, especially today, when we need the court to resist the president's dangerous view of his own power. Still, that principled approach would do more for the court and the nation than the predictable arch-conservatism the chief justice's opinions have shown so far.

Army, Taxed By War Costs, Struggles To Pay Bills At Home (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times/AP, July 9, 2006

FORT SAM HOUSTON, Tex., July 8 (AP) — A diversion of money for the war in Iraq has helped create a $530 million shortfall for Army posts at home and abroad, leaving some of them unable to pay utility bills or even cut the grass, military officials say.

In San Antonio, Fort Sam Houston has not paid its $1.4 million monthly utility bill since March, prompting workers in many of the post's administrative buildings to receive automated disconnection notices.

Fort Bragg in North Carolina says it will not buy any office supplies until the new fiscal year starts in October.

And in Kentucky, Fort Knox closed one of its eight dining halls for a month and laid off 133 contract workers.

"Every time something goes away, it impacts a person: a soldier or their family or one of our civilians," said Col. Wendy Martinson, garrison commander at Fort Sam Houston, which has 27,300 military and civilian workers. "I'm charged with taking care of them, not taking things away from them."

Garrisons function as the city halls of Army installations, providing services like garbage removal, mail delivery and firefighting. The Installation Management Agency of the Army is $530 million short of what it needs through Oct. 1 to finance garrisons at the 117 installations it oversees in the United States, Europe and Asia, said an agency spokesman, Stephen Oertwig.

The increasing cost of fuel is partly to blame, and it costs more to pay civilians in Asia and Europe, Mr. Oertwig said. Another major factor is the practice of financing the war through spending bills outside the annual budget.

As Congress spent months debating a supplemental spending bill, the Army had to divert money from the Installation Management Agency's budget to cover the cost of the war, Mr. Oertwig said.

The Army often diverts operations money for other programs, in times of war and peace, said Jeremiah Gertler, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. The supplemental spending bill usually replenishes those funds.

This year, though, most of the military money in the $94.5 billion bill was earmarked for the war, leaving little to pay back operations accounts, Mr. Gertler said.

Military officials could have asked for more money to ease the garrison budget crunch, but they knew a bigger request would have created a bigger fight in Congress, Mr. Gertler said.

"The Pentagon is reluctant to ask for any more than they need for the war because it all looks like it's going to the war and becomes a very controversial bill," Mr. Gertler said.

But Michael O'Hanlon, a military analyst at the Brookings Institution, the liberal-leaning research organization, said money management seemed to be the larger problem. The Defense Department spends about as much on maintenance and operations as it does on weapons and personnel combined, Mr. O'Hanlon said, so there should be more than enough for the bills.

"It makes me worry if the Pentagon can't do its accounting well enough to find money for its electric bills," he said. "It just boggles my mind a little bit."

The legislation that Congress approved on June 15 included $722 million for the Installation Management Agency, to be split among its installations.

Colonel Martinson did not know how much Fort Sam Houston would get, but she said she expected it would be enough to pay the electricity bill. A spokesman for CPS Energy said the company understood the problem and would not turn off the lights any time soon.

However, the new money will not save the jobs of about 100 contract workers Colonel Martinson dismissed.

Astronauts: Daring Spacewalk Method Works (AP)

A key test of a daring yet wobbly spacewalking technique that could be used someday to repair space shuttle heat shields worked well Saturday and got good reviews from two astronauts from the shuttle Discovery, NASA officials said.

The repair simulation put them at the end of an oscillating, 100-foot combination of a robotic arm and an extension pole that astronaut Piers Sellers said made him feel "like a bug on the end of a fishing rod here."

DOJ_NMG_0039237

In a 7 1/2-hour spacewalk, the first of three orbital excursions planned for this mission, Sellers and Michael Fossum said they could do most of the mock tasks they were assigned with only moderate difficulty.

And that's what NASA wanted to hear.

"It was above and beyond" what engineers expected, flight director Tony Ceccacci said after the spacewalk ended. "Hopefully, we'll never have to use it (the boom for repairs) but we know we have the capability."

The technique using the extension on the robotic arm was developed to make sure there is never a repeat of the Columbia disaster, which killed seven astronauts in 2003. A piece of foam from the shuttle's external fuel tank struck Columbia's wing during launch, creating a breach that allowed fiery gases to penetrate the shuttle during the return flight to Earth.

Last year, emergency spacewalking repairs were needed because of heat shield damage to Discovery.

Fossum and Sellers may get a chance to use the boom for a real repair on their third spacewalk, now scheduled for next Wednesday. NASA managers on Saturday were still evaluating whether a piece of fabric filler protruding from the thermal tiles on Discovery's belly needs to be removed. If it does, Fossum and Sellers would have to go back on the boom and yank out the filler.

Orbiter project manager Steve Poulos said a decision will be made Sunday on whether this gap filler — which is cracked, partially broken and just a couple inches at its longest point — must be removed. The early consensus is that it probably will be all right the way it is for re-entry, but engineers will pull an all-nighter to recommend what, if anything, needs to be done, he said.

Every other possible worry with the space shuttle heat shield has proven to be no big deal, deputy shuttle program manager John Shannon said. On Sunday, NASA may say Discovery is safe to land, he said, noting that Discovery's flight has "by far" the fewest problems he has ever seen.

NASA officials had been concerned that astronauts wouldn't be able to work well from the 50-foot extension boom attached to the similar-sized shuttle robotic arm. The agency's top spacewalk officer had compared it to painting a house from the top of a rickety ladder.

But as Fossum and Sellers were finishing up Saturday, NASA officials said they found less sway and oscillating than expected.

Fossum said one simulated operation was "beyond my ability" and "too much motion to handle" from the boom. But another way of doing the same job worked well, so that's not a concern, lead spacewalking officer Tomas Gonzalez-Torres said. Aside from that operation, however, the worst Fossum reported was one he rated a 5 on a 1-to-10 scale, which translates to doable but with "moderately objectionable deficiencies."

"I think we got all we needed there," Discovery pilot Mark Kelly told Fossum and Sellers after the simulation.

During Sellers' time on the boom-arm combo, he remarked as he was being moved into position that the ride was "a very slow gentle sway in and out of the bay."

Before their work on the boom-arm combo, the astronauts had an assignment on the outside of the space station, immobilizing a cable cutter on the station's mobile transporter, or railroad car, and rerouting a cable through it. A duplicate cable cutter accidentally cut a cable leading to the transporter late last year, and NASA wanted to make sure it doesn't happen again because the cable is a conduit for power, data and video images.

The transporter moves along the space station exterior and is used for constructing the complex. The severed cable will be replaced during a second spacewalk set for Monday.

The two astronauts also managed to enjoy themselves on the spacewalk which lasted an hour longer than normal because of glitches with tethers. At one point while waiting for Fossum, Sellers did a couple of flips. Both let out frequent "woo-hoos" during their time in space.

The also had time to marvel at the view from 210 miles above Earth.

"It's beautiful," Fossum said. "The thin glow of the moonlit Earth below."

And when Mission Control pointed out to Sellers that he could view Britain over his left shoulder, the British-born spacewalker said: "Wow! Oh, my goodness. It's a beautiful day in Ireland."

Looking down at the Caspian Sea several minutes later, Fossum said: "This is a good view ... I'm in a dream; nobody wake me up."

NASA's Balancing Act Passes Test (LAT)

By Michael Cabbage, Orlando Sentinel

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0039238

After a successful run-through on a boom held by the shuttle's robotic arm, the agency expects repairs will not be needed this time.

HOUSTON — Two spacewalkers bounced around on the end of a "skinny little pole" 210 miles above Earth on Saturday in a daring test for future shuttle repairs.

Astronauts Piers J. Sellers and Michael E. Fossum spent 7 1/2 hours outside shuttle Discovery on the fourth day of the ship's visit to the International Space Station. Anchored to a boom held by Discovery's robotic arm, the pair checked whether the 100-foot-long appendage was stable enough to support delicate maintenance work on the shuttle's heat shield.

Sellers, who performed three spacewalks during a 2002 shuttle visit to the station, was the first to stand at the end of the boom. As he was hoisted to a spot above the shuttle's cargo bay, he noted the smoothness of the ride.

"Very steady," Sellers said. "It's like being on a slow elevator."

Moments later, Sellers performed three sets of movements, leaning back and forth to simulate motions that would be used during repair work. The movements resembled a calisthenics session.

"It gets easier as you go along, doing all these tasks, you know, at the end of a skinny little pole," Sellers said. "A little practice makes perfect — or adequate."

When his turn came, Fossum, a rookie astronaut making his first spacewalk, mimicked the motions of someone making repairs to the orbiter's heat-resistant tiles and reported the operation was "no problem." Later, with both spacewalkers at the end, the boom showed more movement, but the swaying appeared to quickly stop.

Engineers had expected the vibrations to last up to a minute. Most dissipated in 15 to 20 seconds. The preliminary results led shuttle managers to conclude the test was a success.

"That's given us very good confidence," said Tony Ceccacci, the mission's lead flight director. "Hopefully, we'll never have to use it, but we know we have the capability."

Saturday's success bode well for a possible repair: plucking a card-like piece of ceramic-coated fabric from between heat-resistant tiles on Discovery's belly.

Engineers have been analyzing whether a gap filler protruding more than an inch from the rear of Discovery's heat shield could raise temperatures to dangerously high levels during the ship's descent through Earth's atmosphere.

A spacewalker performed two similar repairs during Discovery's flight last year. NASA officials are expected to announce today that a fix will not be needed this time.

NASA also finished its evaluation of questionable spots on two thermal panels that line the leading edge of Discovery's right wing. Engineers concluded Saturday that the spots would not pose a hazard for the shuttle's return flight.

'Very Smooth' New Crane Stars During Spacewalk Tests (WP)

By Guy Gugliotta

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

HOUSTON, July 8 -- Tethered like two lures at the end of a fishing rod, astronauts Piers Sellers and Michael Fossum rode space shuttle Discovery's spindly crane 70 feet into space on Saturday in an unprecedented test to see if the crane would remain stable enough to serve as a repair platform.

"Very smooth, very nice," said Sellers, as Discovery's sensor boom lifted him out of the cargo bay. "It's actually like a very slow elevator."

For several hours, first Sellers, then Fossum and Sellers together, bent, twisted, pushed and pulled at their restraints and at the side of the international space station to see how much the shuttle's cargo arm and its 50-foot boom extension would whiplash them.

Although few trips were as gentle as Sellers's initial liftoff, both astronauts reported sways of only one to two feet in most cases. At the conclusion of the spacewalk, Fossum performed simulated repairs at the end of the station's "P-1" truss, a distance of about 70 feet. When fully extended, the combination of arm and boom reaches 100 feet.

At the end of the day, Tomas Gonzalez Torres, NASA's extravehicular activities officer, said engineers were astonished at how effectively the boom performed. He noted that the astronauts got in and out of foot restraints without returning to the cargo bay, and that the boom took only "15 to 20 seconds" -- instead of the anticipated minute -- to stop swaying after it had been disturbed.

"Everybody is very happy," Gonzalez Torres told reporters at Houston's Johnson Space Center. He pronounced the boom ready for use as a repair platform: "I think we're set."

DOJ_NMG_0039239

Saturday was the fifth day in Discovery's 13-day mission, which has unfolded almost without a hitch. Steve Poulos, the Orbiter Project Office manager, said that analysts had "cleared" all but two blemishes on Discovery's heat shield and that the other two should be cleared Sunday.

John Shannon, chairman of the mission management team, said this meant that on Sunday he could clear Discovery for reentry, guaranteeing the orbiter's soundness. Shannon said Discovery's heat shielding was in "by far" the best shape of any shuttle he had ever seen.

Sellers and Fossum began their trip outside at 9:17 a.m. Eastern time, leaving the space station's Quest air lock for a spacewalk that ended 7 hours 31 minutes later. Their first task -- repairing the station's mobile tramway -- took a bit over an hour.

The next hours were devoted to testing the repair techniques. Astronauts are frequently lifted out of the cargo bay on the orbiter's 50-foot robotic arm, but Discovery's mission marked the first time spacewalkers have extended the crane with the 50-foot boom.

The boom is a relatively recent innovation. It was developed after the Columbia tragedy in 2003 as a mount for cameras and sensors that could scan the belly of the orbiter during onboard inspections to check for post-launch damage.

The boom performed so well last year that NASA planners decided to test it as a repair platform, enabling astronauts for the first time to reach any part of the orbiter by riding on the end of the arm-boom combination. The only question was whether the extension would be too whippy to allow an astronaut to use it without anchoring himself to his work site.

With shuttle astronauts Lisa M. Nowak and Stephanie Wilson operating the arm and boom, Sellers guided the crane to a cocked position "above" the orbiter. Fossum watched from the cargo bay.

"Pick up the camera, take two pictures and re-stow the camera," ordered shuttle pilot Mark Kelly, supervising the spacewalk from inside Discovery.

"I have the camera in my hand," began Sellers. He proceeded to describe his every movement and the effect on the stability of the arm -- "no perceptible motion," "a smooth, gentle sway," "motion stopped."

Kelly ordered other motions: "slow layback," "forward lay position -- hold position for five seconds." Sellers stepped out of his foot restraints and climbed around to the end of the boom, then put the restraints back on.

"Just a general comment," Sellers remarked after half an hour of this. "It gets easier as you go along, doing all these tasks on the end of a skinny little pole. A little practice makes perfect, or at least adequate."

Each movement was designed to mimic something that an astronaut would do if the shuttle needed repair -- taking pictures of damage, leaning forward to inspect, seeking a better vantage point by abandoning foot restraints for a tether.

Most important, Gonzalez Torres said, anything but inspections that could happen at the end of the crane-boom would involve two astronauts, so the second half of the test had Fossum in the foot restraints while a tethered Sellers grabbed hold of a tool stanchion.

As the shuttle dipped into darkness, leaving the spacewalkers spotlighted by the shuttle in the middle of nothingness, Kelly said, "You guys look lonely out there."

"Well, I'm just looking at Mike," Sellers replied.

The two astronauts performed a new series of movements on Kelly's command, then migrated to the end of the P-1 truss. There, Fossum mimicked repair techniques, using a simple "strain gauge" to measure force vectors as he pushed against the work surface.

Asked to rate the difficulty of each movement on a scale described by Kelly, Fossum relayed positive results, and noted that his technique improved with practice.

"This isn't bad," he said at one point. "I got the desired performance. It's a little bit annoying."

War Veterans Denied GI Bill Benefits (AJC)

By Ron Martz, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, July 9, 2006

SUMMERVILLE — Andy Rowe thought he had life after the Army pretty well figured out before he came home from eight months in Afghanistan in November 2003.

An Army reservist since high school, Rowe, 27, planned to serve out the remaining four months of his military obligation in the inactive Reserve, get his honorable discharge and then use his GI Bill education benefits to go to college, just as his father did more than 30 years ago.

But Rowe soon realized that, despite his time in a combat zone, he didn't qualify for those education benefits unless he remained in the Reserves or Guard.

DOJ_NMG_0039240

It's the same for tens of thousands of National Guard and Army Reserve troops mobilized since 9/11 — the largest deployment of reservists since World War II.

When military benefits were updated in 1984 through a law called the Montgomery GI Bill, members of Congress and even the military did not envision reservists being called into active duty as frequently as they are today. The law did not extend full college benefits to citizen soldiers and terminated them once they left the Guard or Reserve.

But since 2001, more than 500,000 reservists and Guard troops have been deployed for homeland security duties or sent to wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Yet when they get home, they don't get the same benefits as those who were active-duty servicemembers.

"Looking at how the Reserve forces are being used now, it really upset me," said Rowe, called up from the inactive Reserves to serve in Afghanistan.

Retired Army Col. Bob Norton is deputy director for government relations for the Washington-based Military Officers Association of America, which is lobbying for an extension of benefits.

"Under the law, [reservists and Guard troops] are veterans for every single benefit except the education benefits," Norton said.

Primary opposition to changing the education benefit for reservists and Guard troops — those on duty one weekend a month and two weeks in summer unless they are called to active duty — is coming from the Pentagon's Office of Reserve Affairs. Pentagon officials fear changes could hurt attracting and keeping men and women who sign up for the Guard or Reserve.

"It has proven to be a very attractive recruiting tool, and its effectiveness as a retention tool is certainly equally important to the Reserve components," Assistant Secretary of Defense for Reserve Affairs Thomas Hall testified in March before the House Veterans Affairs Committee.

The Military Officers Association has helped put together a consortium of about 40 groups and service organizations that represent more than 5.5 million vets — including such stalwarts as the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Association of the U.S. Army and Military Order of the Purple Heart — collectively known as the Partnership for Veterans Education. Several higher education associations such as the American Association of State Colleges and Universities and the American Council on Education also are part of the consortium. Its aim: to try to persuade Congress to provide more equality in education benefits for citizen soldiers.

The group is pushing especially hard for what it is calling the Total Force Montgomery GI Bill. One major selling point of this proposal is the portability of GI Bill education benefits. That would allow reservists such as Rowe to earn credits for education while mobilized, just like active-duty troops do, and then use them after they leave the service.

Current law gives troops who serve on active duty three or more years to collect up to $1,034 a month for 36 months as full-time students. That benefit is available up to 10 years after discharge.

Reserve and Guard troops can earn 60 percent of that, or about $22,000, if they are mobilized for 15 months — the average length of deployment — and then go to school full time. However, they can collect only if they remain in a Guard or Reserve unit. If they go into the inactive Reserve — also known as the Individual Ready Reserve — as Rowe did, or are discharged, they no longer are eligible for education benefits.

"Right now, it's a double standard. They are treating these reservists like second-class citizens," Norton said. U.S. Rep. Jim Matheson (D-Utah) said Marine reservists in his congressional district who were deployed after 9/11 alerted him to the disparity in benefits.

"When I heard about it, I didn't think it was right," Matheson said.

Last year, he co-sponsored with Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.) legislation that would enable Guard and Reserve troops who have accrued 24 months of active service within the last five years to be eligible for 100 percent of GI Bill education benefits.

Some unofficial cost estimates of the Total Force Montgomery GI Bill run as high as $4.5 billion for the first 10 years, although the Congressional Budget Office has yet to weigh in with more detailed figures.

Despite its cost, which could become a key obstacle in Congress, the bill now has 140 co-sponsors from both sides of the aisle, including Georgia Democrats John Barrow, Sanford Bishop, John Lewis and David Scott and Republican Nathan Deal.

"This is truly a bipartisan issue because it's about veterans," Matheson said.

The MOAA's Norton said another measure in the works is an amendment offered by Sen. Blanche Lincoln (D-Ark.) to the fiscal year 2007 Defense Authorization Bill.

This amendment would enable Guard and Reserve members mobilized for active duty to use their GI Bill education benefits after they leave military service.

Hall, the assistant secretary of defense who also is a retired rear admiral, told members of Congress that such a change could affect troop retention.

DOJ_NMG_0039241

"The fact that a member must continue to serve in the Reserves to maintain eligibility has greatly assisted the Reserve components as a whole in maintaining consistently high retention rates over the years and has increased the education level of our Reserve forces," he said.

But Norton contends that the Defense Department's own survey data show education is not a major factor in an individual's decision to re-enlist or extend in the Guard or Reserves.

Rowe said education benefits he thought he would receive as a reservist were only part of his decision to enlist in 1996, when he was 17 and still a high school junior in his hometown of Summerville.

"My father instilled a true sense of patriotism in me, and I wanted to do something for the country," Rowe said.

His father, Tim, had served in the Air Force and used his GI Bill benefits to obtain an education degree and become a teacher.

Rowe went to basic training between his junior and senior years in high school and then was assigned to a unit — first in Chattanooga, and later in Atlanta — as an information systems specialist. He served nearly six years in the active Reserve force before transferring to the Individual Ready Reserve.

In April 2003 he was recalled to active duty and sent to Afghanistan, giving up his civilian job as a project manager for a telecommunications company.

"All I wanted to do when I came home was get another job and go back to school. But then when I applied I found out I couldn't use the GI Bill so I had to reconsider things," he said.

Rowe now works for Covista Communications out of Chattanooga and said that the issue for him is not so much the money as the principle.

"I don't think there's anything that will be done to help me now, but I think it's something that definitely needs to be done for soldiers in the future," he said.

Congressman Paul's Legislative Strategy? He'd Rather Say Not. (WP)

By Libby Copeland

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

Republican Ron Paul missed out on the 19th century, but he admires it from afar. He speaks lovingly of the good old days before things like Social Security and Medicaid existed, before the federal government outlawed drugs like heroin.

In his legislative fantasies, the amiable Texas congressman would do away with the CIA and the Federal Reserve. He'd reinstate the gold standard. He'd get rid of the Department of Education and leave the business of schooling to local governments, because he believes that's what the Constitution intended.

"Article 1, Section 8 gives me zero amount of authority to do anything about public education," says Paul on a recent weekday. He's seated in his congressional office near a sign than says, "DON'T STEAL; THE GOVERNMENT HATES COMPETITION . "

Paul, 70, has earned the nickname Dr. No for his habit of voting against just about anything that he sees as government overreach or that interferes with the free market. No to the Iraq war. No to a federal ban on same-sex marriage. No to a congressional gold medal for Pope John Paul II and Ronald Reagan and Rosa Parks. He says the medals are an unconstitutional use of taxpayer money and once suggested each House member instead contribute 100 bucks from his or her own pocket.

Last year, Congress decided to send billions of dollars to victims of Hurricane Katrina. Guess how Ron Paul voted.

"Is bailing out people that chose to live on the coastline a proper function of the federal government?" he asks. "Why do people in Arizona have to be robbed in order to support the people on the coast?"

There have been periods in history when the maverick congressman was not such a rare breed, but this is not one of those periods. Democrats and Republicans have been quite disciplined in recent years -- when party leaders say "jump," the savvy congressman had better inquire how high.

This makes the presence of a politician like Ron Paul something of a refreshing peculiarity. He continually bucks the wishes of Republican leaders -- so much so, Paul recalls, that once while exhorting every other Republican to vote the party line, then-Speaker Newt Gingrich announced that Ron Paul was exempt.

Paul is not always alone in his dissent, but more than anyone else in Congress, he is legendary for it. "When I'm the only no vote," says fiscal conservative Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), "I can usually rest assured he's on a plane somewhere."

Paul left his party and ran for president in 1988 on the Libertarian ticket, traveling the country and speaking to crowds as small as 10. His iconoclasm may explain why, despite his years in Congress -- first in the late '70s and early '80s, and more recently since 1997 -- Paul doesn't hold a leadership post, doesn't chair a committee or subcommittee. He sees this as the price of being right.

"I never had a goal of working up the seniority ladder," he says.

Paul has an easy chuckle and a down-home, friendly manner that tempers his strong language. (In his columns, which appear online and are sometimes published in local newspapers, he pronounces a proposed government program "Orwellian" and calls former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan a "master of evasion." He once said on C-SPAN he feared being "bombed by the federal government at another Waco.")

He is father to five, grandfather to 17, and delivered something like 4,000 babies during his career as an obstetrician and gynecologist. Before he largely retired from his practice in 1996, he refused on principle to accept Medicare and Medicaid, and sometimes treated patients for free.

In Texas's 14th District, which runs along the northern Gulf Coast and includes the cities of Galveston and Victoria, Paul is either a beloved figure or a mystifying one. He calls himself the "taxpayers' best friend," and this has led him to controversial stands, such as voting against federal farming subsidies despite the wide swaths of agricultural land in his district. Because he won't cooperate with fellow Republicans in the House unless a bill is in line with his principles, some constituents feel he puts his libertarian agenda over the district's needs.

"He's certainly the taxpayer's friend if the taxpayer doesn't want to get anything done," says John W. Hancock Jr., a rice farmer and banker in El Campo. "All he does is go to Washington and write articles and vote no."

Paul's supporters see him as principled. He is known for constituent services such as getting medals for veterans who never received theirs. He is also a proponent of gun rights and he personally opposes abortion, though he thinks the matter should be left to the states.

"He's just consistent, consistent, consistent," says Debra Medina, the Wharton County Republican chairwoman. "He always talks about the Constitution and what the federal government ought to be doing, and he consistently articulates this basic mistrust of big government, which I think most people have."

Republican Party leaders supported a rival Republican in 1996, when Paul campaigned to return to Congress after a 12-year absence. Paul proved himself to be a strong fundraiser, gathering much of his money from out-of-state donors. He won a primary runoff, then eked out a three-point victory against his Democratic opponent in the general election.

The next time around, Democrats made him a top target, supporting a rice farmer named Loy Sneary. (Be "leery of Sneary," Paul warned. "Be cheery about Sneary," his opponent replied.) Paul won again. Since then, his margin of victory has gotten bigger in every election. This time around, he faces a Democrat named Shane Sklar, who is trying to paint Paul as out of touch with his district.

Paul's wife of nearly 50 years, Carol, quilts and came up with the idea to put together cookbooks that his campaign sends to constituents, many of whom also receive cards on their birthdays. His campaign Web site recently featured a recipe for chicken salad casserole, "a favorite of Brazoria County Republican Women." Paul almost always goes home to Lake Jackson on weekends.

"He doesn't want Potomac fever -- he thinks it's very contagious," says Carol Paul, who happens to be in Washington on a visit.

"I have a meeting with veterans on Saturday, and I have to check my tomato plants," the congressman says.

Ron Paul may seem an unlikely advocate for the repeal of federal drug laws, but this stance stems from the same impulse that leads him to call for the abolition of the Food and Drug Administration and its "health nannies." He says that decades of government programs can soften Americans' sense of personal responsibility and that the free market can do a better job of keeping people safe and healthy than the government can.

He also wants America to withdraw from the United Nations and NATO. He is against the government's "delusional, feel-good" policies of giving aid to needy countries in places like Africa; instead, private citizens and private groups should give charity if they want to. He has written that Americans "don't need to be forced to pay for foreign welfare at the barrel of a government gun."

Mainstream party platforms are riddled with inconsistencies; Paul tries to run what he believes is a straight course through every vote. Smaller government is better. That's why he winds up aligned with the most liberal of Democrats and the most conservative of Republicans. He takes inspiration from free-market economist Ludwig von Mises, whose photograph is mounted on a wall by his desk.

"He's like a gyroscope," says Neil Abercrombie (D-Hawaii), who is allied with Paul in opposition to the Iraq war. "No matter what happens, boom , he comes back up and goes exactly where he wants to go."

DOJ_NMG_0039243

Paul doesn't just question conventional wisdom. He stomps all over it. According to him, Abe Lincoln should never have gone to war; there were better ways of getting rid of slavery. He often attempts to prove his political theories by pointing to how things used to be. For instance, the federal government banning drugs like heroin doesn't work for the same reasons Prohibition didn't. The IRS doesn't need to exist for the same reasons it didn't exist before.

"We had a good run from 1776 to 1913," he says, referring to the years before the modern income tax. "We didn't have it; we did pretty well."

As for Social Security, "we didn't have it until 1935," Paul says. "I mean, do you read stories about how many people were laying in the streets and dying and didn't have medical treatment? . . . Prices were low and the country was productive and families took care of themselves and churches built hospitals and there was no starvation."

("Where to begin with this one?" asks Michael Katz, a historian of poverty at the University of Pennsylvania who has studied charity case records from the early 20th century. "The stories just break your heart, the kind of suffering that people endured. . . . Stories of families that had literally no cash and had to kind of beg to get the most minimal forms of food, who lived in tiny, little rooms that were ill-heated and ill-ventilated, who were sick all the time, who had meager clothing . . .")

Paul views his opposition to the status quo practically. He'd prefer no federal income tax, but barring that, he'd love the government to cut spending enough to bring the income tax rate down to 2 percent. He envisions a transition period for eradicating the Federal Reserve and for Social Security, to ensure that no one is cheated of the money they put in.

He figures party leaders get irritated with him sometimes, but for the most part, they leave him alone. On his opposition to war in Iraq, he told a radio interviewer a few years ago, "I'm generally very much ignored." He says he doesn't trade votes and as a result is rarely pressured.

Still, he says, if his fellow Republicans are "very desperate," he may allow himself to be talked into changing a "no" vote to "present."

Social Security Battle Reignites (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, July 9, 2006

The seemingly dead issue of Social Security reform came to life again in recent weeks, with President Bush saying it should be high on the agenda and Democrats warning that Republicans are resurrecting their plan to privatize the system.

Mr. Bush, in a June 27 speech extolling the line-item veto, vowed to keep fighting to fix the impending financial crises in both Social Security and Medicare.

"If we can't get it done this year, I'm going to try next year. And if we can't get it done next year, I'm going to try the year after that because it is the right thing to do," Mr. Bush said in a speech in Washington hosted by the Manhattan Institute think tank. "Now is the time to solve the problems of Medicare and Social Security and I want your help."

Democrats immediately went on the attack, saying the president intends to bring back his plan to divert a portion of the Social Security payroll tax into personal accounts for individual taxpayers -- a plan that failed to gain traction last year.

"For President Bush to call for his allies in Congress to dismantle Social Security with the same old reckless and hugely unpopular privatization plan signals just how hopelessly out of touch he really is. Privatization was a terrible, irresponsible idea in 2005; it's every bit as bad today," said Brad Woodhouse, spokesman for Americans United (AU), a group that fought the president's Social Security plan last year and is gearing up for a rematch this election year.

AU plans an effort in 20 states to "hound members of Congress to sign anti-privatization pledges before the election," Mr. Woodhouse said.

Annual reports released in May by trustees of both programs said Social Security's trust fund will run out of money in 2040, and Medicare's trust fund will be depleted in 2018.

AU officials have met with top House and Senate Democratic leadership staff to let them know they will focus their attention on Social Security in the run-up to November's elections.

"They're completely on board and they are ready to hit it hard this summer and throughout the fall," Mr. Woodhouse said.

That's already happening.

DOJ_NMG_0039244

During a recent, unrelated event on prescription drug coverage, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi brought up Social Security twice, at one point criticizing the drug plan and adding, "This plan was brought to you by the same people who want to privatize Social Security."

AU and top Democrats also criticized statements made last month by Rep. Jim McCrery, Louisiana Republican and chairman of the House Ways and Means Social Security subcommittee. Mr. McCrery told members of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce that Social Security reform should be high on the agenda next year.

Mrs. Pelosi was among the Democrats who fired off angry statements warning that Republicans plan to "dismantle" Social Security and telling voters it was another reason to elect Democrats in the fall.

"This is simply not a priority of the American people, yet Republicans continue their relentless quest to privatize Social Security," she said. "Americans want to go in a new direction. Democrats are working to strengthen Social Security and address the real concerns of everyday Americans."

Mr. McCrery said his words were distorted for political gain.

"What I said was Congress should make it a high priority," he said.

After failing to gain traction on the personal accounts idea last year, he explained, "we have to go back to square one and we all should work together to get something we can all embrace." That solution, he said, "may not have personal accounts ... but it may."

Rep. Jack Kingston, Georgia Republican, said House Republicans probably won't try for another personal accounts bill next year, but could opt for a "lockbox" proposal that would seal away the Social Security surplus so it can't be used to pay for general government expenses, as is currently the case.

And Michael Franc, vice president for government relations at the Heritage Foundation, predicted Social Security reform probably will return to the legislative scene only as part of a broader effort to save all major entitlement programs from financial ruin.

"The lesson [lawmakers] took away from Social Security is if you try to deal with this coming fiscal catastrophe one program at a time, you're never going to get there," Mr. Franc said. Instead, he said, Republicans probably will try to create a "synergy to act broadly."

Democrats anticipate that as well. After Senate Republicans recently introduced a broad budget reform bill that included changes to entitlement programs, Sen. Max Baucus of Montana, top Democrat on the Finance Committee, called it a "backdoor" attempt by Republicans to get their Social Security plan approved.

Mr. Bush, however, continues to call for a bipartisan approach.

"Oh, I know this town is full of all kinds of politics, but we ought to set politics aside," the president said at the end of his June 27 speech. "We need to set politics aside when it comes to reforming Social Security and Medicare, and we need to set politics aside so that the president can work with the Congress to bring fiscal discipline to our budgets."

Democrats Rip GOP On Social Security Plan (AP)

By Mike Wilson

AP, July 9, 2006

The Republican plan to privatize Social Security could cause huge debt for decades, a Democratic candidate seeking a House seat in Iowa, a state with a high concentration of elderly residents, said Saturday.

"If the Republican plan is allowed to pass, future generations both here and across the country will be saddled with decades of debt and no guaranteed retirement security," Bruce Braley said in the Democrats' weekly radio address.

Braley, 48, a lawyer from Waterloo, faces Republican Mike Whalen in the contest to fill the seat being vacated by Republican Rep. Jim Nussle, who is running for governor. The race is considered one of the more competitive in the country.

Braley said Social Security is under attack, with President Bush and congressional Republicans making privatization a top priority in 2007. He also accused the Bush administration of "plundering the Social Security trust fund while giving billions away to special interests, like big oil."

"They are spending the money seniors rely on while making no effort to balance the budget or protect the limited funds we have for retirement security," he said.

According to the 2000 census, Iowa ranks fourth in the nation in percentage of population 65 and older, at 14.9 percent, behind Florida, Pennsylvania and West Virginia.

Bush had called for a complete overhaul of Social Security, including creation of personal savings accounts and a reduction in future benefits promised to younger workers. But legislation failed to make it to the floor of either the House or Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0039245

Braley said the Bush administration and the Republican-led Congress have failed to reform Medicare and the nation's energy policy and should not be trusted with Social Security.

"This is the same team that set out to reform Medicare but instead let lobbyists create a confusing, expensive program that was little more than a payoff to the big pharmaceutical and insurance companies," Braley said of the Medicare prescription drug plan.

Braley said it's time for a change in Washington with a Democratic-led Congress.

"Because after six years of misplaced priorities, George Bush and his rubber-stamp Republican Congress cannot be trusted to protect something as vital as Social Security," he said.

Plumbing Iowa For Democratic Caucus Votes? Bring Money (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

To most people, all the national Democrats beating a path to Iowa this month look an awful lot like presidential candidates. But to the state Democratic Party, they look like something else: revenue enhancers.

Showing its entrepreneurial spirit, the state party is offering potential candidates access to its detailed voter database -- for a price. Specifically, they can mine the valuable data for $50,000 (act now, urges the party, and get a discount from the usual fee of $75,000). The details were reported by the political newsletter the Hotline and the Des Moines Register.

For an additional $50,000 next year, candidates can secure access to a database buttressed by information derived from the 2006 primary and general elections. Or campaigns can ignore the current offer and purchase the full database next year for $85,000.

Candidates have until Saturday to decide whether to take advantage of the discount.

Eighteen months before the often-pivotal Iowa caucuses, potential candidates are already swarming the Hawkeye State.

This weekend, Sen. Evan Bayh (Ind.) was to honor a state representative at a coffee shop in Muscatine, while former senator John Edwards (N.C.), the 2004 vice presidential nominee, planned to attend a barbecue for party faithful in Indianola, among other events.

Edwards and Bayh have made the biggest splashes in Iowa since the 2004 election. But they are being joined in Iowa this month by the 2004 presidential nominee, Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.), and former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner.

Also active in Iowa is Tom Vilsack, who will retire from the governorship at the end of his term as he ponders a 2008 bid. He and Bayh are the only two potential candidates to have political staff workers already on the ground, according to the Register.

A poll last month by the Register showed Edwards leading other potential Democratic contenders, with 30 percent of the vote of people likely to participate in the caucuses. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), who has not made a priority of visiting Iowa, came in second, followed by Kerry and Vilsack.

Two years ago, Kerry won the Iowa caucuses.Clearer Path for Sen. Cantwell

Faced with the prospect of a primary fight over her support for the war in Iraq, Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) is working behind the scenes to assure antiwar activists that she is no Joe Lieberman.

Michael Meehan, Cantwell's chief of staff, was in Seattle last week to huddle with Dal LaMagna and Mark Wilson, vocal opponents of the Iraq war who have floated the idea of running themselves, giving her an intraparty battle of the sort Sen. Lieberman (D) is facing from antiwar candidate Ned Lamont in Connecticut. Cantwell, who voted for the 2002 resolution authorizing the use of force in Iraq, has also held more than a dozen meetings with antiwar constituents.

That legwork appears to be paying off.

LaMagna announced Thursday that he would not run and instead would serve as a co-chairman of Cantwell's campaign. Cantwell sources were optimistic that Wilson would follow LaMagna's lead. But one Iraq war critic, Seattle attorney Hong Tran, is a declared candidate in the Democratic primary.

Cantwell was recently endorsed by the King County Democratic Party, which takes in the city of Seattle and has a reputation as the state's most liberal enclave.

Meehan said, "Cantwell is not in the same boat as Lieberman," noting she supported a recent amendment by Sens. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) and Jack Reed (D-R.I.) calling on President Bush to set a timeline for troop withdrawal.

Lieberman, who until recently had been assumed to have an easy reelection, voted against the amendment, which the Senate defeated, and has been vigorous in his support of the war, if not always the Bush administration's handling of it.

Cantwell won her seat in 2000 by 2,229 votes, upsetting Sen. Slade Gorton (R). She is likely to face former Safeco Insurance Co. CEO Mike McGavick (R) in the fall.Running Interference for Osborne

DOJ_NMG_0039246

A coach is supposed to cheer his team after a big loss. But in this case, it's the team that's cheering on the coach.

Rep. Tom Osborne (R-Neb.), who gained fame as head coach of the state university's triumphant Cornhuskers football team, was coasting toward the GOP's gubernatorial nomination. But when President Bush snapped up Gov. Mike Johanns for a Cabinet position and Lt. Gov. Dave Heineman became governor and declared he would run to keep his job, the primary turned into a hard fight.

In May, Osborne lost that fight.

Undeterred, Osborne supporters Johnny Rodgers, 1972 winner of the Heisman Trophy and one of the best players in Cornhusker history, and football trainer Doak Ostergard hoped to launch a campaign to write in Osborne's name this November.

But Nebraska law prohibits a candidate defeated in a primary election from being a write-in candidate in a general election. Rodgers and Ostergard sued last week to overturn the law.

"Tom really believes he can do some good things for Nebraska, and we do, too," said Rodgers, who played under Osborne when he was the team's offensive coordinator. "It's a grass-roots effort."

Osborne said in a statement: "As nice as it is of my former players and associates to be concerned about my future, none of their efforts have involved consultation with me."

Sen. Bayh Seeks Edge In Democratic Field (AP)

By Mike Glover

AP, July 9, 2006

In a quiet, methodical style reflecting his Midwestern roots, Sen. Evan Bayh is laying the foundation for a presidential campaign and prompting some Democrats to talk about a candidate with a realistic shot.

"The chatter that you hear is that he's a good guy and nice and he has that honest, Midwestern feel to him, kind of like Harry Truman," said veteran Democratic strategist Dane Strother. "That's all appealing."

In his fifth trip to Iowa in the last year, the centrist Indiana Democrat opened a three-day swing Thursday with a fundraiser in downtown Des Moines for legislative candidates. He mingled easily with about 50 party activists for more than an hour and made a point of chatting with everyone in the room.

"He's a Midwesterner and that will help him in Iowa," said state Senate Democratic leader Michael Gronstal. "It's up to him to sell himself, and so far he's been fairly impressive."

As he makes his way around the state, which launches the primary process with caucuses, Bayh sets aside ample time for private meetings with top Democrats, introductory sessions in which he often trades stories about campaigning for his father, former Sen. Birch Bayh.

The elder Bayh served from 1963-81 and spent time in Iowa in his unsuccessful bid for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1976. The son finds that the campaign war stories are an effective way of building ties, particularly with older Democrats who remember his dad.

While New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton looms as the front-runner for 2008, other Democrats are fighting to distinguish themselves from the pack. Bayh has the distinction of having won statewide election five times in one of the most Republican states in the nation, serving as secretary of state, governor and senator.

"I don't think you can get elected five times in a state that hasn't gone Democratic since 1964 without learning how to campaign," said Anita Dunn, a Democratic media consultant who has signed on with Bayh.

Bayh has assembled a solid team of advisers operating under the auspices of his political action committee, the All America PAC. He's tapped a former Democratic National Committee fundraiser, a onetime pollster for Howard Dean's presidential campaign and a chief of staff to the late Missouri Gov. Mel Carnahan.

Dunn was a top adviser to former New Jersey Sen. Bill Bradley during his 2000 bid for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Bayh has $9.8 million in his campaign account, according to March filings. His All America PAC had $967,453 cash on hand.

Bayh, 50, casts himself as a centrist who can win over independents and moderate Republicans, and his political resume is his base appeal.

"I have a proven track record of doing something this president said he would do and never did, and that's being more of a uniter than a divider, reaching out to independents, reasonable Republicans as well as all of our Democrats," Bayh said.

There's plenty of competition for the backing of moderate Democrats. Bayh is seeking to separate himself from rivals like former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner by focusing on his national security resume, which includes membership on the Senate Armed Services and Intelligence committees.

DOJ_NMG_0039247

"One thing we need to do is prove to this country that we can be tough and smart," said Bayh. "We need to take Karl Rove and this administration on this issue. We know they are going to attack us on this."

"Warner does have a paucity of foreign policy experience," said Democratic consultant Steve Murphy, who said the jury is still out on the competition. "We have elected a one-term governor in the recent past. It all depends on Warner's performance in the campaign."

Warner spokeswoman Ellen Qualls dismissed the notion of a competition.

"If Governor Warner decides to throw his hat in the ring, I don't think he's going to be fighting for a label. He's going to be asking folks to look at his record," said Qualls.

Bayh's close attention to retail politics has earned him high marks as Iowa Democrats head into a competitive election with an open governor's race, toss-up House races and a legislature that's virtually tied. Bayh planned to attend eight events raising money for local candidates.

"He is making inroads here," said former Iowa Democratic Chairman Gordon Fischer. "He is doing what it takes to be successful in the Iowa caucuses, and that is a lot of retail politics."

Tom Courtney, a state senator from Burlington, Iowa, was getting some help from Bayh.

"When I'm around town, I'm starting to hear Bayh's name mentioned," Courtney said. "Democrats are looking for somebody who is new and fresh."

Though Bayh is making an impression in some early states, he remains little known around the country.

"Honestly, there's only one person on anybody's radar screen and that's Senator Clinton," said Democratic strategist Chris Lehane, who is not working for any candidate. "None of these other folks have begun to register in a meaningful way."

Democrats' Fundraising Letter Is Bankrupt On Ideas (LAT)

By Steve Lopez, Points West

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

It's not often that I reach into my mailbox at home and find a letter from Ted Kennedy, so I was eager to see what was on the mind of the saber-rattling senator from the great state of Massachusetts.

The letter began "Dear Friend," which is a little impersonal, if you ask me. When my friends at the Republican National Committee wrote to ask me to sign President Bush's birthday card — and send along a few bucks — they began their letter, "Dear Steve."

Kennedy, you'll be shocked to know, was also hitting me up for money, in this case for the Democratic Senate Campaign Committee.

"Yes, Senator Kennedy," said the contribution form I was supposed to check off and return, "I share your concern over the arrogance and incompetence of the Bush Administration."

In anticipation of my generosity, Kennedy enclosed a complimentary bumper sticker:

HAD ENOUGH?

Vote Democrat in '06

As a matter of fact, I do share Kennedy's concern about the Bush administration, and so I was eager to read the four-page letter and other enclosed materials to find out more about the alternative vision being offered up by the Democratic Party.

Page 1, however, contained no such clues. It just fired more bazooka shots at the president and his "extreme right-wing allies," so I figured the fresh ideas from the Dems had to be on Page 2.

Wrong again. Page 2 was nothing but groveling for money for contested races in Missouri, Montana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Maryland and Minnesota. ("It's urgent for each of us to do as much as possible as soon as possible!")

Page 3 suggested the Republicans will burn in hell for sins against humanity ("They've poisoned our air and water"), and Page 4 warned, "They'll never stop unless we stop them. They're shameless!"

That's quite a cavalry call, but it seems to me the Democrats are once again rushing to the front lines with empty muskets.

I'm not asking for the Democratic equivalent of a 10-point Contract With America, having lowered my expectations while on the campaign trail with Al Gore and bearing witness to his nationally televised identity crisis.

I'd settle for a five-point "Contract With Western Blue States." Heck, I'd be happy with a warmed-over crumb of an idea or two.

Instead all we get from the Democrats is the reminder that they stand for … wait, let's see, where was that platform draft?

DOJ_NMG_0039248

Oh, yeah. They're anti-Iraq war, or at least they are now that it's turned out so miserably.

And they're passionately … hold on a second. What else was there?

Anti-Republican. That's it.

Write a check today because "They're shameless!"

Craig Smith, a former speechwriter for Gerald Ford and the first President Bush, said the Kennedy letter is a direct response to polls that show declining support for the war in Iraq and for the president.

But he finds it astounding that the Democratic Party still can't move beyond its attack strategy and figure out how to define and sell itself with a specific, alternative agenda.

Smith, who teaches campaign persuasion at Cal State Long Beach, has a simple piece of advice for his political rivals:

Go back to your roots.

"They have not been the loyal opposition," said Smith, who believes Democrats sold their souls under the influence of the Democratic Leadership Council, which pushed the party toward the center after Walter Mondale was blown out by Ronald Reagan.

There's an intellectual distinction to be made in the essence of what it means to be a Republican or a Democrat, Smith said, and Democrats ought to embrace the difference.

"For me, it always goes back to this: If you put a gun to a Republican's head and say, 'Choose between individuality or equality,' they'll pick individual freedom. A good liberal will pick equality over individual freedom."

Democrats, he said, need to get back to the social agenda. They ought to put healthcare reform back at the top of their to-do list, and not cut and run the way Bill Clinton did.

They ought to be screaming about wages that keep millions in abject poverty, and they ought to put up or shut up on education, doing something more than attacking Bush's "no child left behind" program.

It's a sad day in America when a Republican can deliver a more coherent agenda in a single paragraph than Ted Kennedy can in a four-page screed.

I guess what I'm trying to say here is that instead of writing a check to Mr. Kennedy, I tossed his letter — along with the bumper sticker — into the can.

My decision was endorsed by Ken Khachigian, the GOP consultant who worked with Reagan. He recalled Kennedy's speech at the 1980 Democratic National Convention, referring to it as the speech "left-wingers" love to quote:

"The work goes on, the cause endures, the hope still lives and the dream shall never die."

"So," Khachigian said, "regarding this letter, these are my questions for Ted: What work goes on; which cause endures; where does hope live; and, by the way, what IS the dream?"

The Liberal Inquisition (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

Sometimes history comes with previews. In the 1930's, the Spanish Civil War served as a precursor to the global conflict that was World War II. And in a smaller fashion, the primary battle playing out on the smiling lawns of upscale Connecticut serves as a preview for the national conflict that will dominate American politics for the next two years.

This isn't a fight between left and right. It's a fight about how politics should be conducted. On the one hand are the true believers — the fundamentalists of both parties who believe that politics should be about party discipline, passion, purity, orthodoxy and clear choices. On the other side are the quasi-independents — the heterodox politicians who distrust ideological purity, who rebel against movement groupthink, who believe in bipartisanship both as a matter of principle and as a practical necessity.

In 2008, heterodox politicians like John McCain, Rudy Giuliani and even Hillary Clinton are going to have to face zealous assaults from within their own parties. But for the moment that war has come to Joe Lieberman.

What's happening to Lieberman can only be described as a liberal inquisition. Whether you agree with him or not, he is transparently the most kind-hearted and well-intentioned of men. But over the past few years he has been subjected to a vituperation campaign that only experts in moral manias and mob psychology are really fit to explain. I can't reproduce the typical assaults that have been directed at him over the Internet, because they are so laced with profanity and ugliness, but they are ginned up by ideological masseurs who salve their followers' psychic wounds by arousing their rage at objects of mutual hate.

Next has come the effort to expel Lieberman from modern liberalism. In a dark parody of the old struggle between Eugene McCarthy and Hubert Humphrey, the highly educated, highly affluent, highly Caucasian wing of the Democratic Party has turned liberalism from a philosophy into a secular religion, and then sought to purge a battle-scarred warhorse on the grounds of insufficient moral purity.

So these days, for example, one hears that Lieberman is a crypto-conservative, a Bible-Belter. In reality, of course, this is a man who has been endorsed by Planned Parenthood and the Human Rights Campaign. He has a Christian Coalition rating of 0.

But a lifetime's record is deemed not to matter any longer. For in the midst of the inquisition all of American liberalism has been reduced to one issue, the war. Just as some edges of the pro-life movement reduce all of conservatism to abortion, the upscale revivalists on the left reduce everything to Iraq, and all who are deemed impure must be cleansed away.

Lieberman's opponent, Ned Lamont, has neither expertise in foreign affairs nor any specific knowledge of Iraq, and he has struggled to come up with a plan for what we should now do there. But that is not the point, for the opposition to Lieberman is not about future actions or even politics as it is normally understood. It is about impurity, the scarlet letter, and the need to expunge those who have transgressed.

Liberal interest groups that seek practical goals, like the A.F.L.-C.I.O. and the League of Conservation Voters, back Lieberman. But the netroots now seek to purge what's left of the Scoop Jackson Democrats, and to eliminate those who have had contact with the evildoers in the other party, because movements are deemed to prosper to the extent they achieve holiness unmarred.

Ned Lamont is a strange vessel for all this passion. Based on the candidate debate Thursday night, he seems a genial if under-prepared politician who would be an innocuous presence in the Senate if he were elected to it.

The big story out of the campaign last week was the aggressiveness Lieberman has finally brought to his side of the fight. Over the past few years, polarizers have dominated Congress because people who actually represent most Americans have been too timid or intellectually vacuous to stand up. Even today many Democrats who privately despise the netroots lie low, hoping the anger won't be directed at them.

But Lieberman has had no choice but to fight, and he will probably prevail. If he doesn't, and if his opponents go from statewide victory in Connecticut to a national primary assault in 2008, then I hope the Republicans will be smart enough to scoop up what is sure to come — yet another wave of disaffected Democrats looking for a political home.

Corzine Ends Shutdown And Approves New Budget (NYT)

By Richard G. Jones And David W. Chen

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

TRENTON, July 8 — Gov. Jon S. Corzine signed a budget for New Jersey Saturday evening, after a seven-day government shutdown and an acidic standoff with the Legislature that paralyzed state operations, frayed nerves and cost the state millions of dollars.

Mr. Corzine, in a crowded public ceremony, approved the $30.9 billion budget but also cut $51 million in proposed new spending, much of it inserted by legislators before they approved the budget.

"This crisis should never have occurred and it must never be repeated," Mr. Corzine said. While many had cast the weeklong standoff as a political turf battle, he said, "this crisis was about something much more basic: change."

On Saturday morning, Mr. Corzine signed an executive order ending the first-ever shutdown of state government in New Jersey and allowing nearly 100,000 workers — including about 45,000 state employees — to return to their jobs.

Although government offices like the Motor Vehicle Commission were not expected to reopen until Monday, the 12 Atlantic City casinos, the most high-profile casualties of the shutdown, reopened Saturday morning, and lottery tickets were on sale soon after.

As he signed the budget at 7:00 Saturday evening, Mr. Corzine drew a red pen through 53 items on the Legislature's appropriations list. Mr. Corzine is the first governor to use his line-item-veto authority, a power not enjoyed by most governors or the president of the United States, since Gov. Donald T. DiFrancesco cut $153 million in spending in 2001. Gov. Christie Whitman vetoed legislators' projects in every one of her budgets, but usually in small amounts.

State parks and beaches will begin the process of reopening on Sunday. The state's courts, which had been ordered to handle only emergency matters, were expected to resume operations on Monday morning.

"The lives of the people of New Jersey can now, at long last, begin to return to normal," a bleary-eyed Mr. Corzine said shortly after 6 a.m. Saturday. Mr. Corzine added that he was working on three hours' sleep.

The shutdown was a result of an impasse between Mr. Corzine and the Legislature over the budget for the fiscal year that began on July 1. Although the impact of the shutdown was blunted by the July 4 holiday, the crisis peaked on Wednesday when the casinos were closed for the first time in the 28 years that gambling has been legal in Atlantic City, sending a work force of 50,000 home without pay. The state lost $1.2 million a day in tax revenue from the casinos, and $2 million a day in revenue from the lottery, officials said.

On Thursday, the impasse ended when Mr. Corzine reached an agreement with the speaker of the General Assembly, Joseph J. Roberts Jr., on a proposal to raise the sales tax to 7 percent from 6 percent.

Under a compromise, Mr. Corzine agreed to use half of the revenue from the increase, or about $550 million, to help offset the state's property tax rates, which are among the highest in the nation.

Mr. Corzine also agreed to allow Mr. Roberts to put forth a ballot question for an amendment to the state's Constitution guaranteeing that the money would be used to offset property tax rates. The governor and the Legislature agreed on additional budget cuts to make up for the money going to property tax relief.

The budget was passed after an all-night debate by the Legislature. The votes ran largely along party lines. But one Republican senator, William L. Gormley of Atlantic County, whose constituents were most directly affected by the casino shutdown, joined the Democratic majority in supporting the bill. The budget passed the Senate by a vote of 23 to 17. In the Assembly, where opposition to Mr. Corzine's tax plan had been the stiffest, the vote was 44 to 35. Six Democrats voted against the budget, but Mr. Corzine picked up the support of one Republican, Francis J. Blee, also of Atlantic County.

The Assembly's final vote came around 5:30 Saturday morning, came about an hour after the Senate's vote. The voting ended what political veterans said was the state's most contentious budget season. The dispute centered on Mr. Corzine's plan to use the sales tax increase to help close a $4.5 billion deficit.

Besides the intensity of the opposition to the sales tax increase, the budget debate was particularly noteworthy because all of the major players are Democrats.

Democrats, who control both houses of the Legislature, have said that they fear the potential political consequences of the tax increase.

When A Government Just Can't Go On (NYT)

By Henry Fountain

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

Budget disputes like the one that was resolved in New Jersey last week are not uncommon in state governments. California lawmakers, for instance, are chronically late in passing their budgets.

"In a bad fiscal year you'll have maybe a dozen" late budgets across the country, said Arturo Perez, a fiscal analyst for the National Conference of State Legislatures.

But the seven-day government shutdown that resulted from the New Jersey impasse was unusual. There have only been two other shutdowns, in Minnesota and Tennessee, since 1991.

Why?

Most states have laws or constitutional clauses that allow government to continue operating, even if no money has been appropriated. "States have the ability to keep things going through the use of continuing resolutions," which finance government at the levels of previous budgets, Mr. Perez said. "The average person on the street sees no difference in the operation of the state."

New Jersey, however, has no law or language that addresses what to do if a budget is late. So when state lawmakers couldn't agree last week on Gov. Jon S. Corzine's plan to raise sales taxes, parks, public beaches and many agencies were closed, as were casinos, because gambling inspectors were among the 45,000 state workers who were furloughed without pay.

But no shutdown can be complete. In many states, the budget is considered in multiple bills, so if some are approved before the deadline, those parts of the government can keep operating. And even if a state has a single budget bill, it can't shut some services.

"There are things the state must continue to do," Mr. Perez said. "It cannot simply close down the prisons and let the prisoners out."

Stem Cells Back In Political Spotlight (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

Issue Is Key in Wisconsin's Gubernatorial Election

MADISON, Wis. -- From the back patio of his official residence here, Democratic Gov. Jim Doyle can look across Lake Mendota to the campus of the University of Wisconsin and see a forest of construction cranes at the medical research complex and the new Institute of Discovery. Doyle calls the facilities "the epicenter of the world's work on embryonic stem cells."

DOJ_NMG_0039251

Those cells may offer hope for curing crippling diseases, but at the moment, they are also at the center of an impassioned political debate, one that will occupy the Senate this summer and may provoke President Bush's first veto. It is an issue that may swing the outcome of Doyle's reelection race and a U.S. Senate contest in Missouri, where a stem cell research referendum is on the ballot.

University of Wisconsin scientists were the first to isolate embryonic stem cells, and the state, the alumni association and private firms have invested millions in building facilities and attracting scientists to work here. Doyle said in an interview that stem-cell-based bioscience will become, in time, "a $100 billion enterprise" and that his goal is to capture 10 percent of the bounty for his state.

But Doyle faces a difficult campaign, after four contentious years in office, against U.S. Rep. Mark Green, a personable Republican who points to polls suggesting that a majority of Wisconsin residents "think this great state is sliding, that its best days are behind us," even though its economy looks healthier than that of neighboring Michigan.

Green, a protege of Tommy G. Thompson, the popular former Republican governor and U.S. secretary of health and human services, is trying to present himself as a Thompson-style pragmatist who will reenergize the state.

But where Thompson, like Doyle, is an outspoken advocate of embryonic stem cell research, Green has voted to ban work on cells donated by fertility clinics or created from embryos in medical labs. The fourth-term House member supports Bush's policy of limiting work to the relatively few cell lines created before a 2001 executive order setting forth terms for government-funded research.

"I was in the Congress that doubled funding for the National Institutes of Health, the funding that actually helped create the national stem cell bank in Madison," Green said in an interview. "I'm excited about stem cell research. But I don't believe we have to leave our moral compass behind in pursuing the promise of stem cell research."

But Doyle has called Green "a relentless opponent of stem cell research," pointing to eight votes in which he says Green "tried to ban or even criminalize proven methods of stem cell research."

A similar debate is taking place in Missouri, where supporters of stem cell research have placed on the ballot an initiative protecting all forms of the research permitted by federal law. Republican Sen. James M. Talent has come out against it, while state Auditor Claire McCaskill, his Democratic challenger, favors it. The two are in a very close race, and early polls show majority support for the initiative.

In Wisconsin, the Republican-controlled legislature has placed on the ballot two initiatives designed to pull out conservative voters -- one reinforcing the ban on same-sex marriage and extending it to civil unions, the other an advisory referendum to reinstate the death penalty.

Doyle opposes both, and is hoping that the stem cell issue will motivate his supporters. The issues that Green says he will emphasize in his campaign are taxes and jobs, plus some issues of gambling and corruption new to Wisconsin. Doyle was the beneficiary of an independent expenditure campaign in his last race by some Indian tribes with casinos, and he signed contracts giving the tribes expanded gaming licenses in perpetuity -- authority that the state supreme court later overruled.

As for scandal, four legislative leaders of both parties have been convicted of various crimes, and last month a mid-level career employee was found guilty of handing a contract to a Doyle donor.

Last week, the battle heated up as an independent committee supporting Doyle ran a radio ad accusing Green of voting for benefits for Big Oil. An independent group backing Green replied with a TV ad linking Doyle to the convicted procurement officer.

In an interview, Doyle noted that testimony at the officer's trial showed he had never met her or talked with her about the contract.

Nonetheless, Democrats acknowledge that Doyle will face a tough race. Four years ago, when he was attorney general, he edged out Republican Scott McCallum, who had inherited the job from Thompson. Doyle had only 45 percent of the vote in a three-way race in which Thompson's brother, Ed Thompson, captured 10 percent as a third-party candidate.

"He hasn't been able to get over 45 percent in any poll since then," Green said.

Other Wisconsin Democrats privately attribute Doyle's political problems to his personal style. A moderate who has presented himself as pro-business, he has not developed fervent support among teachers, minorities or liberals, the backbone of the state's Democratic Party.

"He has to worry about the turnout in any of those core groups," said one Democratic insider.

Green, on the other hand, faces some challenges of his own. In the election of 1998, he was the only GOP challenger in the country to defeat a Democratic incumbent, but he has had a low profile on Capitol Hill and is little known outside his own Green Bay-Appleton area in the Fox River Valley of east-central Wisconsin.

DOJ_NMG_0039252

Green has an unusual personal history. His physician father and nurse-midwife mother emigrated from South Africa. After college and law school, Green and his bride spent a year teaching in Kenya. "That was the formative year of my life," he said, and set him on the path of politics and public service.

The stakes in the race are big -- and go beyond stem cells. Republicans already control the legislature and have forced Doyle to veto measures on taxes and social policy, which are likely to become law if Green were to win.

But one Democrat who otherwise paints a gloomy picture of Doyle's prospects remarked: "If he can make this a case of the Republicans being know-nothings who are opposed to science and progress, it might really hurt Green with suburban independents. Green doesn't fit the stereotype, but people don't know much about him yet."

Governor's Race Follows 2 Orbits (WP)

Contest Highlights Baltimore Region's Political Pull Over Washington Suburbs

Maryland voters who happen to live in the Baltimore region have already been treated to $850,000 worth of television ads in the governor's race, candidates appearing regularly on the nightly news and a literal parade of politicians through their streets on the Fourth of July.

The view from suburban Washington is quite different.

Most voters in Montgomery, Prince George's and other Maryland counties in the region have yet to see a single one of those ads. TV news coverage of the race has been spotty. And the sole representative of a gubernatorial ticket at the region's Independence Day celebrations was the Democratic lieutenant governor candidate, Prince George's Del. Anthony G. Brown.

Even as the population and legislative clout of the Washington region have grown, Maryland still tilts toward Baltimore when it comes to statewide elections, recent developments suggest.

The result is two versions of Maryland politics for voters living in the state's two dominant media markets. Nowhere is this more evident this election year than in the early stages of the governor's race.

"I feel cheated," said Sandy Rovner, a Democratic activist who lives in a Montgomery retirement community. "We read about the campaign, but we don't really feel part of it."

The candidates are not ignoring the state's Washington suburbs. For months, they have been building grass-roots operations, recruiting volunteers and making personal appearances.

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D), for instance, staged a well-attended event in Rockville last week at which he won dozens of endorsements from former supporters of Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D), who dropped out of the race last month to battle depression. And after Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) announced his running mate choice in Annapolis, he and Kristen Cox put in appearances in Montgomery.

But no one denies that Baltimore is getting more attention -- and that there are consequences.

"The reality is, voters in Baltimore have a huge advantage over voters in the Washington market," said Anita Dunn, a Democratic consultant who worked for Duncan. "If you're in the Washington suburbs, you're going to have far less information about the candidates and their records."

Even the Fourth of July schedules for Ehrlich and O'Malley were telling. Both marched in a half-dozen parades, all in the Baltimore region.

Their itineraries reflect the battleground that suburban Baltimore is expected to be in November's general election. In 2002, Ehrlich was able to claim victory in a largely Democratic state by running up large margins in Baltimore County and other jurisdictions in the region where Democratic voters are more willing to vote Republican.

O'Malley advisers say his key to victory in the fall will be undercutting that advantage while holding on to the Democratic base in counties such as Montgomery and Prince George's -- more than 30 percent of Maryland's registered voters live in those jurisdictions.

Evidence of the stakes in the Baltimore region was hard to miss at a parade Tuesday morning in Dundalk, where Ehrlich and O'Malley appeared only minutes apart. As the candidates rounded a corner in a leafy residential area, neighbors sat side by side in lawn chairs with dueling navy blue and neon green campaign signs.

Had Duncan still been in the race, his day would have been dominated by Baltimore area parades as well, former aides said.

In a Washington Post poll last month, 46 percent of Maryland's registered voters said they get their local TV news from Baltimore stations; 37 percent said they get it from Washington stations. The remainder cited another city or said they did not know.

DOJ_NMG_0039253

Advertising rates for network affiliates in Washington are two to three times as expensive as in Baltimore, campaign media consultants said. Moreover, ads on Baltimore stations are seen almost exclusively by Maryland residents. Candidates who buy time on network affiliates in Washington wind up wasting money on viewers who live in the District and Virginia. Thus far, only one Maryland candidate, Democratic Senate hopeful Josh Rales, has taken to the Washington airwaves on network affiliates.

Ehrlich and O'Malley aides say they will advertise on Washington television well in advance of the November election, as gubernatorial candidates have in the past.

"The campaign in the Washington region will probably begin at the time it would normally be expected to," said Ehrlich campaign manager Bo Harmon. Because the Baltimore region is considered such a battleground and ads there are less expensive, he said, "Baltimore is getting started earlier."

In an interview Friday on Washington Post Radio, Ehrlich -- who has spent more than $300,000 on Baltimore TV in recent weeks portraying himself as someone who governs from the center -- acknowledged the importance of the Washington region.

Branding himself "a realist," Ehrlich said he is unlikely to outpoll O'Malley in Montgomery and Prince George's, but he said he would appeal to voters there based on his record.

In an interview, O'Malley, who has spent more than $200,000 on Baltimore TV portraying himself as a consumer advocate, said he is offering the same message of "working family" empowerment across the state. Most of his campaign appearances have been outside his home region, he said.

Some allies were more blunt when assessing the importance of the mayor's performance in the Baltimore suburbs.

"There's enough swing vote in Baltimore County and the other Baltimore suburbs to warrant a concerted, nonstop presence in those areas," said Derek Walker, executive director of the Maryland Democratic Party. He suggested that Democrats will likely rely more heavily on grass-roots campaigns to spread their message in the Washington suburbs.

In the meantime, even catching a glimpse of the advertising campaign of the Green Party's nominee requires a trip to Baltimore. There, Ed Boyd's sole billboard can be found in Charles Village, proclaiming: "O'Malley Arrests Us. Ehrlich Abandons Us. Boyd is one of us."

An Uphill Opportunity For The GOP (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS -- Rep. Mark Kennedy, a 49-year-old former small-town accountant and businessman, is carrying the hopes of the national Republican Party in one of the few Senate races in the country in which the GOP has a chance of gaining a seat.

The voluntary retirement of Sen. Mark Dayton this year has opened the way for a newcomer, and Dayton's Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party has given its endorsement to Amy Klobuchar, the two-term elected attorney of Hennepin County (Minneapolis).

In one sense, Kennedy is on familiar ground. After beating the male Democratic incumbent in his first race in 2000, he faced female candidates in both his reelection bids. Despite their spending about $2 million each against him, he won with votes to spare while spending less.

Minnesota has become a two-party battleground, with Republicans holding the governorship and the other Senate seat. President Bush lost the state by less than 3 percent of the vote in each of his races.

But now, as Gov. Tim Pawlenty put it in an interview, "the president continues to struggle here," with approval scores below 40 percent. When I asked Kennedy in an interview if he agreed with the opening words of his profile in the current edition of Congressional Quarterly, the authoritative source on Congress, describing him as "a dedicated conservative and loyal Bush supporter," he seemed surprised.

"I don't know if I'd use any of those words to describe me," he said. And he offered an alternative. "I'd say I'm a common-sense Minnesota conservative informed by the values we care about from a Midwest perspective."

Kennedy said, "The attack on me is that I'm a lap dog of the president. It's saying that I don't think independently, that I don't have a set of core values that I was raised with and have been living by. To have an organization as reputable as CQ fall into that trap, I just don't know."

But in an interview here, Klobuchar said, "He supports the president's position 97 percent of the time." CQ did score Kennedy as voting in agreement with Bush's wishes on 98 percent of the roll calls in 2003 and 97 percent in 2004, before he dropped to 87 percent last year, as he began to prepare for the Senate race.

Kennedy points out that, even as a freshman in 2001, he opposed the president by voting against oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and against creation of the No Child Left Behind education program.

Klobuchar dismisses those as easy votes for any Minnesota politician responsive to local opinion. But Kennedy says he is genuinely bipartisan in approach and cites "at least 15" issues on which he has teamed with Democrats to work for passage, such as environmental protection and a program to make it easier for scientists to become teachers.

Kennedy's struggle to prove his independence is typical for Republicans running in competitive races from New Jersey to Washington state, as Bush's ratings have sunk. And this race is clearly a challenge for the GOP. Klobuchar's political base in this population center of the state has given her more media exposure in her six years than Kennedy has gained from his work on the Agriculture and Transportation and Infrastructure committees from his suburban-rural House seat in a similar period.

Klobuchar's record of criminal prosecutions and consumer advocacy was strong enough that she ran unopposed for reelection. The Klobuchar name is further enhanced by her father, a longtime favorite local sports columnist now retired but on the speaking circuit for his daughter.

Klobuchar faces nominal opposition in a September primary from an underfinanced advocate of an immediate pullout from Iraq. She says she opposed the war from the beginning but supports the view taken by most Senate Democrats that a pullout should begin this year but that no deadline should be set for completing it.

Kennedy says that he believes Iraq is "important to winning the war on terror, and my opponent wants to pull the troops out without regard to the commanders in the field and without achieving the milestones" marking the road to victory.

They have similarly sharp differences on taxes and health care. But the biggest question, as both of them see it, is who can capture the "change vote." Kennedy says, "Clearly, there is a frustration with what is going on in Washington. The spending and the partisanship is a big part of it. But I have a track record to talk about. I work in this institution the way Minnesotans would want."

Klobuchar says that won't wash. Her slogan is simple. "He's followed the Lone Star. I'll follow the North Star."

Interstate Ribbons Of Progress (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

On Tuesday, July 11, the United States will become more geographically stable than it has ever been. It will have been 17,126 days since the admission of Hawaii to statehood on Aug. 21, 1959. The longest previous span between expansions of the nation was the 17,125 days between the admission of Arizona on Feb. 14, 1912, and the admission of Alaska on Jan. 3, 1959. Since then the nation has become, in a sense, smaller through the annihilation of distance and, to some extent, of difference.

An important part of the groundwork -- literally, it covered a lot of ground -- for today's America was begun 50 years ago this summer. A conservative Republican president who grew up in a Kansas town where hitching posts for horses lined unpaved streets launched what was, and remains, the largest public works project in the nation's history -- the Interstate Highway System. Its ribbons of concrete represent a single thread of continuity through the nation's history.

With that program, Dwight Eisenhower, the 13th Republican president, helped heal the wounds of the war won by another general, U.S. Grant, the second Republican president. That war was related to "internal improvements," as infrastructure projects such as roads and canals used to be called.

In 1816 South Carolina's Rep. John Calhoun -- then a nationalist, later a disunionist -- introduced legislation for a federal program of internal improvements. The legislation passed, but President James Madison vetoed it because he thought Congress was not constitutionally empowered to do such things. So, prosperous Northern states built their own improvements while the South sank into inferiority and increasing dependence on slavery.

The military handicap of an inferior transportation system was one reason the South lost the Civil War. Another reason was the industrialization of the North. Its transportation system (the Erie Canal, railroads) cut the price of shipping a ton of wheat from Buffalo to New York City from $100 to $10, and the difference between the wholesale price of pork in Cincinnati and New York plunged from $9.53 to $1.18. Suddenly, workers flooding into the North's cities had more disposable income to spend on the North's manufactured goods.

The first Republican president began his public life as a 23-year-old candidate for the Illinois General Assembly by telling voters of Sangamon County his "sentiments with regard to local affairs," the first sentiment being "the public utility of internal improvements." The vigor of the Union also was a preoccupation of Teddy Roosevelt, the eighth Republican president, whose great internal improvement, the Panama Canal, was external, although he thought of Panama as America's private property. And

Eisenhower's message to Congress advocating the interstate system began, "Our unity as a nation is sustained by free communication of thought and by easy transportation of people and goods."

No legislator more ardently supported the IHS than the Tennessee Democrat who was chairman of the Senate Public Works subcommittee on roads. His state had benefited handsomely from the greatest federal public works project of the prewar period, the Tennessee Valley Authority, which, by bringing electrification to a large swath of the South, accelerated the closing of the regional development gap that had stubbornly persisted since the Civil War. This senator who did so much to put postwar America on roads suitable to bigger, more powerful cars was Al Gore Sr. His son may consider this marriage of concrete and the internal combustion engine sinful, but Tennessee's per capita income, which was just 70 percent of the national average in 1956, today is 90 percent.

The IHS -- combined, as Fortune magazine's Justin Fox writes, with another bright idea from 1956, the shipping container -- made America's distribution system more flexible. This benefited manufacturers, foreign and domestic, especially in America's hitherto lagging region, the South. This is one reason there is a thriving Southern-based automobile industry (BMW in South Carolina; Mercedes in Alabama; Honda in both Carolinas, Georgia and Alabama; Toyota in Tennessee, Alabama and Kentucky). Furthermore, the South is home to some of today's "big box" retailers -- Wal-Mart (Bentonville, Ark.), Home Depot (Atlanta) -- as well as FedEx (Memphis).

American scolds blame the IHS and the automobile for everything from obesity (fried food at every interchange) to desperate housewives (isolated in distant suburbs without sidewalks). Nikita Khrushchev, during his 1959 visit to America, told Eisenhower, "Your people do not seem to like the place where they live and always want to be on the move going someplace else." Eisenhower knew that wherever people are going on their nation's roads, they are going where they live.

When A Stranger Calls (NYT)

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

As consumer debt in America balloons to previously unimaginable levels, currently $2.2 trillion and growing, the dark underside of abusive debt collection is growing along with it. Legislators and regulators should take further steps to curb the lies, harassment and intimidation coming from out-of-control collectors. At the same time, they should also look at irresponsible lending: giving additional credit cards and high-interest loans to those already deep in the red.

Sewell Chan reported in The Times last week that the number of complaints lodged against third-party debt collectors has soared, rising faster than those for any other industry. From 1999 to 2005 the number of complaints received by the Federal Trade Commission increased by a factor of six. Complaints to New York City officials have more than doubled just since 2003. With last year's draconian new bankruptcy law pushing the last resort for the financially desperate farther out of reach, those numbers are only going to rise without stepped-up enforcement.

Third-party collectors are not the original lenders — the banks or credit-card companies that set the original terms with consumers. The collection agencies buy up debt for a fraction of its value and then try their hands at shaking loose payments. Most are law-abiding, and perform a legitimate service. Debts should be settled and someone has to track down deadbeats and absconders who make borrowing more expensive for the rest of us who pay our bills on time. But a growing number of financial bounty hunters can be extremely aggressive, not to mention indiscriminate.

According to the commission, some collectors call at all hours of the night, use obscene language, falsely threaten imprisonment or the seizure of property, and even humiliate their victims by contacting family members and employers. They sometimes seek a larger amount than the borrower actually owes — if indeed it was owed in the first place. Debt collectors have gone after people who have already paid their debts and even those who never had them to begin with. Sometimes that is a result of mistaken identity, but it is also increasingly due to identity theft.

Consumers should know that they are not powerless and that they do have rights. Collectors may not call late at night without permission. In most states family members or workplaces may be called only once, and then only to locate the borrower. It is up to the collection agency to furnish written proof that the debt is valid and it cannot bother a borrower in the meantime.

If harassment continues, consumers can call 1-877-FTC-HELP (1-877-382-4357) toll-free. Last year the commission won a judgment of $10.2 million against a company for use of illegal collection tactics. Once in a while the bullies are bullied back.

Unsightly Evidence Of U.S. Trade Gap Piles Up (LAT)

By Deborah Schoch, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

Wilmington Has Thousands of Cargo Containers, Some Stacked Seven High

DOJ_NMG_0039256

To understand the trade deficit, residents of Sandison Street do not need the help of world-class economists.

They can just glance across the street at the mountain of faded brown cargo containers blocking the Wilmington sky.

The equation is simple. As the deficit grows, the mountain gets higher.

"It's getting taller; it's spreading out," said resident Maria Lopez, eyeing the pile that stretches for two blocks.

Tens of thousands of containers sit empty today in Wilmington — stark testimony that America buys more from other countries than it sends overseas to sell.

Millions of the 40-foot-long steel containers arrive in Los Angeles each year, jampacked with toys, MP3 players and designer handbags made in Asia.

Although some are shipped back empty, others land in storage lots, like old cardboard cartons stuffed away in a closet.

Eventually, many of the containers are reused. But some are forgotten, and they pile up — in Wilmington and nearby cities, in communities lining the Long Beach Freeway, near rail yards in the Inland Empire.

They have transformed Wilmington into Container Land, stacked like mammoth Lego blocks five, six, even seven high, with the names of shipping firms such as Maersk, COSCO and China Shipping painted on their sides.

While experts analyze the economic problems that the containers symbolize, Wilmington residents worry about the problems with the containers themselves — from the overgrown weeds to the earthquake dangers to the ugly views they create and the better ones they block.

Rats inspire the most anger. Residents say the rodents live in the storage yard, venturing out at night to forage. Several people described how rats creep through their wrought-iron fences, past the roses on their front lawns, and sneak right into their neat stucco homes.

That's where homeowners — many of whom have small children and work hard to improve their properties — draw the line.

Where Sandison Street meets Sanford Avenue, the fence encircling the pile is topped with coiled razor wire, but neighborhood children crawl underneath and scramble up containers stacked five high. Seen from the south, the mound appears to be tilted ever so slightly to the right, a steel-block variation on the Tower of Pisa. That raises a question: In an earthquake, just how far would a steel box tumble?

As if the pile weren't eyesore enough, scraggly weeds at its edges grow so tall that Lopez has paid from her own pocket to have them trimmed. Midnight dumpers have turned the sidewalk in front of the fence into an impromptu junkyard, leaving it littered last week with a turquoise mattress and box springs and two matching upholstered chairs.

Lopez's next-door neighbor, Diane Richardson, has lost all patience after years of watching the mountain grow. It's always been something, she said.

She grew up on the street in the pre-container 1960s, when what is now the storage yard was a sandy, vacant lot that she and her friends called "the dumps" because trucks dumped garbage there. Now she watches trucks dump containers instead.

"I would love to have this whole view gone," Richardson said while gazing at the mountain from her frontyard, where she was scrubbing an inflatable pool for her great-grandchildren playing nearby. "It's terrible. The whole thing."

Local officials say they are trying to shrink the piles in Wilmington, a lower-income, largely Latino neighborhood of Los Angeles that has borne the brunt of the city-owned port's rapid expansion.

Councilwoman Janice Hahn, who represents the area, calls the growth of such yards in residential neighborhoods one of the worst abuses imposed by the ports of Los Angeles and Long Beach, the nation's first- and second-largest seaports, respectively.

"Kids are walking to school past containers stacked 40 feet high," Hahn said recently in a statement. "Containers are literally stacked outside homes and schools. You won't find this kind of blight in any other areas of the city."

Hahn spearheaded a new city ordinance that prohibits new container yards in residential areas and limits their height. The city has assigned inspectors to enforce it, but the job is not easy.

Some lots are clustered together like patchwork quilts, and inspectors are still studying who operates them and whether they are in compliance.

The mountain north of Sandison Street is in an area that includes at least five lots. City officials on Friday said inspectors are investigating the site but they still have not confirmed who is responsible for it. The city attorney's office has determined that the ordinance cannot force current yards to close, a spokesman said.

So, residents on Sandison, Dolores Street and others who hoped to see the piles disappear instead sigh as new containers arrive, delivered by trucks that clog narrow roadways and belch black diesel fumes.

No one knows how many empty containers are scattered in Wilmington and other communities around the port.

DOJ_NMG_0039257

The numbers fluctuate, depending on the season, shipping costs and the cost of steel. A preliminary 2004 survey by the Alameda Corridor Transportation Authority, which operates the rail corridor serving the ports, put the number at roughly 100,000 empty containers in 2002, dropping sharply to 28,000 two years later.

The current total is somewhere in between, said John T. Doherty, the corridor agency's chief executive officer. Wilmington residents say they did their own count last year and found 200,000.

The state Air Resources Board staff recently counted 23 storage lots in Wilmington alone.

"We were stunned, not only by the number of containers, but by the number of container yards," said Jerry Martin, spokesman for the state agency, which is studying the yards as part of a review of Wilmington's environmental problems.

Container colors vary.

Viewed from a distance, the reddish-brown Sandison Street mountain resembles a steep, sandstone butte. Red and blue mounds to the east near Long Beach look like stacked children's blocks.

Trade tallies for the two ports illustrate why the mounds form. Of the more than 14 million containers that traveled back and forth through the ports last year, more than 7 million arrived full, moving goods into the United States, while only 2.4 million left full, taking U.S. exports abroad.

Though some of the rest returned empty to Asia, others lingered in area storage yards.

Empties not only keep yards full, they also take up room on congested area freeways.

"The single greatest commodity being moved in the Los Angeles-Long Beach area right now is fresh air inside containers," said Phil Behenna, senior vice president of International Asset Systems, an Oakland-based transportation technology company.

Behenna is helping the ports assemble a "virtual container yard" program that would match empty containers with shipments in need of containers. That could make a dent in some of the steel mountains, he said.

But such solutions take time, and Wilmington residents are losing patience.

On Sandison, an occasional metallic "clang" punctuated the warm humid air on a recent afternoon as machinery hidden behind the mound of old steel moved containers around.

Some neighbors report that the same containers sit there month after month, but yard operators say they constantly move out containers and bring in new ones.

"It's an urban legend that containers come into storage yards and just rot away," said Patrick L. Wilson, president of the Wilmington Chamber of Commerce and of Fast Lane Transportation Inc., which operates a Wilmington yard.

He and other yard operators work hard to address neighbors' concerns, Wilson said. Although his yard is not in a residential neighborhood, he said, he tries to keep it clean and to haul away promptly any furniture or trash dumped nearby.

At the prodding of one local resident, he said, he even bought 40 extra containers, painted them a uniform brown and stacked them at the edge of his lot to give "a somewhat neat and ordinary appearance."

Wilson said that it was unfair to blame the storage yards for neighborhood rat problems, but that if some yards have indeed become rat breeding grounds, operators surely will try to control them. "These are responsible business owners," he said.

In her statement, Hahn said she has asked the Port of Los Angeles to identify and buy land in the largely industrial eastern corner of Wilmington so that container yards could be relocated farther from more populated areas.

But Wilson said that if yard operators were forced to move, the cost would be considerable. "To expect these legitimate business owners to go away without adequate financial compensation is unreasonable," he said.

The port's focus at the moment is on how to obtain land rather than how to compensate operators, a port spokeswoman said.

Soon after Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa took office last July, he visited Wilmington and vowed that the neighborhood — long used as a dumping ground by the city's port — would be treated with more respect under his administration. For now, residents try to live with the containers — or, in rare cases, within them.

Dan Ziemer, 49, a ponytailed diesel mechanic from San Pedro, makes his home part time in an air-conditioned container at the Wilmington repair yard where he works. It is just large enough for a double bed, a computer and a small kitchen area.

And Lopez jokes that she and her neighbors would be hard pressed to find parking spaces on Sandison Street if its north side were filled with homes instead of a container mountain and the turquoise mattress set.

"That's the only good thing I can think of," she said.

U.S. Offers To Meet N.Korea On Sidelines (AP)

By Jae-soon Chang

AP, July 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0039258

A U.S. envoy expressed support for China's proposal to hold informal six-nation talks on the North Korean nuclear threat and offered to meet bilaterally with the North on the sidelines of those discussions.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill was in Seoul as part of a regional tour to coordinate the international response to the North's test-firing Wednesday of seven missiles. The tests caused international outrage but also division over whether North Korea should be punished.

Over Chinese and Russian objections, Japan on Friday proposed a U.N. Security Council resolution that would impose sanctions on North Korea and order the communist regime to stop developing ballistic missiles.

Backed by the United States, Britain and France, the new resolution came as President Bush expressed frustration with the slow pace of diplomacy and urged world leaders to send Pyongyang a strong message condemning the missile tests, staged in defiance of international warnings.

"What matters most of all is for Kim Jong Il to see the world speak with one voice," Bush said Friday during a trip to Chicago. "That's the purpose, really."

He has ruled out direct talks between just the United States and North Korea and said he hoped the six-party talks would resume.

Beijing has floated the idea of an informal meeting between members of the six-party nuclear talks — the two Koreas, China, Russia, Japan and the United States. Pyongyang has for months refused to attend formal negotiations, protesting U.S. financial restrictions imposed over the North's alleged counterfeiting, money-laundering and other illegal practices.

"As many of you know, the Chinese have talked about putting together a six-party informal, and we both support that and we think that all countries are prepared to come to that informal meeting," Hill told reporters after meeting with Chun Young-woo, South Korea's top nuclear negotiator.

Asked about the possibility of a bilateral meeting with the North, he said: "Within the informal six-party talks, yes, I can."

"I just can't do it when they are boycotting the six-party talks."

But Hill rejected North Korea's demand that the U.S. drop restrictions imposed on a Macau bank for allegedly aiding the North's illicit activities. The U.S. has argued that the nuclear talks and financial restrictions are separate issues and should not be linked.

"This is not a time for so-called gestures of that kind," Hill said in response to the North Korean demand. "We have a country that has fired off missiles in a truly reckless way that affects ... regional security."

The North has defended its right to test missiles and said the launches could continue.

Japan urged the United Nations to vote soon on the Security Council resolution and warned it would not compromise on its stern wording. The measure would call for other countries to "take those steps necessary" to keep the North from acquiring items that could be used for its missile program.

"Japan will not give in. It definitely must be a resolution containing sanctions," Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso was quoted by Kyodo News agency as saying during a speech in Osaka on Saturday. Japan "will not back off from the resolution. We will hold on until the end."

Japanese Senior Vice Minister Yasuhisa Shiozaki said Security Council members were privately "having positive discussions" about the resolution and were chipping away at Russian and Chinese doubts. Supporters decided at a meeting Friday not to call for a vote over the weekend after some council members asked for more time to consider the resolution.

"It is strongly expected that the Security Council will put it to vote as soon as possible," Shiozaki told a news conference in Tokyo. "The timing is very important."

China, a traditional ally of North Korea, has been reluctant to impose sanctions on Pyongyang. But Japan's Yomiuri newspaper reported Saturday that Beijing appeared to have clamped down on the flow of industrial materials to North Korea in a sign of disenchantment with the missile tests.

In a report from the Chinese city of Dandong on the North Korean border, the newspaper said the normally steady cross-border stream of supply trucks from China had all but stopped as of Friday. The paper quoted a trader on the Chinese side as saying traffic had plummeted after the missile tests.

South Korea's Yonhap news agency, however, cited business people in China as saying that any slowdown in trade in the past couple of days was likely due to seasonal factors, not political ones.

South Korea, which has worked for warmer ties with Pyongyang since a 2000 North-South summit, has withheld aid shipments and rejected a Northern request for military talks. At the same time it is planning Cabinet-level meetings with the communist country next week.

Unification Minister Lee Jong-seok said Seoul would hold off sending 500,000 tons of rice and 100,000 tons of fertilizer to North Korea.

US Hints Of NKorea Talks But Presses On With Sanctions (AFP)

By Park Chan-kyong

AFP, July 9, 2006

The United States and Japan vowed to ram through UN sanctions against North Korea, but Washington also offered an olive branch by agreeing to meet one-on-one with Pyuongyang if it joined international talks.

Yet Washington also rejected an offer from the hermetic Stalinist state to rejoin the six-nation table if the United States lifted sanctions against a Makau bank with North Korean accounts suspected of counterfeiting and money laundering.

"To be very frank, I think this is not a time for so-called gestures of this kind," said US special envoy Christopher Hill while on a whirlwind tour of Asian players in the crisis.

The diplomatic fallout from North Korea's decision to launch seven missiles Wednesday came as an ultramodern US destroyer capable of intercepting new missiles that the North has already threatened to test docked in a Japanese port.

The United States and Japan are engaged in a standoff with Russia and China over the need to adopt a binding UN Security Council resolution condemning the launches and introducing trade sanction that also carry the implicit threat of force.

Hill called on China to close ranks on the draft after receiving only a lukewarm response while on visiting Beijing on Friday.

"We had very good discussions with the Chinese and made very clear our very deep concern about what is going on in the DPKR (North Korea) and I called upon the Chinese to understand that we will be much more effective if we speak in one voice."

Japan's foreign minister was even more blunt. He said Tokyo would never compromise on a non-binding resolution and called the positions of Russia and China "unreasonable."

"We may amend the draft but we are firm on the binding resolution that includes sanctions," said Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso.

Russia and China argue that sanction might only entrench the North's position and lead to more tests without the possibility of dialogue.

"If this resolution is put to a vote, there will be no unity in the Security Council," said China's UN ambassador Wang Guangya. He said "all possibilities are open" when asked specifically about Beijing possible use of its veto power.

And a top official in South Korea -- which is also a member of the six-nation talks that the North has now shunned -- also said it was "time to focus on diplomacy rather than coercive measures."

The North meanwhile has threatened to strike back with a more "physical" response if sanctions are adopted. Its UN representative said a binding referendum would amount to "an act of war."

"If anyone tries to put us under pressure, we will have no choice but to take stronger physical measures," said the North's ambassador for diplomatic normalization with Japan, Song Il Ho.

Washington has treated the North's first -- although unsuccessful -- test of a long-range Taepodong-2 missile which theoretically could reaching Alaskan shores as the last straw that broke international patience with Kim Kim Jong-Il's regime.

"Now that he's made that defiance, it's best for all of us to go to the UN Security Council and say, loud and clear, 'Here's some red lines,'" US President George W. Bush said in Chicago on Friday.

"And that's what we're in the process of doing."

Bush himself has not publicly spoken of sanctions -- although they are written into the Japanese UN draft -- and his envoy Hill said in more conciliatory tones that Washington was ready to meet the North's envoy's eye-to-eye if he joined the six-nation table.

"I just can't do it when they are boycotting the six-party talks," Hill said.

Meanwhile the Unites States shored up its defenses in the Asian seas with a planned upgrade of its Navy fleet docked in Japan.

The USS Mustin guided-missile destroyer arrived in Yokosuka, south of Tokyo, as Japanese officials rush to build a new ballistic missile defense system with the United States.

A US Navy spokesman said the arrival of the high-tech destroyer had been planned for months and was not a direct reaction to North Korea's missile tests.

The USS Mustin -- equipped with the advanced Aegis technology, which enables the tracking and possible shooting down of ballistic missiles such as the Taepodong-2 -- arrived in Yokosuka Saturday for a short "routine port visit" as part of the vessel's long-term deployment to Japan, the spokesman said.

The destroyer would replace an older vessel, he added.

NKorea Braced For 'All-out War' Ahead Of UN Sanctions Vote (AFP)

By Jun Kwanwoo

AFP, July 9, 2006

North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il vowed no compromise and said he was braced for "all-out war" as the United States and Japan pushed for the United Nations to impose new sanctions on Pyongyang for its missile tests.

With China and Russia holding out against further isolating the impoverished communist state, a US envoy visiting the region also stressed a diplomatic solution on disarmament and urged the North to come back to stalled six-nation talks on its nuclear program.

But Kim Jong-Il, in his first reported remarks since his regime lobbed seven missiles into the sea Wednesday, pledged not to give up his weapons programs.

"The General has declared that not even a tiny concession will be made to the imperialist US invaders, our arch enemy," said a broadcast on North Korean state television, as monitored by South Korea's Yonhap news agency.

Kim, who never speaks in public with his own voice, said that if the United States took "revenge," it would mean "all-out war."

"It is not empty talk for the DPRK (the Democratic People's Republic of Korea) to respond with revenge to any revenge by the enemy and with all-out war to an all-out war," the television said.

Kim mocked US assertions that his regime was on the verge of collapse.

"As the imperialists fussed loudly over our republic's collapse and attempted to plot against us, the General dealt them a blow by firmly declaring, 'Do not expect any change from me'," the television said.

North Korea, which declared last year it had nuclear weapons, walked out in November of six-way talks on ending its nuclear program, protesting a set of US financial sanctions.

Last week's missile launch included the new Taepodong-2, which was believed to be capable of reaching Alaska or Hawaii but quickly crashed into the Sea of Japan (East Sea).

China, the North's main ally and host of the six-party talks, was embarrassed by the defiant missile tests. It was to send an envoy Monday to Pyongyang.

Beijing hopes to persuade the North to take part in an informal round of six-nation talks this month in the northeastern Chinese city of Shenyang.

Christopher Hill, the US delegate to the six-party nuclear negotiations, has said he is ready to meet one-on-one with the North if it takes part in the unofficial talks.

"What it needs to do is get back to the talks and implement what we already agreed to do and to get out of this dirty nuclear business it is in, to get on (with) its task with modernizing the country," Hill told reporters in Seoul on an emergency regional tour.

Hill was due later in the day in Japan, one of the closest US allies, which pledged to push ahead with the UN resolution supported by the United States that includes new sanctions.

"If we give in to just one veto power, then we will end up sending a wrong message to the international community," Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso said.

"History tells us that any messages without binding effect is meaningless," Aso said, referring to a non-binding UN statement in 1998 after Pyongyang launched its last long-range missile, which flew over Japan.

The Security Council is set to decide Monday when to schedule a vote on the draft resolution. Japan has called for an early vote and has said it expects wide support.

But China and Russia, which regularly oppose punitive actions over international crises, oppose the draft. Both have veto power, a privilege Japan has long sought in vain although it is a non-permament member of the Council.

South Korea, which is not a member of the Security Council and has been reconciling with its neighbor, has ministerial-level talks scheduled with the North from Tuesday.

Hill said Unification Minister Lee Jong-Seok, who will lead South Korea's delegation in the talks with the North, pledged to him that he would raise the missile launch in his meetings.

Japan Won't Compromise On Korea Resolution (AP)

AP, July 9, 2006

Japan won't compromise on the stern wording of a U.N. resolution that would impose sanctions on North Korea and order the communist regime to stop developing ballistic missiles, Foreign Minister Taro Aso said Sunday.

Japan is pushing for a vote on the resolution Monday despite opposition from China, Aso said.

DOJ_NMG_0039261

"To compromise because of one country which has veto power, even though most other countries support us, sends the wrong message," Aso told national broadcaster NHK. "We can't alter our stance."

Japan proposed the resolution over Chinese and Russian objections but with backing by the United States, Britain and France, the other permanent members of the U.N. Security Council.

Aso said China would be isolated if it cast the lone veto against the resolution.

Taro also said there is a possibility that Russia will abstain from voting on the resolution, leaving China to decide whether to be the sole country voicing opposition.

"China will be backed into a corner," Aso said on the morning talk show Sunday Project. "It's only common sense not to do that."

Pyongyang triggered an international furor Wednesday when it test-fired seven missiles, which plunged into the Sea of Japan without causing damage or injury.

Aso and Japanese Defense Agency Chief Fukushiro Nukaga both said Sunday that another North Korean launch is expected, but does not appear imminent.

U.S. May Meet North Korea Directly If It Returns To Talks (BLOOM)

By Kevin Cho

Bloomberg, July 8, 2006

(Bloomberg) -- The U.S. is willing to meet with North Korea and engage in direct talks with the communist nation if it returns to the nuclear disarmament negotiations that include South Korea, China, Russia and Japan.

``If there are six-party talks, we will meet all the delegations, and we've always met'' the North Korean delegation, Christopher Hill, the U.S. assistant secretary of state for East Asia and Pacific, told reporters in Seoul today after he met with South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon.

``Within informal six-party talks, yes,'' Hill said. ``I just can't do it when they are boycotting the six-party talks, because that means they don't want six-party talks. They just want bilateral talks.''

The U.S. and China yesterday urged North Korea to resume the six-nation talks in an attempt to steer the reclusive country away from conducting further missile tests.

Hill earlier today said the U.S. wouldn't be drawn into direct talks with North Korea as a result of its missile tests, and urged that country to resume the six-nation talks.

``We are not going to turn this into a bilateral issue,'' Hill said after a meeting with Chun Young Woo, South Korea's chief delegate to those talks. ``We want to support the early resumption of the six-party process. And if the DPRK wants to get back into that process, they know where to find me.''

DPRK stands for Democratic People's Republic of Korea, North Korea's formal name.

China

Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator in the six-nation talks, yesterday met with China's Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing and the chief Chinese nuclear negotiator Wu Dawei.

North Korea said it may return to the talks if the U.S. lifts financial sanctions against it, the Hankyoreh newspaper reported earlier today, citing an interview with Han Song Ryol, North Korea's deputy United Nations envoy.

Still, the sanctions may not be lifted. ``To be very frank, I think this is not a time for so-called gestures of that kind,'' Hill said. ``We have a country that has fired off missiles in a truly reckless way that affects regional tranquility, and indeed, affects regional security.''

Hill made South Korea his second stop after China in his four-nation journey. He will also visit Japan and Russia. The U.S. is trying to persuade China to join in condemnation of North Korea's missile tests.

China yesterday opposed a Japanese resolution introduced at the United Nations that would impose sanctions on North Korea over its missile launches, saying such a measure could deepen tensions in Asia.

North Korea on July 6 vowed to continue missile tests after firing seven rockets, including a long-range Taepodong 2 missile on July 5.

The last round of six-nation talks ended in November 2005 without agreement after the parties had signed a September 2005 declaration calling for a nuclear-free Korean peninsula.

North Korea Knows How To Get Attention (AP)

By Calvin Woodward

AP, July 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0039262

North Korea is well practiced in getting some of what it wants through provocation. Bullying through a bullhorn has worked time and again for a small nation with an outsized military force and an even bigger capacity for bluster and threat.

It's called coercive diplomacy. North Korean-style, it has involved antagonizing everyone on and over the horizon, foes and allies alike, and then pulling back. Sometimes just in the nick of time.

While few would call the North Korean leadership predictable, certain things are expected of it. That's the case now, in the storm of condemnation and diplomatic maneuvering set off by North Korea's in-your-face missile tests.

"When diplomacy is stalled, North Korea escalates tension to break the deadlock," Wonhyuk Lim, a Brookings Institution fellow for northeast Asian studies, says in an analysis for the think tank.

"In sum, as twisted as the North Koreans' logic may be, it is based on their negotiating experience with the Americans. North Korea's brinkmanship is the evil twin of America's halfhearted engagement."

The risk is that North Korea's attention-grabbing actions may bring bombs in reprisal instead of diplomacy, as almost happened in the Clinton administration.

In 2003, North Korea pulled out of a nuclear arms treaty, vowing to bring "defeat and ruin" on the United States, warning of World War III and declaring, "Let us see who will win and who will be defeated in the fire-to-fire standoff."

This was followed by the first substantive talks between the two nations since President Bush came to office.

As a propaganda gambit, the missile tests that North Korea put on during America's Independence Day were hardly a smashing success. On a day when the space shuttle arced into the heavens on a mission of science and international cooperation, North Korea's star long-range missile is said to have failed like a bum firecracker on its mission of defiance and military advancement.

A half-dozen tests of shorter range missiles were conducted to uncertain effect, but no failures as far as known. The results, in short, spoke to North Korea's apparent ability to wreak havoc in its region and its inability any time soon to reach the U.S. mainland with a nuclear missile.

For the United States, "the main risk seems to be that North Korea is beginning early testing of a missile that could throw the equivalent of a rock at Alaska," said Anthony Cordesman of the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Yet North Korea has massive combat forces on the border with South Korea; long-range artillery capable of reaching Japan and destroying up to 40 percent of the South Korean economy; and huge stocks of chemical weapons as well as its rising nuclear weapons capability.

An impoverished country of some 23 million people, it fields the world's fifth largest army, behind China, the U.S., Russia and India. It is considered no match in any protracted fight with South Korea's lethal modern forces, America's unmatched power or a devastating combination of both.

Still, any conflict could bring horrific consequences to both sides and risk pitting China against the United States.

Like many students of the region, Cordesman protests the tendency to regard Kim Jong Il as a reckless poseur without a purpose.

"North Korea may or may not face a few hard weeks or months of reprisal, but it has reminded everyone of just how serious a threat North Korea can be, how limited most military options are, and how serious the risks of any major war would be," Cordesman said.

North Korea's declaration back in 1993 that it would pull out of the nuclear weapons nonproliferation treaty brought the peninsula close to war and isolated the country through international censure, in the process leading to breakthrough negotiations with Washington that produced an agreement to freeze North Korea's nuclear activities in exchange for U.S. energy assistance.

North Korea's first test of a multistage rocket in 1998, also a flop, spurred bilateral talks. The current framework of six-nation negotiations was set up after North Korea resumed its plutonium program in 2002 and expelled international inspectors.

That pattern of edging toward confrontation, then edging back, has persisted, always accompanied by tough words. More are being heard now. "Catastrophic effects will arise," North Korean envoy Song Il Ho warned last week after Japan took steps to punish North Korea for firing the missiles.

"We're certainly not going to overreact ... to these wild statements," Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said. "We've seen them before."

Tensions Over Missile Tests Rattle Investors (NYT)

North Korea fired test missiles while Wall Street rested on the Fourth of July, rattling stock markets around the world. The next day, when Wall Street returned to work, stocks fell sharply. Despite a modest rally on Thursday, the market finished lower for the week.

On Friday, there was another apparent cause for the market's weakness — a warning by 3M, the technology company, that second-quarter earnings would be lower than expected because the demand for flat-panel TV screens was soft. Its shares dropped 8.7 percent for the week, and 3M's problems set off declines for a host of other stocks.

General Motors' shares, however, rose 7.4 percent for the week. Its board decided to study an alliance with Nissan Motor and Renault, which Kirk Kerkorian, a dissident G.M. shareholder, had demanded.

For the week, the Dow Jones industrial average shed 59.55 points, or 0.5 percent, to close at 11,090.67. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index dropped 4.72 points, or 0.4 percent, to close at 1,265.48. The Nasdaq composite index fell 42.03 points, or 1.9 percent, to close at 2,130.06.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury bond fell slightly, to 5.13 percent from 5.14 percent the previous week. JEFF SOMMER

High-tech Missile Destroyer Sails To Japan (AP)

By Hans Greimel

AP, July 9, 2006

A new U.S. guided missile destroyer docked in Japan on Saturday amid tensions over North Korea's missile tests, but the military said the arrival was routine and had been planned months ago.

The USS Mustin sailed into the port of Yokosuka, home to the Navy's 7th Fleet, with a crew of 300 for permanent assignment to the region, fleet spokeswoman Hanako Tomizuka said.

The Mustin, commissioned in 2003, is one of the most advanced in the fleet. The 509-foot ship carries surface-to-air missiles and Tomahawk cruise missiles.

Its deployment to Yokosuka was previously planned and not in response to North Korea's missile tests, the Navy said.

"The Mustin is replacing the USS Vandegrift as part of the Navy's long-range plan to routinely replace older ships in its forward-deployed naval force with newer, more capable surface combatants," said Lt. Trey Brown, a Navy spokesman at the Pentagon.

"It's routine. We do this all the time."

Pyongyang stunned the region Wednesday by test-firing seven missiles.

In August, Yokosuka also will welcome the USS Shiloh, which last month demonstrated its ability to shoot down missile warheads in a landmark test off Hawaii. The Shiloh is replacing the USS Chancellorsville.

Both the Mustin and the Shiloh are equipped with radar systems that employ Aegis technology, which is geared toward tracking and shooting down enemy missiles. The system was instrumental in identifying and assessing Wednesday's launchings in which all the missiles apparently fell into the Sea of Japan.

At least one of those missiles was believed capable of reaching the U.S. mainland.

The U.S. Navy now has eight Aegis-equipped vessels at Yokosuka.

The Case For A Preemptive Strike On North Korea's Missiles (TIME)

By Ashton B. Carter And William J. Perry

Time, July 9, 2006

Viewpoint: Former Clinton administration officials Ashton Carter and William Perry argue that the most effective way to curb the threat from Pyongyang is to destroy its missiles at their test sites

The Bush Administration has tried to downplay the mounting danger posed by North Korea. That might be the understandable reaction of officials necessarily preoccupied with the ongoing campaign in Iraq. But it is not prudent or safe. Although the July 4 test of the Taepo Dong 2 missile—which is intended to carry nuclear warheads to U.S. territory—appears to have failed, North Korea conducted the test so its engineers could learn how to perfect the missile, and even a failed test provides critical data. More important is the test's symbolic significance: once again North Korea has crossed a line in the sand clearly drawn by the U.S. and its partners.

We anticipated that North Korea would ignore the U.S.'s warnings. That's why, in an opinion piece published in the Washington Post on June 22, we urged the Bush Administration to strike the Taepo Dong 2 on its launchpad before the test could be conducted. "Surgical strike" is a much abused term, but destroying a test missile as it is being readied for launch qualifies for this category because only one U.S. cruise missile or precision bomb with an ordinary high-explosive warhead could easily puncture and ignite the multistory test booster. As with space-shuttle launches from Cape Canaveral, all personnel would normally be a safe distance away from the rocket at the time, so there should be no collateral damage.

Critics of our article, including members of the Bush Administration, say that a pre-emptive strike is too risky. But if the U.S. is ever going to defend a line in the sand with North Korea, that is the least provocative way to do it, and next time it will only be riskier. Such a strike could be seen by the North Korean leadership for what it is: a limited act of defense of the U.S. homeland against a gathering threat, and not an overall attack on North Korea. Pyongyang tries carefully to cultivate the impression that it will lash out in response to any action against it, however limited. But would it truly retaliate against South Korea, which has been working hard to improve North-South relations, in response to a U.S. airstrike? Such a war would surely and swiftly end in the elimination of the North Korean regime. Pyongyang's leaders are bold, but they are not suicidal.

For the U.S., the risk of inaction will prove far greater. The Pyongyang regime will view its stockpile of missiles and nuclear material as tipping the regional balance in its favor and providing a shield behind which it can pursue its interests with impunity. Worse, North Korea has a long history of selling its advanced weapons to countries in the Middle East, and it operates a black market in other forms of contraband. Like Pakistan's rogue nuclear engineer A.Q. Khan, North Korean officials might be tempted to sell the ingredients of their arsenal to terrorists. Finally, many expect North Korea's failed economy to lead one day to the regime's collapse. Who then might get its loose nukes?

So what should be done to begin to rein in the runaway North Korean nuclear and missile programs? First, we continue to advise the U.S. government to strike any further Taepo Dong test missiles before they can be launched. Second, the North should be penalized for defying the international community's unanimous appeal not to conduct its July 4 tests. China and South Korea are the main economic benefactors of North Korea, and President Bush is right to seek a United Nations Security Council action that would compel all nations to suspend trade with Pyongyang.

For years, the U.S. has been paralyzed by a division in the Bush Administration between one camp that favors diplomacy with Pyongyang and another camp that hopes for the early collapse of the regime. But the net result has been that neither policy has been pursued consistently. Instead, Washington has outsourced the North Korea issue to regional players in the form of the "Six Party" talks, a strategy that has has failed to produce any results except plutonium and missile tests. South Korea, China and Russia have offered only carrots while carefully avoiding the threat of sticks—yet both carrots and sticks are essential ingredients of any successful diplomacy.

The "Six Party" talks are the right forum for diplomacy, but ultimately, what matters less than who is at the table is whether the U.S. has a clear strategy. We won't know whether North Korea's ambitions can be blunted by anything short of the use of force unless and until the U.S. takes the danger seriously and gets in the game.

Four Scenarios, And Not One Ends Happily (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

THOSE North Korean missiles that splashed down harmlessly in the Sea of Japan last week prompted a lot of jokes about the country that couldn't shoot straight. But they were also a reminder that North Korea has defied more than a decade of predictions that it would shrivel up and go away; the choices for dealing with it look as grim as ever.

What could happen next? The truth is that for years, both sides have been gaming plans for everything from negotiations to bombing runs, coexistence to collapse. Here are a few:

ONE-ON-ONE TALKS

Mr. Bush's critics say that he should do what President Clinton did: Hold his nose, and negotiate directly. That's how the 1994 "Agreed Framework" happened, when North Korea agreed to freeze its nuclear program in return for fuel oil and, some day, for "proliferation resistant" light-water reactors to provide energy. The deal has since died.

Mr. Bush says nothing doing. The North Koreans started cheating on the 1994 agreement, he says, almost immediately. But his big worry is that if America negotiates alone, it will be hung out to dry when talks go bad.

He insists that China and South Korea — which are reluctant to crack down on the North, but have the most to lose — must be at the table. Negotiate alone, he said on Friday in Chicago, and "you run out of options very quickly," especially if the North manages to "turn the tables and make a country like the United States the problem."

Mr. Bush has a point. Talk one on one, and the dynamic changes. China and South Korea will likely portray Washington as the obstacle. The downside to Mr. Bush's approach: When six nations talk, clarity is the first victim. The North can play each country against the others. No wonder that in the three years of talks the result has been one agreement in principle, with no timetables, which everyone interpreted differently the day it was signed.

TAKING OUT YONGBYON

In 1994, when North Korea threatened to throw out international inspectors and turn its stockpile of spent nuclear-reactor fuel into plutonium for weapons, Brent Scowcroft, who had served as the national security adviser to the first President Bush, advocated pre-emption. It would be better to destroy North Korea's nuclear facilities at Yongbyon, he argued, than to let the country build a nuclear arsenal.

That suggestion struck a chord in the Clinton White House.

"My belief is that President Clinton was prepared to do it," said William J. Perry, the defense secretary at the time. But a last-minute deal with North Korea was struck.

Nine years later, in January 2003, the North Koreans made good on their threat. American spy satellites saw the North Koreans carting the rods off for what appeared to be reprocessing into bomb fuel, but President Bush, preoccupied with Baghdad, not Pyongyang, decided not to act.

What about now? Many believe it is too late. By the C.I.A.'s estimate, North Korea now has the fuel for six or more weapons, and it is producing roughly a bomb's worth every year. (Whether they have turned the fuel into weapons is unclear.) The fuel could be stored anywhere — in caves, tunnels, Kim Jong Il's shoe closet. Moreover, the United States has accused North Korea of starting up a second nuclear weapons program, using uranium, with the help of Pakistan's former nuclear architect, A. Q. Khan. That makes bombing pretty useless.

THE NIGHTMARE: NORTH KOREA SELLS

This chain of events worries the Bush administration the most. Rightly or wrongly, the Pentagon assumes that because Mr. Kim, for all his other oddities, values his survival, he would not risk an attack with a return address.

But the North Korean leader may soon find himself with a small surplus of the world's most coveted weapons material, bomb-grade plutonium. David Albright and Paul Brannan of the Institute for Science and International Security estimated in a recent report that North Korea's stock of plutonium "is enough for 4 to 13 weapons." Countries that have four weapons worth of bomb material probably aren't willing to give up any. But when you have enough for more than a dozen — and you are broke — the black market must look attractive.

Of course, making bomb fuel is one thing; getting caught selling it is another. During the six-party talks in Beijing, the North once threatened to sell a weapon, and American officials made clear that the results for Pyongyang would be disastrous.

Would the North Koreans dare do it? "Who knows," said Michael Green, who recently left the administration after running Asian affairs at the National Security Council. "But their strategy is steady escalation, and their next step may be a nuclear test" to prove the quality of their wares.

LIVE WITH IT

There is always the Cuba strategy: Wait out the Kim dynasty, and hope that the starving, bankrupt, gulag-ridden state of North Korea finally collapses.

After all, the North is hardly in a position to lash out. Its military, while among the world's largest, can't afford to train its pilots. The thought that it would restart the Korean War, still considered plausible through the early 90's, seems almost laughable today.

But as Dick Cheney once famously said about the North, "time is not on our side." It may take years, experts say, but they will straighten out that Taepodong 2 missile. Eventually they may figure out how to miniaturize a nuclear warhead to fit on top of it.

That is why, while Mr. Bush talks about finding a diplomatic solution, the Pentagon is mapping every corner of the country, trying to figure out how to deal with a nuclear outbreak.

And it is why the Chinese and the South Koreans fear a collapse — because the only thing harder than dealing with a nuclear-armed North Korea may be handling millions of hungry, confused refugees headed for Seoul, Tokyo and Harbin.

Failure Can Be Successful (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

ON June 11, 1957, the Atlas, America's first Intercontinental Ballistic Missile, took its inaugural flight from Cape Canaveral in Florida.

DOJ_NMG_0039266

It lasted 24 seconds. The missile roared off the launching pad and soared to about 10,000 feet before its engines failed. Tumbling out of control, the rocket fell through its own trail of fire before the safety officer on the ground sent a radio signal that told the wayward rocket to blow itself up.

The rocket's designers, though disappointed, learned a lot. It was clear that, despite the pummeling the Atlas took as it careered out of control, the rocket had remained intact. That proved its structural integrity, ending a major debate over the design's soundness.

Perhaps everyone can learn from failure, even the North Koreans.

Their missile, the Taepodong 2, took flight briefly last week, and seems to be in no shape to send an atom bomb whizzing halfway around the globe toward the United States. Experts judge that many years of testing beyond that inaugural flight on Tuesday will probably be needed before the North would entrust the new missile with anything as costly and precious as a nuclear warhead.

"It would take five or six tests of their final design before they'd be confident it could go someplace," said Harold M. Agnew, a former director of the Los Alamos weapons laboratory, which designed most of the nation's nuclear arms.

In the hours and days after the missile test Tuesday, military experts and administration officials expressed relief at the apparent failure, some calling the North Koreans inept. Stephen Hadley, President Bush's national security adviser, lightly disparaged the troubled launching, saying it "tells you something about capabilities."

But in interviews, arms and aerospace experts said that such setbacks were a normal part of rocket and warhead science. In time, they said, the North Koreans will likely make the vehicle reliable enough to wage intercontinental war.

"It would have been more surprising if they had a success" on the first try, said John M. Logsdon, director of the Space Policy Institute at George Washington University. "Developing rockets is hard to do."

The missile test, many said, was a reasonable step forward. "The fact that something flies for 40 seconds before it blows up means the design is probably fundamentally sound," said Jonathan McDowell, a Harvard astronomer who publishes the online Jonathan's Space Report, which tracks global rocket launchings.

Even if failures cut short a vehicle's debut, Dr. McDowell said, the flight can "give you an incredible amount of information about such things as how well your engines are working and what the aerodynamic stability of the vehicle is."

If the North Koreans launched 10 Taepodong 2 missiles and none worked, he added, "then you can make fun of them."

In fact, the test flight was actually longer than at first reported. American military officials said on Thursday that the test flight's overall duration was closer to two minutes, not the 42 seconds initially reported.

Rocket experts said that, in general, new designs typically blow up repeatedly in flight tests before engineers can find and fix all the problems.

"It's a trial-and-error process," said Charles P. Vick, an expert on the North Korean rocket program at GlobalSecurity.org, a research group based in Alexandria, Va. "They're trying to build and test to wring out the problems. It's the process any nation has to go through."

Mr. Vick said that rocket designers typically conducted from 2 to 20 test flights before gaining reasonable assurance that a new model can be fairly reliable. Even then, he added, rockets declared operational often have failure rates of 1 in 10 or 1 in 20 flights.

So it's reasonable to expect that North Korea is busy learning from the failure, fixing flaws before it launches another Taepodong 2. South Korea's defense minister told reporters on Friday that the North appears to be holding another long-range missile near the launching pad.

The daunting nature of the aerospace game is reflected in other American programs, as well as American tragedies.

On Tuesday — as the nation celebrated its birth and North Korea lighted the skies with its own red glare — experts held their collective breath as the space shuttle Discovery blasted off with fire and thunder into a nearly cloudless Florida sky.

The winged spaceships, though considered highly reliable by industry standards, have failed catastrophically on 2 of 115 missions, killing a total of 14 astronauts, including the first teacher meant to fly in space. The space agency now puts the odds of disaster at roughly 1 in 100 flights.

Similar problems have dogged America's update of the "Star Wars" antimissile system, which is now based on land in California and Alaska, and is meant to shoot down North Korean missiles. It has hit targets in 5 of 10 tests, said Dr. Philip E. Coyle III, a former head of weapons testing at the Pentagon. "That's the good news," he said. "The bad news is that there's been no interception success for four years. And in the two most recent attempts, the interceptor never got off the ground."

President Bush, asked Friday at a news conference about the North's missile firing, said he thought the nation's antimissile system "had a reasonable chance of shooting it down."

DOJ_NMG_0039267

As for warheads, North Korea has declared publicly that it already possesses nuclear arms. But Dr. Agnew, the former director of Los Alamos, noted that the North Koreans appear to have never conducted a nuclear test — often considered a necessary step to proving a weapon's reliability. "Once they do that, it's serious," he said. "Otherwise, they're just pulling our string."

American intelligence agencies have told President Bush they believe the North has made enough fuel for six or more weapons, but it is unclear if it has been used to fashion warheads.

Dr. Agnew noted that if the North succeeded in developing a reliable warhead it would face a daunting series of technical hurdles in preparing to hurl it aloft. "There's a lot of subtleties in missile-warhead mating that can affect the accuracy," he said of long-range targeting.

Missiles also have the inherent disadvantage of advertising where they arise. If the North Koreans really wanted to wreak havoc by sending a nuclear weapon overseas, Dr. Agnew said, they might consider loading it onto an inconspicuous boat.

"Most of our attractive targets," he remarked, "are on the East Coast."

Anthony H. Cordesman, a military analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, estimated that the North Koreans might need five years to perfect a long-range missile. Its warhead, he added, would likely be a crude atom type rather than the much more destructive hydrogen type that powers the city busters of most global arsenals.

"It seems very doubtful that North Korea is close to a real-world capability to attack the U.S.," he said.

Dr. McDowell of Harvard agreed. "Maybe they could do it five years from now, but that depends on how often they test," he said. "It would be 5 to 10 years before I'd start to worry — even a little."

U.S. To Negotiate Russian Storage Of Atomic Waste (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 8 — The Bush administration said Saturday that it would open formal negotiations with Russia on a long-discussed civilian nuclear agreement that would pave the way for Russia to become one of the world's largest repositories of spent nuclear fuel.

President Vladimir V. Putin has been looking to expand the country's role in the multibillion nuclear power business. The United States has traditionally opposed any such arrangement, in part because of concerns about the safety of Russian nuclear facilities, and because the country has helped Iran build its first major nuclear reactor.

But administration officials said that once Mr. Bush endorsed Mr. Putin's proposal last year for Iran to conduct uranium enrichment inside Russia — rather than in Iran, where the administration fears it would be diverted to weapons — it made little sense to bar ordinary civilian nuclear exchanges with Russia.

In announcing the change of course, the White House made it clear that in return, it expected Mr. Putin's cooperation in what promises to be a tense confrontation with Iran on forcing it to give up the enrichment of uranium. Mr. Bush has charged that the enrichment is intended to feed a secret nuclear weapons program. "We have made clear to Russia that for an agreement on peaceful nuke cooperation to go forward, we will need active cooperation in blocking Iran's attempts to obtain nuclear weapons," said Peter Watkins, a White House spokesman.

So far, Russia has backed the United States in its fundamental demands but balked at the imposition of sanctions or the passage of any United Nations Security Council resolution that Mr. Bush could later use as a justification for military action.

The Washington Post first reported the shift on Saturday.

A spokesman for Mr. Putin declined to comment. But Sergei G. Novikov, a spokesman for Russia's Atomic Energy Agency, said in a telephone interview that Russia and the United States had been talking about the subject in recent months.

He added that he did not expect that an agreement would be signed during the Group of 8 summit meeting in St. Petersburg next weekend, but rather that Mr. Bush and Mr. Putin might issue a vaguely worded statement on increased nuclear cooperation, and then instruct their governments to work on an agreement that might lift the current restrictions. The United States has similar deals with a variety of nations, including China.

If such a statement is issued, Mr. Novikov said, negotiations on the details would probably take at least several months. "I would rather not talk about any expectations, so as not to experience any frustration should they not come true," he said.

For Mr. Bush, an accord could help solve two problems: where to send a growing stockpile of waste from nuclear fuel that originated in the United States, and how to keep Russia on board in pressuring Iran to give up its uranium enrichment programs.

Under American law, the United States retains control over nuclear fuel, and nuclear waste, made from uranium that originated in the United States. As a result it has barred South Korea, Taiwan and other states that bought American fuel from transferring it to Russia, which changed its laws several years ago to enter the multibillion dollar business of storing nuclear waste. The proposed agreement does not appear to be intended to allow storage in Russia of waste from reactors in the United States.

But a negotiation would also help provide Mr. Putin with an economic incentive for giving up nuclear aid to Iran, which has long been one of the Bush administration's objectives. On Friday, in Chicago, Mr. Bush alluded to the difficulty in getting Russia and China to join in sanctions against Iran or North Korea.

"You know, some nations are more comfortable with sanctions than other nations, and part of the issue we face in some of these countries is that they've got economic interests," Mr. Bush told reporters.

In two previous trips to St. Petersburg as president, Mr. Bush tried to persuade Mr. Putin to give up a lucrative contract to supply the reactors to Iran's Bushehr nuclear plant. But Russia resisted, and eventually Mr. Bush accepted a deal in which any nuclear fuel Russia sells to Iran would have to be returned to Russia after use, so that plutonium could not be removed from the waste for military use.

Congress would have the right to review any agreement. But since the administration just concluded an accord with India, which requires a more intensive nuclear review, administration officials said they thought Russia would win approval.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York and a regular administration critic, offered tentative approval of the idea. "While the devil is certainly in the details, given that our greatest danger right now is a nuclear Iran and North Korea, we very much need Russia's help," he said in an e-mail message.

Congressman Edward R. Royce, Republican of California and the chairman of the House Subcommittee on International Terrorism and Nonproliferation, said that he was supportive of the idea but that he expected to hold hearings.

Rep. Edward J. Markey, a Massachusetts Democrat who is the co-chairman of the Bipartisan Task Force on Nonproliferation, harshly criticized Mr. Bush over the move.

"President Bush's foreign policy has become so hollow that his favorite bargaining position is to give everything away. He is repeatedly rewarding bad behavior," he said in a statement.

Outside experts with whom the administration had been consulting on the deal said they had sensed a recent cooling off on the idea as Russia continued to hold out on bringing sanctions against Iran. The idea seemed to pick up again several weeks ago when Russia's top atomic energy official, Sergei V. Kiriyenko, lobbied hard for it during meetings with counterparts in Washington.

At the same time, the administration seemed to come around to thinking that the negotiations for the deal — which could take place over months or even years — could help bring Russia more fully on board with the administration's efforts to rein in Iran, said Robert J. Einhorn, senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies and a former assistant secretary of state for nonproliferation in the Clinton administration and briefly in Mr. Bush's.

"They had reached the conclusion that entering the negotiations would provide continuing leverage," Mr. Einhorn said.

The idea is not new, and some outside experts have been calling for just such an arrangement for months. The Council of Foreign Relations did so in a report on United States-Russian relations in March that was highly critical of Mr. Putin's policies.

"The idea was to create a greater foundation for nuclear cooperation with the Russians to support staying on the same track with Iran," said Stephen Sestanovich, a senior fellow at the council and an adviser on Russia for former President Bill Clinton.

But the report also cited such an agreement as a way to foster cooperation on securing spent fuel and providing nuclear energy to nonnuclear nations seeking to develop their own enrichment facilities.

Bush To Pursue Nuclear Deal With Russia (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, July 9, 2006

President Bush will pursue a nuclear cooperation agreement when he meets Russian leader Vladimir Putin next week during a summit of industrialized nations in St. Petersburg, the White House said Saturday.

But any agreement would be conditioned on Russia helping to pressure Iran to give up its alleged desire to develop nuclear weapons, said Frederick Jones, spokesman for Bush's National Security Council.

"We have made clear to the Russians that for an agreement on peaceful nuclear cooperation to go forward, we will need Russia's active cooperation in blocking Iran's attempt to obtain nuclear weapons," Jones said.

The two presidents will announce the start of negotiations on the agreement when they meet on the sidelines of the July 15-17 Group of Eight summit in St. Petersburg, the White House confirmed.

Nuclear cooperation between the two countries has stalled for more than a decade because of Washington's objections to Russia's nuclear cooperation with Iran, including construction of an atomic power plant in Bushehr.

DOJ_NMG_0039269

The Bush administration's willingness to reverse course and pursue a nuclear cooperation agreement reflects the U.S. view that Moscow is now a partner in the effort to persuade Tehran to abandon its nuclear weapons ambitions, rather than a hindrance to it.

"Now that Russia has been more cooperative in putting pressure on Iran to abandon its" alleged nuclear weapons program, the United States "won't allow the Iran relationship to get in the way of this particular activity," said Jon Wolfstahl, an analyst at the Carnegie Endowment for Peace in Washington.

The White House sees an agreement with Russia as a win-win, despite concerns that Putin is backtracking on democratic advances, about the security of Russian nuclear material, and that Moscow has so far opposed imposing sanctions on Iran if it refuses to abandon suspected nuclear weapons development.

Bush wants the use of nuclear power increased, especially in developing countries, to reduce the global demand for oil. Russia, meanwhile, sees a lucrative market in playing a role in providing such capabilities to other countries.

"Such an agreement would benefit both the United States and Russia, and indeed the world, by enabling advances in and greater use of nuclear energy," said Jones, the Security Council spokesman.

The two leaders, who have been promoting nuclear energy as a clean alternative, have made proposals on providing nuclear power to developing countries while building in safeguards for nonproliferation of weapons.

Rose Gottemoeller, director of the Carnegie Moscow Center, said the potential joint project was "probably the biggest story coming out of the Petersburg summit."

"This is a field where Russia has a clear technological advantage because over the past 30 years, the U.S. has essentially abandoned nuclear power technology development" in the wake of the 1979 Three Mile Island nuclear accident in Pennsylvania and the Chernobyl accident in 1986, Gottemoeller said at a round table discussion on U.S.-Russian relations.

In January, Putin proposed establishing an international nuclear center in Russia that would provide full fuel cycle services. He said the center could be the start of a network of such centers around the world.

At about the same time, Bush introduced his Global Nuclear Energy Partnership, which would provide fresh fuel to countries that agree to use it only for power generation and would recover spent fuel.

"President Bush is very anxious to move his nuclear energy proposals forward and he sees his relationship with President Putin as a natural way to add momentum," said Wolfstahl of the Carnegie Endowment for Peace.

"The Russians have probably more modern nuclear reactor technology than we do but they need our endorsement and our cooperation if they are going to bring it to the international market," he said.

Environmentalists have criticized Russia's efforts to develop such a business, arguing it will turn the country into a dumping ground for nuclear waste.

Russia has 31 reactors at 10 nuclear power plants, accounting for about 16 percent of the country's electricity generation, and Putin has called for raising the share to 25 percent.

Last month, Russia's atomic energy agency signed a contract with a military shipbuilding plant to build the world's first floating nuclear reactor near the Arctic port of Severodvinsk.

No G-8 Seat For China, Other Big Economies (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, July 9, 2006

The G-8 summit that President Bush and seven other world leaders are attending next weekend in Russia is often billed as a gathering of the world's leading economic powers. It is not. Consider: China, now the world's fourth-largest economy and the nation with the most influence over renegade North Korea, is not a member.

Neither is India, the world's largest democracy and one of its fastest-growing economies. Nor is South Korea, Brazil, Mexico or Spain, each with a larger economy than G-8 member Russia's. In fact, Spain recently inched past member Canada as the world's No. 8 economy, according to a World Bank tabulation.

Often officials from developing nations are invited as observers to the summit but have no formal roles. Among those invited to this year's gathering is Chinese President Hu Jintao.

Critics view the annual economic summit as a Cold War relic that needs to be reconstituted. It was formed in the 1970s, but economic dynamics are far different three decades later. The astonishing growth of some Asian nations and parts of Latin America have altered the math.

DOJ_NMG_0039270

Yet expanding or changing the membership is not on this year's agenda, nor is it likely to be on next year's. Few officials from member nations seem eager to talk about the subject.

White House aides insist the president is more focused on substantive issues.

Igor Shuvalov, Russian President Vladimir Putin's top summit adviser, acknowledges that Russia lags behind the other seven members in terms of current economic output. But stay tuned, he says.

"We believe the importance of Russia in our global world will change. We have very talented people and well-educated labor. We have oil and gas," said Shuvalov in a telephone interview with U.S. reporters. "We will develop very quickly as one of the major G-8 countries."

Even now, Russia is economically "stronger than some G-8 members," Shuvalov asserted without offering backup data. "I don't want to name those countries," he said.

What is now known as the G-8 was formed in 1975 as the Group of Major Industrialized Democracies. At the time, it consisted of the United States, Japan, Britain, France and Germany — undisputedly the world's five biggest economic powers at the time. Italy was added in 1976, Canada in 1977 and Russia in 1998.

The group holds annual summits. Economic themes are supposed to prevail, but often are overshadowed by events of the day and global politics.

Last year's summit in Scotland was jolted by multiple terrorist bomb blasts on London's transit system. This year's session probably will dwell on North Korea's recent barrage of missile tests and the nuclear aspirations it shares with Iran.

Robert Hormats, vice chairman of Goldman Sachs International and an expert on economic summitry, advocates expanding the G-8 to include other modern economic powers, especially China.

"When this group was formed in the 1970s, the members were the main influences on the globe. Now you've got a lot of other countries that have a lot more influence than they did 30 years ago and who are not in the process," said Hormats, who helped Presidents Carter, Ford and Reagan prepare for economic summits.

China's membership could help the G-8 this year deal with North Korea, Hormats said. He noted that last year, the summit partners called on the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries to produce more oil, yet neither Saudi Arabia nor any other OPEC member are participants.

This year's summit is in Putin's hometown, St. Petersburg. It is Russia's first time to hold the rotating G-8 presidency, a controversy itself given Putin's moves to restrict political and economic freedoms.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., and former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright have said Russia should be excluded. A London-based think tank, the Foreign Policy Center, issued a report saying Putin's record makes a mockery of G-8's commitment to free markets and open societies.

But others want Russia to stay and for other nations to join, including nondemocracies that are big economies.

Johannes Linn and Colin Bradford, both former World Bank officials now with the Brookings Institution, have proposed expanding the group to 19 to 20 members.

They would add Australia, Argentina, Brazil, China, India, Indonesia, Korea, Mexico, Saudi Arabia, South Africa and Turkey. They also would add the country of the rotating presidency of the European Union if it was not already a member.

"The problem in a sense for the G-8 is that it has set itself up as a quasi-steering group for the world, but it cannot effectively and cannot legitimately deal with many of the key issues," Linn said.

And it will only get worse. "Five years from now, I cannot possibly see how a G-8 would still be relevant," he said.

Gee whiz.

But will the G-8 transform itself anytime soon? "Probably not," he said.

Kremlin Tightens Reins On Free Market (WT/AP)

By Judith Ingram, Associated Press

The Washington Times, July 9, 2006

MOSCOW -- When President Vladimir Putin calls a staff meeting, the heads of some of Russia's most prominent companies are at his beck and call.

Alongside his drive to re-establish Kremlin control over the nation's political life, Mr. Putin aggressively has reasserted state domination over major economic sectors -- in part by installing members of his own team, many dating back to his days in St. Petersburg, into key positions in some major state-controlled companies.

DOJ_NMG_0039271

Deputy Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev, a Putin protege, chairs the board of Gazprom, the world's largest gas company. A Kremlin deputy chief of staff, Igor Sechin, is chairman of the board of the Rosneft oil company, which plans a high-profile, $10 billion initial public offering on the London Stock Exchange this summer.

And Mr. Putin's chief of staff, Sergei Sobyanin, recently was named chairman of the nuclear fuel company TVEL, the springboard for what the Kremlin hopes will be a renaissance of the Russian nuclear industry.

The list of government officials doubling as captains of industry goes on, reflecting deeply intertwined state and business interests. Mr. Putin's influence in so many industries raises questions about whether politics won't trump economics in the end when business decisions are made.

"We're at a stage where in order to get control ... President Putin wants to make sure the person he has confidence in is overseeing all this stuff," says Andrew Somers, head of the American Chamber of Commerce in Moscow. "But we do think in the long run it's inefficient, it raises questions on how decisions are made and complicates the negotiation process."

It also means Russia is out of step with the developed countries that make up the Group of Eight, the elite club of nations to which Mr. Putin plays host this year.

Russia's G-8 partners have expressed concern about the state's growing role -- especially the Kremlin's influence in the volatile energy market, where many European countries fear they could become hostage to a Russian monopoly.

Mr. Putin also has come under criticism from other G-8 leaders for the government-sanctioned carving up of one-time tycoon Mikhail Khodorkovsky's Yukos oil company.

Khodorkovsky, who sponsored opposition parties in the run-up to parliamentary elections in 2003, now is in prison in Siberia, while the remainder of his company -- once the nation's largest -- is in receivership. Rosneft snapped up the choicest pieces after a murky state auction.

The Yukos example made clear how far the Kremlin is prepared to go to press Mr. Putin's campaign to tighten not just economic but also political control in Russia. It is a topic that G-8 leaders likely will raise -- if gingerly -- at the three-day summit in St. Petersburg that opens Saturday.

Mr. Putin's approach is more than the instinctive retreat from free markets of a Soviet-trained former bureaucrat. It is also a reaction to Russia's 1998 financial crisis, when the state was forced to write off $40 billion in debt and sharply devalue its currency -- a humiliating comedown for a one-time superpower and a lesson for Mr. Putin's circle of the perils of lax state involvement in the economy.

"We've heard from the government several times over the past five, six years that they believe one of the reasons Russia ran into the crisis of 1998 was not only because the oil price went down but simply because the government had removed itself from an active role in managing the economy," says Chris Weafer, chief strategist with Moscow's Alfa Bank.

So Mr. Putin's administration has consolidated control over strategic industries, such as oil and natural gas, and worked to cobble together "national champion" companies in sectors such as aviation and nuclear power.

"We are talking about the creation of major international private corporations and promoting them on the world market," says Arkady Dvorkovich, Mr. Putin's economic adviser.

"Yes, part of these companies are under state control and this is because the period we are living in -- the transitional period from one model of economic development to another," he says. "These companies would be expected to adhere to standards of efficiency and transparency associated with privately run corporations."

But economists say state involvement is fraught with negative consequences, including increased bureaucratic red tape and discouragement of entrepreneurship -- with a resulting slowdown in growth.

No company better illustrates those pitfalls than Gazprom, the natural-gas giant.

"Gazprom is one of the most inefficient companies in the country, because it survives due to two things: tax subsidies and continual borrowing," says Georgy Satarov, a former aide to Mr. Putin's predecessor, Boris Yeltsin, and head of the Indem think tank.

In a letter to minority shareholders last year, Vadim Kleiner, research director for the Hermitage Capital Management fund, said some of the worst mismanagement at Gazprom had ended, but significant inefficiencies and soaring operating costs remained.

"Operating and capital expenditures continue to rise alarmingly, apparently untethered to any notions of fiscal restraint," Mr. Kleiner wrote.

The company, with 330,000 employees on its payroll, has played a critical role not only in economic affairs but in Mr. Putin's political maneuvering.

Gazprom's media arm was used during Mr. Putin's first term to eliminate several critical newspapers and television channels, leading to a near-state monopoly on the airwaves. The Kremlin has wielded it as an instrument of pressure against former Soviet republics, most notably Ukraine, to which it cut gas supplies in an ugly price dispute that led to brief but alarming supply disruptions to Europe.

Gazprom is also the Russian partner in one of the biggest gas development tenders in decades, the 131 trillion-cubic-foot Shtokman field in the Barents Sea. Gazprom last year shortlisted U.S.-based Chevron Corp., ConocoPhillips, Norway's Statoil ASA and Norsk Hydro ASA, and France's Total SA as potential partners. A decision was expected in April, but Gazprom has dragged its feet.

The Kremlin's harshest critics contend that much as in the Yeltsin era, when a class of Kremlin-connected magnates amassed enormous wealth out of state assets, Mr. Putin and his circle are motivated less by patriotism than by the desire to spin power into personal wealth.

Many critics speculate that Mr. Putin himself has his eyes on the helm of the Gazprom behemoth after 2008, when he constitutionally is required to step down from the presidency after two terms.

"His wish is to become a super-oligarch," Mr. Satarov says.

India Test-fires Nuclear-capable Missile (AP)

By Gavin Rabinowitz

AP, July 9, 2006

India test-fired its nuclear-capable Agni III missile Sunday for the first time, the Defense Ministry said.

The launch took place at India's main missile testing center in the eastern state of Orissa, Defense Ministry spokesman Sitanshu Kar told the Associated Press.

The launch of India's longest-range missile, able to fly 1,865 miles, has been viewed as a routine test — not saber-rattling with the country's nuclear-armed archrival and neighbor, Pakistan.

New Delhi and Islamabad regularly test-fire missiles, but normally only give each other prior notice for long-range launches. It was not immediately clear whether India informed Pakistan ahead of Sunday's test.

The missile was launched at 11:03 Indian time and "took off successfully," Kar said. "Details of the flight performance are being analyzed by the mission team."

The missile splashed down near the Nicobar islands in the Bay of Bengal.

Indian Defense Minister Pranab Mukherjee was at the launch complex, on Wheeler Island off Orissa, to witness the test, the Press Trust of India news agency reported.

The Agni III further boosts India's homegrown missile arsenal, which includes the short-range Prithvi ballistic missile, the medium-range Akash, the anti-tank Nag and the supersonic Brahmos missile, developed jointly with Russia.

India Tests Nuclear-capable Missile (AFP)

AFP, July 9, 2006

India successfully carried out its first test of a nuclear-capable ballistic missile with a range of 4,000 kilometres (2,480 miles), defence officials said.

The Agni-III missile was launched on Sunday from Wheeler Island, 180 kilometres northeast of Bhubaneshwar in the eastern state of Orissa, they said on condition of anonymity.

In May Defence Minister Pranab Mukherjee had said the Agni-III, India's longest-range ballistic missile, was ready but that the country was observing "self-imposed restraint" before testing.

Opposition parties criticised the announcement, saying testing was being delayed because of pressure from the United States. New Delhi and Washington reached a landmark deal in March that will see sanctions lifted on India's access to civilian nuclear technology.

Sunday's test launch comes just four days after North Korea sparked an international outcry by test-firing seven missiles.

A highly-placed Defence Research and Development Organisation (DRDO) source said the Indian test was "successful".

He said scientists had detected a snag in the booster rocket system of the Agni-III two weeks ago and had delayed its test. "Now we have papered over the problem and hence the launch window was chosen as Sunday," he said.

The missile was tracked during take-off, re-entry into the Earth's atmosphere and splashdown in the Bay of Bengal, another defence official said.

The Agni (Fire) is one of five missiles being developed by the DRDO under its Integrated Guided Missile Development Programme launched in 1983. The others are the Prithvi, the surface-to-air Trishul (Trident), multi-purpose Akash (Sky), and the anti-tank Nag (Cobra).

DOJ_NMG_0039273

Nuclear rivals India and Pakistan, who have fought three wars since independence in 1947, routinely notify each other of missile tests.

The two countries came to the brink of a fourth war in the summer of 2002 following a December 2001 attack on India's parliament by suspected Pakistan-backed militants. Islamabad denied any role in the attack.

But in January 2004 the two sides began a peace process that has led to a ceasefire in the divided Himalayan state of Kashmir, the cause of two of the wars.

In May 1998, India conducted five nuclear tests citing China as a security threat. The tests were matched two weeks later by Pakistan which India says has received Beijing's assistance for its nuclear programme, a claim denied by China.

But tensions between China and India have abated in the past two years including direct military talks and the reopening last week of a famed Silk Road pass in the Himalayas, the first direct border trade between the Asian giants since a brutal frontier war 44 years ago.

C. Uday Bhaskar, deputy head of the government funded Institute of Defence Studies and Analyses, said India's nuclear and missile programmes should not be seen as country specific.

"Countries acquire strategic capabilities that are generic nature. Our programme is not predicated on a single point threat. It is always in relation to the international strategic environment," Bhaskar said.

Asia Going Nuclear Amid Rising Oil Prices (AP)

By Michael Casey

AP, July 9, 2006

Led by fast-growing China and India, Asia is going nuclear in a big way to feed its ravenous appetite for energy.

The strains of economic growth are already showing. Energy shortages have forced Chinese factories to scale back production, and farmers in India often have power for only half the day. Both countries say their future growth is at risk unless they diversify their energy mix.

So does South Korea, where Yoon Ho-taek scans a construction site the size of 10 football fields in the southeastern city of Ulsan, points to what looks like a partly built amphitheater, and declares: "The future of nuclear power is bright."

South Korea, the world's second biggest coal importer and third biggest oil importer, already depends on nuclear reactors for 40 percent of its power and is talking of increasing that to 60 percent by 2035.

Yoon's company, Korea Hydro and Nuclear Power, is building four reactors and plans four more by 2017. Two of them are 1,000-megawatt reactors going up in Ulsan, lighting as many as 2.4 million homes in South Korea's industrial heartland.

Along with homemade reactors, Asia's plans hold out the promise of a bonanza for American companies such as Westinghouse Electric Co. and General Electric Co. which already have a strong presence in the region. Westinghouse has helped build 14 nuclear plants in South Korea and provided technology for almost half of Japan's 55 nuclear units. GE, meanwhile, has helped build 36 reactors in Japan, India and Taiwan.

"We expect Asia to become a leader in the use of commercial nuclear power," Timothy Collier, president of Westinghouse Korea, told The Associated Press. Asia needs a reliable electricity source, he says, and "Nuclear offers the opportunity to do that free of the dependence on oil."

Eighteen reactors — about 70 percent of the world's total under construction — are going up in Asia, and another 77 are planned or proposed, according to the Nuclear Energy Institute, an industry advocacy group based in Washington, D.C.

Japan depends on nuclear plants for a third of its power and plans to double its nuclear capacity by 2050. Australia wants to build its first plant, and Indonesia has vowed to go nuclear, even though it's vulnerable to earthquakes, floods and landslides.

According to the World Nuclear Association, a group that promotes nuclear energy, China plans to increase its nuclear capacity from 6.6 gigawatts to 40 gigawatts by 2020 with the addition of 30 nuclear plants, mostly in heavily populated, industrialized coastal regions where demand and pollution levels are highest.

India intends to go from just under 3 gigawatts to 20 gigawatts by 2020 with the addition of 31 plants, mostly in the west where much of its heavy industry lies.

India's nuclear industry received a boost in March after it signed a civilian nuclear pact with the U.S. Under the deal awaiting Congressional approval, the United States will give India nuclear technology and fuel in return for India's permission for international inspections and safeguards at 14 reactors.

"Nuclear power has to play an increasing role in our electricity generation plans," Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh told Parliament last year.

"Our desire is to attain energy security to enable us to leapfrog stages of economic development obtained at the least possible cost," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0039274

Greenpeace, the environmental movement, continues to lead the charge against nuclear power, warning that Asian countries about to embrace the atom need to think hard about the potential consequences.

No country in Asia has a permanent site for the estimated 40,000 tons of toxic spent fuel produced so far, according to the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog, which opponents say could become a target for terrorists or end up polluting the groundwater. There is also the fear that nuclear power could become a cover for countries with weapons ambitions such as North Korea.

"We think nuclear energy is inherently unsafe," said Gerd Leipold, executive director of Greenpeace International. "You have the waste problems. You have the accident problems. For all of these reasons, we think countries should invest in renewable energy and energy efficiency."

Many of the biggest concerns revolve around Indonesia, which has said that it will build its first reactor by 2015 on Java — the same island where an earthquake killed more than 5,700 people in May, and where the Mount Merapi volcano is threatening to erupt.

The announcement prompted a warning from the Australian Institute in Canberra that "Although the risks of a major (nuclear) accident are very low, a cloud of radiation blowing over northern Australia would pose a severe danger to public safety."

But with oil prices spiking, and fossil fuel emissions being blamed for global warming, the allure of atomic power is growing worldwide, and the nuclear accidents at Three Mile Island and Chernobyl which set back the industry for a generation are receding from the forefront of public memory.

The United States and Russia are reviving long-dormant nuclear plans while France, which gets 80 percent of its power from nuclear plants, is a leader of the industry's renaissance.

Every 1,000 megawatt reactor, the NEI says, saves 7.9 million barrels of oil or 3.4 million tons of coal a year and eliminates 34,000 tons of polluting sulfur dioxide and 11,000 tons of nitrogen oxide.

China's energy supply leans heavily on coal, says Andy White, president of GE's nuclear division, told AP. "They realize if they are going to play a senior role in the world's economy, they have to do something about the environment ... I think nuclear is the key answer to their portfolio."

Twenty nuclear power plants dot the South Korean countryside and what public reaction there is tends to be mixed. In the 1990s residents demonstrated against the Yonggwang Nuclear Power plant on the southwest coast and vendors still complain they have difficulty marketing their fish and vegetables because of the plant's stigma.

But the area is poor, and some residents say they're more annoyed that it wasn't chosen last year for a permanent nuclear waste site since that would have brought in millions of dollars in government aid.

"Some people are concerned about the dangerous effects of nuclear power," said Kim Byoung-Kwon, a taxi driver. "But to meet our power needs, we need nuclear power. I've got no problem with the plant being near my village. It's become like any other building."

Asia's biggest problem isn't new reactors, but what to do with the spent fuel.

It took South Korea 19 years just to find a burial site for low-level waste such as contaminated clothing and spare reactor parts, and it still has nowhere to dump its 6,500 tons of fuel.

Taiwan, which has three plants and is building a fourth, has been thwarted at every turn in finding a long-term solution for its waste. First it tried North Korea and the Marshall Islands but was blocked by protests. Taiwan has stored 100,000 barrels of nuclear waste on a tiny island but protests from aboriginal group are forcing it move the waste to another site, as yet unchosen, by 2013.

"After nearly 50 years of the nuclear power experiment, nobody has demonstrated a solution to this problem. In the absence of a viable solution, expanding the rate of waste production is just irresponsible," professor Ian Lowe of Griffith University in Brisbane, Australia, wrote in a September report released by a coalition of Australian environmental groups.

Britain, France, Russia and Japan have opted for fuel reprocessing, which can extract plutonium and combine it with uranium to create oxide fuel, or MOX. But the extracted plutonium can be weaponized and is therefore vulnerable to theft for misuse, warns the Union of Concerned Scientists, a U.S. advocacy group.

In Asia, nuclear reactors seem to have their biggest problems in Japan. Nuclear power has always been a tough sell in the only country ever hit by an atomic bomb, and opposition has grown following a series of deadly accidents and shutdowns.

A 1999 reprocessing plant accident outside Tokyo killed two workers and exposed hundreds to radioactivity, while in 2004 five workers were killed at a plant in western Japan in the country's worst nuclear plant accident.

Safety problems have also left its nuclear fuel-cycle program in a shambles. The country's first experimental fast-breeder reactor, Monju, was shut down after more than a ton of volatile liquid sodium leaked from its cooling system in 1995.

"The Japanese public is extremely sensitive toward radioactive materials and there is no doubt that they are very concerned about the incidents," Kyoto University professor Hajimu Yamana said.

"Since any accident of this nature is creepy from the public's perspective, it is only natural that such accidents will undermine the public's support for nuclear power."

Palestinian Prime Minister Calls For A Truce With Israel And New Talks (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

GAZA, July 8 — The Palestinian prime minister from Hamas, Ismail Haniya, on Saturday called for a mutual cease-fire with Israel after Israeli forces pulled out of most of the northern Gaza Strip, perhaps responding to Israeli hints that a package deal might be possible to end a military and political crisis.

Eleven days after Israeli forces entered Gaza to free an abducted Israeli soldier and stop rocket fire by militants, they continued to hold territory in northern Gaza, east of Beit Hanun and the Erez crossing, and in the south, near Rafah. Early Saturday, the military also moved into eastern Gaza near the Karni crossing with Israel, where there were fierce clashes with militants on the eastern edge of Gaza City.

An Israeli official said in response to Mr. Haniya that there would be no cease-fire until the release of the Israeli soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit.

The violence continued Saturday evening, when an Israeli airstrike near Karni killed four Palestinians, including three members of the Hajaj family, who were sitting in their garden. Among the dead were Rawan Hajaj, 6, her brother Muhammad, 20, and their mother, Um Ayman Hajaj. The Israeli Army said it had been aiming at "a cell of armed gunmen" walking in the area and was checking to see whether a missile fired at them might have been responsible.

In fighting earlier in the day, another four Palestinians died, bringing the death toll to at least 44 Palestinians and one Israeli since Thursday. Nearly 20 Palestinians were wounded Saturday, including a 1-year-old, bringing the total of wounded to more than 130, according to Dr. Jumaa al-Saqqa of Al Shifa hospital, Gaza's largest.

In Israel, a cabinet minister, Ophir Pines-Paz of the Labor Party, suggested that the crisis could end through a package deal of the kind that Egypt had been trying to promote — the release of Corporal Shalit, coupled with a more formal cease-fire and an Israeli promise to release a number of Palestinian prisoners as the cease-fire is shown to have taken hold.

"We have a great interest in changing the rules of the game," said Mr. Pines-Paz, who is also a member of Israel's inner security cabinet. "If we reach a situation in which there are no kidnappings, no rockets, no tunnels, no raids into our territory, certainly Israel will have to reciprocate," he told Israel Radio.

On Friday, Avi Dichter, the minister of internal security, said that once the soldier was released, "if Israel will be obliged to in the framework of this agreement, within the calm that will be imposed on the ground by the Palestinian Authority, to release Palestinian prisoners as a gesture to this calm, Israel knows how to do that."

"In fact," he said, "Israel has done it before in the past."

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has ruled out a prisoner trade, and Israel is eager to try to deter kidnappings by showing that it will not bargain for the corporal with his militant captors. But Mr. Olmert had promised to release prisoners to the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, at their first formal summit meeting, Mr. Abbas said Friday. Former Prime Minister Ariel Sharon did something similar when the two leaders met in February 2005.

In his statement, Mr. Haniya said, "In order to get out of the current crisis, it is necessary that all parties restore calm on the basis of mutually stopping all military operations," and he called for the renewal of talks.

His spokesman, Ghazi Hamad, said: "We asked for a mutual cease-fire and a return to the place of calmness. Israeli forces should pull out of the Gaza Strip and stop their aggression."

An Israeli military spokesman said the army's objectives in northern Gaza had been met, even though the number of Qassam rockets hitting Israel had increased, with 14 launched Friday. Capt. Noa Meir said the Israelis "are in an ongoing operation, and we're not ruling out going back into the north again." She said Israel had damaged "the terrorist infrastructure, the rocket-launching infrastructure and put general pressure on the Hamas government to release Corporal Shalit."

The Israelis say they also destroyed Qassam rocket manufacturing sites and storehouses.

Israeli troops moved in through the Karni crossing to look for tunnels and explosives, the army said, with engineering troops supported by armor. Early Saturday morning, the Israelis blew up a tunnel near Karni from the air, Captain Meir said. Later on Saturday, there were some serious clashes with Palestinian militiamen, with exchanges of machine-gun fire and some helicopter-fired missiles.

DOJ_NMG_0039276

Palestinian militants in the area, a Hamas stronghold known as Shijaia, were seen planting explosives along streets and guarding street corners.

Overhead was the steady buzzing of a missile-armed Israeli drone aircraft, which the Palestinians here call the zananah, a made-up word for the aircraft's buzzing sound. Late Saturday, the Israelis pulled back through the crossing.

In Beit Lahiya, the scene of the worst fighting so far, residents cleaned up their houses on Saturday after the Israeli troops departed. The troops began moved out at about 1 a.m. and were mostly back into Israel by 9 a.m. They left behind them broken walls, smashed houses and angry Palestinians.

In the Atatrah neighborhood, Muhammad Erheem, shaken, showed a reporter through his large house on a hill, which 25 Israeli soldiers commandeered on Thursday night before leaving Saturday morning. They locked the 13 members of the Erheem family in a single storeroom, letting them in small groups, under guard, only to use the toilet, Mr. Erheem said.

The troops moved into the compound behind an armored bulldozer that crushed two smaller buildings — a stable and a water pump house — and also killed a number of prize goats, who were buried alive in the sand as the bulldozer passed over.

"I could hear my goats screaming above the noise," Mr. Erheem said. "Then they banged on the door and I opened it, and 10 soldiers came in, very agitated, and ordered me to strip, and one cocked his pistol at me and shouted, 'Where is the weapon?' I speak fluent Hebrew, thank God, and I said I had no weapon and there was no weapon in the house."

The soldiers made holes in the walls to establish sniper positions, he said, and dismantled furniture, propping beds up against walls to help protect them from any incoming fire and "using my house like a hotel."

But Mr. Erheem was shocked that the soldiers brought wine into his house, and that one of them stripped down to his underwear in the heat and walked around that way in front of the women. Mr. Erheem also pointed out a Koran that had been ripped apart and scattered.

His son, Bakr Erheem, 25, had been married five days before, and there was a big party, the house still full of wedding bouquets and unopened gifts. Their wedding bed was dismantled and broken, holes tore through the concrete walls. Outside, his two water-tanker trucks — he had a business selling filtered water — were smashed, their engines pushed into the driver's cab.

Mr. Erheem said one soldier took a gold necklace, and he showed a purse he said had had gold jewelry in it. The soldiers had replaced the gold, he charged, with a gold-colored piece of metal that looked to be part of an antenna.

The Israeli Army said that troops had regulations about requisitioning houses and that it would investigate all allegations of wrongdoing.

Israel Rejects Hamas' Bid For Cease-fire (AP)

By Thomas Wagner

AP, July 9, 2006

The head of the Hamas-led Palestinian government called Saturday for a truce to halt the Israeli offensive in Gaza, but Israel demanded that Hamas first free a captured Israeli soldier and halt rocket attacks on its southern towns.

Israeli troops scaled back their operations to two spots in Gaza as fighting claimed the lives of six Palestinians, raising the death toll to at least 44 since the incursion began last week.

Israeli aircraft targeted militants in western Gaza City early Sunday, firing a missile at them and wounding four, one seriously, Palestinian hospital officials said. The Israeli military had no immediate comment.

Aircraft also fired a missile at a bridge in northern Gaza, collapsing it and knocking out a power transformer serving the town of Beit Hanoun, witnesses said. The military said it hit the bridge to stop militants using it to move rockets.

Israeli troops entered the Gaza Strip on June 28, three days after Hamas militants captured an Israeli soldier during a cross-border raid. Since then Israel has been battering the coastal strip with heavy artillery barrages and airstrikes.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh urged Israel on Saturday to halt the offensive, release Palestinian prisoners and resume indirect talks about the captured soldier through international mediators. But he did not offer to free Cpl. Gilad Shalit, 19.

"We want to activate this initiative to bring the region out of this whirlpool of blood," Haniyeh said while touring Beit Lahiya, the hardest-hit Gaza town.

Hamas often sends out conflicting signals, however, in part because of divisions between its more militant leaders in Syria and more pragmatic politicians in Gaza. Israel has accused the Hamas political chief, Syrian-based Khaled Mashaal, of ordering Shalit's capture.

Aides to Israel Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said he would not accept a truce until Shalit was freed. Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said rocket attacks must also stop first.

The militants have demanded the release of Palestinian prisoners held by Israel in exchange for Shalit.

DOJ_NMG_0039277

Israeli aircraft, intensifying their operations around Gaza City, carried out two strikes Saturday evening in an outlying neighborhood. The military was investigating whether one of the strikes, which it said was aimed at militants, hit a house, killing a mother and two of her children, including a 6-year-old girl. Four other family members were wounded.

The force of the blast tore open one of the house's outer walls. The courtyard outside was stained with blood. The lifeless body of 6-year-old Rawan Hajaj was carried inside a Gaza City hospital, wrapped in a red blanket. Her mother, Amona, and 20-year-old brother Mohammed were also killed, and six other people were wounded.

The United Nations blamed Israel for a burgeoning crisis, including deaths, injuries and harm to children, created by its offensive in Gaza.

"Unless urgent action is taken," a three-page statement released Saturday said, "we are facing a humanitarian crisis that will have far-reaching consequences."

Israel pulled its tanks out of Beit Lahiya, leaving a wide swath of destruction after trying to carve out a buffer zone against rockets there. Tanks driving through narrow streets sheared off outer walls of buildings, tore down electricity poles and chopped up asphalt. Bulldozers churned fields and knocked down trees and greenhouses.

Israeli troops also left nearby Beit Hanoun and three Jewish settlements in northern Gaza that Israel abandoned nearly a year ago when it unilaterally withdrew from the territory.

Palestinian witnesses said Israeli tanks moved into an abandoned Israeli settlement in northern Gaza early Sunday, a day after pulling back.

An Israeli military spokesman denied the claim.

On Sunday morning, Israeli soldiers were in position only at the defunct airport just across from the Israeli border in southern Gaza and in the Gaza City-Karni area, the military said.

Capt. Jacob Dallal, an army spokesman, said troops repositioned Saturday because they had accomplished their objectives in northern Gaza — drawing militants into direct combat.

"We much prefer to engage these people with the army as opposed to having these people fire rockets at schools in Ashkelon and Sderot," he said, referring to two southern Israeli cities that have come under militant rocket fire.

Israelis Withdraw From North Gaza (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

Palestinian Woman, Son, Daughter Killed

BEIT LAHIYA, Gaza Strip, July 8 -- Israeli tanks and bulldozers withdrew from northern Gaza before dawn Saturday after two days of heavy fighting, leaving behind a strip of churned fields, wrecked roads and a few heavily damaged homes.

Along Gaza's eastern border, where more Israeli armor entered the strip very early Saturday, the military stepped up its activity. On Saturday night, an explosion killed a woman and two of her children on the eastern edge of Gaza City.

The cause of the explosion, which left four other children of the Hajaj family wounded, remained unclear. Palestinian witnesses said an Israeli artillery shell struck the family's house, but an Israeli spokesman said the military was investigating whether the house had been hit in an airstrike.

"Without warning, without reason, the shell came into my first floor," Fareed Hajaj, the husband and father of the dead, said outside the morgue at al-Shifa Hospital as he prepared to identify the bodies of his wife and two children inside.

The Israelis' abrupt pullback from the northern end of the Gaza Strip sharply reduced the overall intensity of their military operations in Gaza, which have been aimed at recovering a captured soldier, reducing the Palestinians' steady rocket fire into southern Israel and weakening the radical Hamas movement's hold on the Palestinian government. More than 40 Palestinians, most of them gunmen, and one Israeli soldier have been killed in 11 days of fighting.

Although military officials warned that operations had not ended, Israel's departure from its deepest position inside Gaza may signal the government's desire to pursue talks to win the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, 19, who was taken by Palestinian gunmen in a June 25 raid on an army post just outside Gaza. But it was unclear how the deaths of the Hajaj family members, which drew a crowd to the morgue, would influence developments.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, whose armed wing is one of the groups holding Shalit, issued a statement Saturday calling on both sides to cease military action and to revive talks with Egyptian mediators attempting to broker Shalit's release. The groups holding Shalit have demanded that Israel release some Palestinian prisoners in exchange for his release.

"To get out of the current crisis, it is necessary that all parties restore calm on the basis of mutually stopping all military operations," the statement said.

Israeli officials reiterated the government's unwavering rejection of a prisoner swap. In addition, officials in the office of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said he did not support the suggestion by his public security minister, Avi Dichter, on Friday that an end to the rocket attacks and Shalit's safe release would prompt Israel to free some Palestinian prisoners in the future.

"There will be no cease-fire until the Palestinians return Israel's soldier safe and the firing of rockets is ceased," an Israeli official said Saturday.

Early Saturday, Israeli tanks and bulldozers entered Gaza near the Karni crossing, the main passage for cargo into the strip, in search of cross-border tunnels like the one used by Palestinian gunmen to attack Shalit's post farther south. Hospital officials said two Palestinian gunmen and a local journalist were killed in fighting.

The blast that killed Amna Hajaj, 45, her son Mohammed, 23, and her 6-year-old daughter, Rawan, occurred just after nightfall. Fareed Hajaj said he was standing in the street outside his house in the east Gaza City neighborhood of Shajaiyeh when a blast destroyed much of it.

As friends and relatives sought to console him outside the morgue, Hajaj said Israeli artillery shells had been landing a football field away from his home since the previous day. An Israeli military spokesman said no artillery was being fired near the area when the blast occurred but that an airstrike had targeted suspected Palestinian gunmen in the neighborhood at about the same time.

After several days in which fighting was centered here in the orchards, houses and sandy streets of Atatara, in Beit Lahiya, hundreds of Palestinian residents combed through the damaged neighborhood.

Like the fighting, most of the damage was confined to a swath of dunes, olive and citrus groves and houses roughly a half-mile long and equally wide along this city's western edge. The Israeli military pushed into the area to increase the distance between fields that officials say are used by Palestinian rocket launchers and their targets in southern Israel.

"This is terror," said Hussein Zayed, 28, a member of the Palestinian presidential guard, as he looked over his ravaged home behind a wall where palm, lemon and olive trees uprooted by Israeli bulldozers were being gathered into piles. "Not a single shot was fired from this place."

Dozens of Israeli troops took up positions in houses here as the operation began, including in Zayed's living room. His second story was strewn with the pieces of a shattered television set, sofa cushions and masonry from the blown-out wall that now offers a view of a ruined greenhouse in the courtyard below.

A breeze through the jagged hole slowly pushed a twisted fan dangling from a ceiling pocked with shrapnel marks and bullet holes. The computer Zayed used to pursue an accounting degree at Al-Quds Open University was in pieces, the hens and pigeons he kept in a coop on the first floor gone. The soldiers had left behind only a bag of sandwich rolls.

Itidal al-Ajouri had dashed from her family's apartment during intense fighting Friday afternoon, along with her six children. Her husband, Salah, a colonel in the Palestinian National Forces, was at work at the time and said he could hear gunfire crackling behind her when she phoned him for help.

The family returned Saturday to a picture of devastation: piles of cassette tapes, splintered cabinet doors, clothes hangers and blankets thrown about the previously neat apartment. Bullet holes in the building behind theirs suggested the apartment had been caught in intense crossfire, probably leaving the family with little choice but to find a new place to live.

"We will close this up now and stay somewhere else," said Rasha, who is studying microbiology at Al-Azhar University in Gaza. "What else can we do?"

Gaza Death Toll Mounts As Israel Rejects Ceasefire (AFP)

By Sakher Abu El Oun

AFP, July 9, 2006

Three Palestinian family members, including a six-year-old girl, have been killed in an air strike near Gaza City as Israel rejected a call by Hamas premier Ismail Haniya for a mutual ceasefire.

The girl, her elder brother and her mother were killed in the air raid, which according to an army spokesman targeted a group of militants east of Gaza City.

Despite initial denials, the Israeli army later confirmed carrying out an airstrike in the neighbourhood of Sejayun.

"We are currently examining the exact details of the strike," an army source told AFP.

UN Secretary General Kofi Annan meanwhile demanded immediate access for UN workers and humanitarian relief supplies to the Gaza Strip, saying he was "extremely concerned about the dangerous situation in the occupied Palestinian Territory."

DOJ_NMG_0039279

Four more Palestinians were killed earlier as Israeli forces shifted the focus of their Gaza campaign to end militant rocket fire and free a captured soldier to the seaside strip's eastern frontier.

As Israel pushed on into Gaza, officials brushed aside Haniya's call for a "return to a situation of calm on the basis of a halt to all military operations by both sides".

"We do not hold negotiations with terrorists. They must first return the kidnapped soldier unharmed and cease their fire," an official in Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's office told AFP.

"We will decide on our next moves according to the steps taken by the Palestinian government," he said, asking not to be named.

Haniya stressed that his Hamas government was determined to solve the problem through diplomatic channels in a "peaceful" manner.

"It is necessary that Israel halt its military operation in the Gaza Strip and withdraw its forces," said a statement from Haniya.

"More efforts are required from all parties to resolve the current crisis in order to bring an end to the Israeli aggression and resolve the question of the Israeli soldier through serious negotiations," it added.

A Hamas spokesman slammed Israel for brushing aside the Hamas ceasefire offer.

"The Israeli rejection is wrong," said Ghazi Hamad. "This initiative must be seized on in order to find a suitable solution."

Earlier, dozens of Israeli tanks backed by helicopter gunships and drones passed through the Karni and Nahal Oz crossings, advancing one kilometer (half a mile) to the outskirts of Gaza City where clashes broke out.

Armored vehicles fired missiles, killing a member of the Palestinian security forces in Zeitun, while three more Palestinians were reported killed by Israeli tank shelling in the nearby Shujaya neighborhood.

Israeli armored vehicles took up positions in open farmland on Gaza's eastern border and assembled in industrial areas.

Israeli units meanwhile pulled back from northern Gaza, three days after launching a deadly incursion in the area, Israeli and Palestinian sources said.

On Thursday, Israel sent troops deep into the northern Gaza Strip, occupying a buffer zone in the territory from which it withdrew last September.

Israel has vowed to use everything in its power to increase the pressure on the embattled Hamas-led government to free 19-year-old Corporal Gilad Shalit and to stop rocket attacks.

Another Hamas militant died from wounds suffered during a gunfight with Israeli forces Thursday.

Forty Palestinians and one Israeli soldier have been killed since Israel launched its massive military operation in Gaza late Wednesday.

As efforts to reach a breakthrough in the crisis stalled, Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas left the Gaza Strip for the first time in two weeks to travel to his home in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

He has called on the international community to stop Israel's "inhumane aggression" to give mediators a chance to free Shalit.

UN chief Annan has called for an immediate halt to what he called Israel's "disproportionate use of force" but added that Palestinian militants should nonetheless release the captured soldier.

He said in Saturday's statement: "The passage of foodstuffs and other essential supplies through the Karni commercial crossing should be ensured and restrictions on movement and access for UN agencies should be lifted forthwith.

"I am appealing for urgent action to alleviate the desperate humanitarian situation of the civilian population."

Annan noted that Israeli airstrikes on Gaza's only power plant have impacted Gaza's hospitals, flour mills, water and sanitation systems, and called for the Israeli government to "act expeditiously" to replace the destroyed equipment.

Hamas -- whose government offices have been targets of Israeli missile strikes -- warned that the assault was complicating the fate of Shalit, who it said was being well looked-after.

"Soldier Gilad is being well treated, in a humane manner in keeping with the values of our religion," said the movement, whose armed wing claimed joint responsibility for the June 25 attack in which Shalit was seized.

"Continued Zionist crimes will only harden the Palestinian side even more," it warned.

Calls For Truce Fuel Hope In Gaza Standoff (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

Both sides appear to be open to a larger accord that would give them room to maneuver.

DOJ_NMG_0039280

GAZA CITY — Both Israel and the Hamas-led Palestinian government expressed hope Saturday of arranging a cease-fire to end their bloody 2-week-old confrontation over the capture of an Israeli soldier.

Israeli troops and armor also pulled back from a swath of northern Gaza they had held for two days, though military commanders warned that they could reenter the area at any time to quell rocket fire by Palestinian militants. Israeli forces remained dug in at a disused airport in the southern Gaza Strip.

Early today, Israeli airstrikes targeted a bridge in northern Gaza, an area in southern Gaza described by the army as a training camp for militants, and a group of gunmen near the main commercial crossing at Karni. Several Palestinians were reported injured.

The calls for a cease-fire came from Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, a senior Hamas official, and an Israeli Cabinet minister, Ophir Pines-Paz, who raised the possibility of a comprehensive accord that would free the captive and halt rocket attacks.

It was the second consecutive day that a senior Israeli official had spoken publicly of the prospect of a compromise in the standoff over the soldier, 19-year-old Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who was seized June 25 in a cross-border raid.

Both sides have powerful incentives for finding a negotiated solution, but serious obstacles remain to any agreement. With thousands of Israeli troops and heavily armed Palestinian guerrillas in close proximity to densely populated areas of Gaza, conflict could flare again at any moment.

And if the young soldier is killed by his captors, Israel almost certainly will unleash a prolonged and punishing onslaught. Israeli officials say they believe he is alive and unharmed except for minor injuries suffered during the raid, in which two other Israeli soldiers were killed.

Although Israel appears to be dropping its insistence that it will not trade Palestinian prisoners for Shalit, the government of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Saturday that the soldier's safe return must precede any concessions. A day earlier, Cabinet minister Avi Dichter had spoken of freeing prisoners as a "reciprocal gesture" if Shalit's captors released him.

One major question is whether Haniyeh has the clout to force militant factions who hold Shalit — and who are thought to answer primarily to the Islamist group's exiled leadership in Damascus, the Syrian capital — to agree to any deal.

Haniyeh's statement, issued through government spokesman Ghazi Hamad, was vaguely worded but appeared to hold out the prospect that militants would halt their rocket fire if Israel withdrew its troops.

"If we want to get out of the current crisis, it is necessary to return to calm, on the basis of a mutual halt to all military operations," the statement said.

The Hamas government, already broke and diplomatically isolated, has been under increasing pressure since the capture of Shalit. Israel has bombed Haniyeh's office and a key ministry building and threatened to assassinate senior figures in the government.

But in the course of the fighting, Hamas' street following has appeared to be as strong as ever, if not stronger.

Framing a prisoner swap in the context of some larger accord could offer a face-saving way out for both Olmert's and Haniyeh's governments. Hamas is unlikely to defy Palestinian street sentiment and release the soldier without some gains to point to. Olmert would need to somehow justify an about-face in his unequivocal declarations that no prisoners would be freed.

There has been no direct diplomatic contact between the two sides. Mediation is being carried out primarily by Egypt.

Pines-Paz, a member of Olmert's "security Cabinet" of senior advisors, suggested Saturday that Israel was interested in "changing the rules of the game" in Gaza.

"If we reach a situation in which there are no kidnappings, no rockets, no tunnels, no raids into our territory, certainly Israel will have to reciprocate," Pines-Paz told Israel Radio.

Fighting during Israel's 11-day-old offensive reached a peak Thursday. Twenty-six Palestinians were killed that day or died later of wounds, and an Israeli soldier was also killed.

There were scattered exchanges of fire Saturday between Israeli troops and Palestinian gunmen, including an early-morning confrontation in the Shajaiya neighborhood on the outskirts of Gaza City that left three Palestinians dead. It was the first time during the incursion that a clash had taken place so close to the territory's main metropolis.

At nightfall, an explosion rocked a house in Shajaiya, and Palestinian medics said a father and his young daughter were killed.

However, the Israeli military said there was no artillery or tank fire in the area at the time.

The army said it launched an airstrike Saturday evening near Karni, which is near Shajaiya, a longtime Hamas stronghold. But a spokesman said the strike took place in an open area, not the neighborhood itself.

In the northern village of Beit Lahiya, the scene of Thursday's fiercest fighting, departing Israeli troops left behind a landscape of shell-pocked buildings, toppled power poles and streets chewed up by tank treads.

DOJ_NMG_0039281

Many Palestinians who huddled in their homes for two days emerged blinking and shaken to survey the damage inflicted by airstrikes, artillery barrages and firefights.

"My kids were so frightened the entire time that they wet their beds and vomited — we simply couldn't comfort them," said Bassam Kanwa, 30.

Even with a relative lull in fighting, which coincided with the Jewish Sabbath, Gaza remained so dangerous that U.S. officials sought to ensure that American citizens could leave the territory if they wished.

Gaza is effectively sealed off, but U.S. consular officials Saturday arranged for a convoy to evacuate 65 American citizens, most of them Palestinians holding dual nationality.

Rockets Create A 'Balance Of Fear' With Israel, Gaza Residents Say (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

JERUSALEM, July 8 — The pattern has recurred time and again for several years: Palestinians fire rockets from northern Gaza that cause damage or casualties only occasionally, yet prompt a tough Israeli response, like the offensive now under way.

Why, then, do the Palestinians persist in firing the crude, inaccurate rockets when there is virtual certainty that the damage they inflict will be far less than the punishment they will suffer?

Palestinians in Gaza offer a host of reasons, all based on the emotion of the conflict rather than the logic of warfare.

"We know we can't achieve military equality," said Salah Bardawil, a Palestinian legislator who serves as spokesman for the Hamas faction in parliament. "But when a person suffers huge pain he has to respond somehow. This is how we defend ourselves. This is how we tell the world we are here."

Palestinians often talk about their rockets and suicide bombings creating a "balance of fear" with Israel, even if they cannot match Israel's weaponry.

"Why should we be the only ones who live in fear?" said Muhammad Abu Oukal, a student at the Islamic University in Gaza City. "With these rockets, the Israelis feel fear, too. We will have to live in peace together, or live in fear together."

Palestinians also see the rockets as retaliation for Israeli airstrikes, or an act of solidarity with West Bank Palestinians when fighting heats up on that front.

Israel, meanwhile, describes the rocket attacks as terrorism and argues that any rationale for firing the rockets evaporated when the government withdrew its soldiers and settlers from Gaza last summer.

"We left Gaza," Brig. Gen. Ido Nehushtan said. "There can be no possible justification for launching these rockets, and we cannot tolerate a situation where they are being fired at our citizens every day."

Since Israel made a push into northern Gaza on Thursday, at least 40 Palestinians and one Israeli soldier have been killed. The Palestinians have fired more than 25 rockets. Only one resulted in injuries, lightly wounding three people in Sderot on Friday. Several misfired so badly that they came down in Gaza, and one splashed in the Mediterranean, the Israeli military said.

"These rockets are all improvised and are not accurate, but they are still lethal," General Nehushtan said.

Palestinians in Gaza fired several thousand mortar shells and rockets from 2001 to 2005, killing 12 Israelis — 8 of them in Israel and 4 in Gaza, the Israeli military said.

Since the Israeli withdrawal from Gaza, the Palestinians have fired about 700 rockets at southern Israel, causing injuries and damage, but no deaths.

Palestinians fire most of the rockets in and around two northern Gaza farming towns, Beit Hanun and Beit Lahiya, which in turn have been hardest hit by the Israeli attacks.

Many residents belong to households that prospered from lemon and orange groves in their families for generations. In contrast, the militants firing the rockets tend to come from the slums in and around Gaza City, several miles to the south. The citrus groves allowed the militants to get close enough to the border to reach targets in Israel, and the endless rows of trees provided cover.

When Israeli forces began bulldozing the citrus groves several years ago, some Palestinian residents in the towns confronted the militants and even fought with them when they came to launch rockets.

"But when we see this Israeli escalation, I think that any means of resistance is justified," said Said al-Masri, a 38-year-old engineer from Beit Hanun.

Today, with tensions boiling over, support for the rockets is widespread in the northern towns, even if it means local communities will endure another heavy assault from the Israelis.

Khadija Abu Odah, a 57-year-old Beit Hanun resident, said her home was destroyed during an Israeli attack two years ago, and now, "we have nothing to lose."

DOJ_NMG_0039282

"I hope we can build rockets to hit Tel Aviv."

"Why did the Israelis destroy my house?" she said. "My family didn't shoot any rockets."

She said militants previously fired rockets from the areas around her home, though she said she could do nothing to stop it. Today, she said, the rockets can reach Israel from farther away, and the militants do not need to come to her area, which is relatively close to the border.

The militant Islamic faction Hamas raised the stakes considerably when it fired three rockets on Tuesday and Wednesday that traveled farther than usual, reaching the coastal city of Ashkelon, about six miles beyond Gaza's border.

Israel is thinly populated in the region, and the primary target for the Palestinian rockets has been Sderot, a poor town of about 30,000 that is barely a mile beyond Gaza's perimeter fence and well within the range of the Qassams, which can travel about five miles.

The Palestinians had been trying, with only limited success, to increase the range of the rockets and had been hitting the outskirts of Ashkelon recently.

On Tuesday, a rocket with two engines instead of the usual one traveled about 7.5 miles and landed in the center of the city, hitting a deserted high school. It appeared to have been fired from Dugit, a Jewish settlement on Gaza's border that was evacuated last year, the military said. Ashkelon is one of Israel's larger cities, with about 120,000 residents, increasing the likelihood that a rocket could cause many casualties.

The Palestinians have not yet fired any rockets from the West Bank — a development that would cause even greater alarm in Israel because they could be launched within a few miles of several main cities.

The president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, has sharply criticized the Palestinian rocket fire as counterproductive. He has tried to persuade the militants to hold their fire, though he has never made a concerted push with the Palestinian security forces. Even Hamas, which initiated the rocket campaign in 2001, largely held its fire after agreeing to a truce early last year.

But Hamas has shared its technology and rockets with other factions, which now have their own rockets, and within days of Israel's departure from Gaza last summer, the factions resumed the shelling of Israel.

The Hamas-led government has not sought to stop the rockets, and Hamas recently resumed its own attacks after Israeli airstrikes in Gaza that killed many militants and civilians.

Last month, the Israeli security forces killed 42 Palestinians, including 24 who were not involved in the fighting, according to B'Tselem, an Israeli human rights group. Most of the deaths were in Gaza. Three Israelis were killed in June, two of them soldiers and one a civilian.

Lopez Obrador's Allegations and Plans for Legal Challenge Fire Up Supporters at Rally

MEXICO CITY, July 8 -- Downtown Mexico City swelled Saturday with the accumulated frustration and rage of the poor, who were stoked into a sign-waving, fist-pumping frenzy by new fraud allegations that failed populist candidate Andrés Manuel López Obrador hopes will overturn the results of Mexico's presidential election.

López Obrador ignited the smoldering emotions of his followers Saturday morning, alleging for the first time that Mexico's electoral commission had rigged its computers before the July 2 election to ensure the half-percentage-point victory of Felipe Calderón, a champion of free trade. In a news conference before the rally, López Obrador called Calderón "an employee" of Mexico's powerful upper classes and said a victory by his conservative opponent would be "morally impossible."

López Obrador added a new layer of complexity to the crisis by saying he not only would challenge the results in the country's special elections court but also would attempt to have the election declared illegal by Mexico's Supreme Court. That strategy presages a constitutional confrontation because according to many legal experts the special elections court is the only body that can hear election challenges.

Calderón was declared the winner Thursday and has begun publicly presenting his plans for Mexico, even though López Obrador has refused to concede. European Union election observers have said they found no significant irregularities in the vote, and many Mexicans appeared to accept Calderón as their next president.

López Obrador's approach pairs legal maneuvers with mass public pressure. On Saturday, he gave a mega-display of street power, drawing an estimated 280,000 people into the city center on a humid, drizzly afternoon, according to a Mexico City government estimate.

DOJ_NMG_0039283

The crowd chanted, "Strong, strong!" when López Obrador stepped to the microphone. The former Mexico City mayor then declared that the electoral commission had "played with the hopes" of millions of Mexicans by allegedly rigging the vote total. Thousands chanted back: "You are not alone!"

López Obrador also told the crowd that he was organizing a march to the capital Wednesday from all over Mexico, including states hundreds of miles distant.

"This is, and will continue to be, a peaceful movement," he said. Seconds later, he announced another mass rally, this one for July 16, at which the crowd raucously yelled back: "What time?"

During his 40-minute address, López Obrador stressed Mexico's class divide, accusing "powerful interests" of trying to deny democratic freedoms to "us, the poor." The crowd, which spilled into side streets off the square and may have been the largest of the presidential campaign, chanted, "Presidente, Presidente!"

Blaring kazoos competed with the thump and boom of massive speakers blasting salsa rhythms and a Spanish-language homage to López Obrador set to the tune of the American pop song, "Love Is in the Air."

López Obrador had called his followers into the large downtown square, the Zocalo, the backdrop for generations of Mexican revolutionary fervor, to lay out his long-shot case for overturning Calderón's apparent presidential victory. But he got more than that: He got a moment of mass catharsis, an outrageously loud, communal venting.

"The Mexican people are awakening," said Martín García Trujillo, a farm laborer from the state of Michoacan who had left at midnight for the six-hour bus ride to the capital. "We know Andrés Manuel won. They just won't let it happen. We can't take this anymore."

López Obrador wants a vote-by-vote count, which would require opening sealed vote packets from more than 130,000 polling stations. Electoral commission officials have sided with Calderón's strategists, who argue that the law does not allow for the packets to be opened unless tally sheets attached to the packets appear to have been altered. López Obrador said that only 2,600 vote packets were opened Tuesday and Wednesday during a marathon official count, which shrank Calderón's lead from 400,000 votes after a preliminary vote to 230,000.

Thousands of López Obrador's supporters, many of whom had marched across the city for hours, chanted "Voto por voto, casilla por casilla" -- vote by vote, polling place by polling place -- as they streamed into the Zocalo on Saturday. Many entered the square waving the yellow flags of López Obrador's Democratic Revolutionary Party, or PRD.

Street vendors hawked T-shirts bearing the now-ubiquitous cartoon depiction of López Obrador's face next to the word "Smile." Speakers screamed, "Vote by vote!" as their images flickered across a huge screen suspended above the stage.

x "They stole this from us," said Concepción Myen, 68, a lifelong Mexico City resident who is unemployed. "This is the worst thing that can happen to Mexico."x

Myen personifies the López Obrador target voter. She is a senior citizen and said she had looked forward to the monthly pensions López Obrador promised. She is also a single mother, who struggled to raise her child alone, and said her life would have been much better if the aid program López Obrador had vowed to give single mothers had existed when she needed it.

The anger on display in the square grows from decades of perceived indignities and a sense of persecution by a succession of ruling parties. García Trujillo, the farm worker from Michoacan, recalled feeling the same anguish in 1988 when the PRD candidate, Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas, lost a presidential race that many international observers have said was stolen by the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI. He said he felt the same rage two years ago when outgoing President Vicente Fox's administration unsuccessfully attempted to impeach López Obrador, who was then the mayor of Mexico City.

Now García Trujillo's anger is directed at another institutional power, Mexico's Federal Electoral Institute, which has a stellar international reputation but is accused by López Obrador of "manipulating" the results.

The electoral institute will cede control of the election to Mexico's special elections court, which has until Sept. 6 to decide whether to certify the results. Calderón has not waited for the elections court, and neither have world leaders. He accepted congratulatory calls on Friday from President Bush and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. But López Obrador cautioned against such formalities, saying, "Right now, there is no president-elect."

After López Obrador left the stage Saturday, the crowd lingered. Someone started singing the national anthem, and countless voices joined in its rallying cry: "Mexicans, to the shout of war!"

Leftist Predicts Unrest Without Complete Recount Of Mexican Election (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr. And Ginger Thompson

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0039284

MEXICO CITY, July 8 — While the announced winner of last Sunday's presidential election, Felipe Calderón, kept a low profile on Saturday, his leftist rival led a rally of at least 150,000 people, charged the polling had been marred by fraud and suggested there would be civil unrest without a vote-by-vote recount.

"If there is not democracy, there will be instability," said the rival, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, at a news conference just hours before he addressed his angry and defiant supporters in Mexico City's central plaza.

At 5:50 p.m., he took the stage in the Zócalo, the historic central square in front of the National Palace, to fire a broadside at what he described as an oligarchy of top-level politicians and businessmen.

"We are aware we are confronting a powerful group, economically and politically, that are accustomed to winning at all costs, without moral scruples," he told the crowd. He maintained that this group had "conspired against democracy" and that "they are the ones who now want to put a servant in the presidency."

Mr. López Obrador called on his supporters to march Wednesday from every electoral district in the country to the capital, an echo of his 1994 march from Tabasco to the capital to protest his defeat in the governor's race.

"Let it be clear, " he said. "This is a peaceful movement, and we will never fall for the provocations of our adversaries."

Mr. Calderón, of the conservative National Action Party, effectively ceded the day's spotlight to Mr. López Obrador. After he was announced the victor on Thursday by a narrow margin of 243,000 votes, he had begun to give hints about how he would approach issues like trade, globalization and dealings with the United States on immigration. And on Friday he kept a whirlwind schedule of meetings and appearances.

But on Saturday, Mr. Calderón, the former energy minister, stayed out of the public eye.

Mr. López Obrador, the former Mexico City mayor and firebrand leader of the leftist Democratic Revolutionary Party, spent the day laying out his arguments for a recount and revving up his followers.

He said his opponent's supporters had resorted to fraud and vote-buying in northern states where the conservative party is dominant, like Jalisco and Guanajuato. He also said he had been the victim of a smear campaign on television and radio that far exceeded campaign spending limits.

He said that the Federal Electoral Institute should have recounted Sunday's ballots during the official tally. He pointed out that mistakes favoring Mr. Calderón were found in about 2,600 cases where officials did recount votes, when tally sheets were missing or contained errors.

He said he would present a case for recounting the votes to the Federal Electoral Tribunal on Sunday, and that he would also challenge the validity of the election before the Supreme Court, arguing that President Vicente Fox had interfered with it.

Later, he took his case to the people. Tens of thousands of angry and defiant people wearing his party's yellow colors and carrying banners and flags gathered in the Zócalo throughout the afternoon. They were young and old, unemployed and professional, dark-skinned and light-skinned, and they had traveled from places as far as the states of Michoacán and Tabasco.

Mr. López Obrador spoke for about 40 minutes, calling his adversaries traitors to democracy. The crowd chanted, "You are not alone."

Gloria Aceves, 63, had been waiting next to the stage since 9 a.m. Her husband died trying to cross the Rio Grande into the United States, she said, and she depends on a monthly grant from the city established by Mr. López Obrador, who championed the poor in his campaign. "If I have to die here," she said, "here I will die supporting him."

At his Saturday news conference, Mr. López Obrador declined to answer several times when asked what he would do if the courts refused a recount, saying he had faith the judges would order one. "Peace is the fruit of justice," he said.

"What are they afraid of?" he asked. "What is it they don't want to open the packets and count them again?" He added: "Why the hurry if we are talking about such a fundamental issue?"

On Friday afternoon, Mr. Calderón seemed confident that no legal challenge would stand up in court.

"My triumph is clear and definitive," he told a meeting of foreign reporters. "There are no legal elements that sustain the possibility of a complaint. In this election, the votes have already been counted, vote by vote, at the time they should have been counted, at the closing of the polls, as happens in all the world."

Mr. Calderón's campaign cited the volatile protests Mr. López Obrador led after his 1994 loss in arguing that he could be a danger to Mexico. And several political analysts have said that Mr. López Obrador's behavior since Thursday has proven Mr. Calderón right.

"What marks López Obrador's attitude is not the construction of democracy, nor the consolidation of his own political force, but an evident ambition for personal power," wrote Jorge Fernández Menéndez, an investigative journalist and political commentator. "If it was said that López Obrador was messianic, he is confirming it with each one of his acts since Sunday."

At the same time, in the daily newspaper Excelsior, José Antonio Crespo wrote in favor of a recount.

DOJ_NMG_0039285

"If I were Felipe Calderón, I would try to legitimize my electoral victory," he wrote, to rob Mr. López Obrador's party of "its arguments for questioning my victory, narrow, but genuine."

After the results were announced on Thursday, Mr. Calderón and some of his aides began publicly addressing some policy issues. Arturo Sarukhan, a foreign policy adviser to Mr. Calderón, said Mr. Calderón intended to put Mexico at the center of the region's debate over globalization.

"We will lead the debate on how Latin America will keep competitive in the world, how to keep it from losing ground to Asia," Mr. Sarukhan said. "We have to figure out how to demonstrate to our societies that free markets, transparency and democracy really can deliver the goods for all."

Mr. Calderón would seem a certain ally for the United States, and political analysts have suggested that a Calderón presidency could signal an end to the advance of left-wing politics across Latin America, as neoliberal economic policies from Washington have fallen from favor.

On Friday, he said he would not seek to renegotiate agricultural clauses of the North American Free Trade Agreement, and that he would urge the United States and Canada to join with Mexico to create a fund for the construction of infrastructure and other development projects to generate jobs in high-migration states in Mexico.

"The solution to migration is not walls," Mr. Calderón said. "The only real solution to stop or slow the migration phenomenon is the generation of good-paying jobs."

Mr. López Obrador said that Mr. Calderón was wrong to begin assuming the role of president-elect before the results of last Sunday's contests had been upheld in court. And he objected to the congratulatory messages that had been sent to Mr. Calderón from the United States, Spain and Canada.

He said it was all part of a strategy by Mr. Calderón to end a process that was not yet over.

"They want to turn the page, but things are not that way," Mr. López Obrador said. "This is just started."

Ex-President Wins Genocide Ruling

MEXICO CITY, July 8 (AP) — Genocide charges were dropped against former President Luis Echeverría on Saturday when a judge ruled that the statute of limitations had expired, his lawyer said.

The lawyer, Juan Velazquez, said that the federal judge had overturned a June 30 house arrest order on the charges, which stemmed from a 1968 student massacre.

The decision was the latest blow to prosecutors' efforts to charge the Mr. Echeverría, 84,with the deaths and disappearances of dozens of students and leftist dissidents in the late 1960's and early 1970's, a period known here as the dirty war.

Mexico's Runner-Up Remains Unbowed (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

MEXICO CITY — About a quarter of a million people chanting "Fraud! Fraud!" jammed Mexico City's central square Saturday to back leftist presidential candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador's bid to overturn his narrow electoral defeat with court appeals and mass marches.

Lopez Obrador told the rowdy but peaceful crowd that he would present allegations of fraudulent vote tallies to the Federal Electoral Tribunal before tonight's deadline and demand a recount. He called for nationwide marches that would converge on Mexico City for another rally July 16 as the seven-judge panel weighed his appeal.

"There is convincing evidence that they took votes away from us," Lopez Obrador said. "We are certain that we won on July 2, and we are going to defend our victory."

Many in the crowd said they were ready for a fight if Lopez Obrador did not prevail. "To the death!" shouted Maria Irene Ramirez, a 53-year-old retired railroad worker from Hidalgo state.

Saturday's huge gathering, summoned on two days' notice, marks a critical point in what has been a peaceful challenge to the official result of the election, which gave governing-party candidate Felipe Calderon a winning margin of 244,000 votes out of 41 million cast.

Lopez Obrador, a fiery populist, has made a career of organizing mass demonstrations, several of which turned violent in the 1990s. That legacy and the tone of his statements last week have fed concern that the former Mexico City mayor could destabilize the country, undermining democratic institutions just six years after Mexico's emergence from decades of one-party rule.

But Saturday, he stopped short of calling for civil disobedience, eliciting groans from demonstrators when he asked them not to block highways.

"This is a peaceful movement, and we are never going to allow ourselves to be provoked by our adversaries," he said. "We have enough strength to validate our democracy using only peaceful demonstrations."

The crowd filled the Zocalo, the vast downtown square, and spilled into surrounding streets.

Mexico City police, subordinate to a government run by Lopez Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party, estimated the crowd at 280,000 people. Notimex, the semiofficial news agency of the conservative-led federal government, said slightly more than 200,000 people were there.

The challenger's party, known as the PRD, bused in loyalists from around the country. Organizers said they came from 18 states, some as far as Chiapas, on Mexico's southern border, and Southern Baja California.

They turned the Zocalo into a sea of yellow party flags and banners with slogans such as "No solution means revolution." They blew noisemakers, set off fireworks and sang the national anthem. One group carried a giant abacus, illustrating the demand, chanted incessantly by the crowd, for a recount — "vote by vote, poll by poll."

Carmen Garcia, 38, a Puebla homemaker, was defiant.

"We're not going to let them take it away from him," she said. "We're going to fight with everything against all who don't want him in power. He will be our next president, whether they like it or not."

Most political analysts say Lopez Obrador's campaign faces an uphill battle.

The European Union, which monitored the vote, has said it found no evidence of major fraud or irregularity in the preliminary count July 2 or in the official count that ended Thursday.

Calderon, the candidate of President Vicente Fox's National Action Party, said Friday that he was not worried about a legal challenge to the election because irregularities found in the initial count were minor. He said he opposed a full recount.

Lopez Obrador was hedging his bets. Meeting with foreign journalists Saturday before the rally, he said his party planned to file a separate appeal to the Supreme Court later alleging that the entire election was unfair.

Top aides to Lopez Obrador called Friday for a recount of nearly half of the votes cast.

Officially, Calderon cannot be declared president-elect until the electoral tribunal decides his case. It has until Sept. 6 to declare a winner.

Lopez Obrador ridiculed his rival for acting like a president-elect, and rebuffed Calderon's offer to join a unity Cabinet. He called Calderon "an employee" of Mexico's upper classes and said a victory by his opponent would be "morally impossible."

"It's illogical, therefore, that there could be any agreement with him," he told journalists.

Later, at the rally, the challenger spoke confidently and forcefully. Wearing a dark suit and yellow tie, he addressed the crowd from a raised platform after being introduced by a party leader as "the only one who deserves to be called president."

Anticipating the case to be filed in the Supreme Court, Lopez Obrador called the Federal Electoral Institute, which conducted and counted the vote, "a battering ram" for Calderon. He alleged that the ruling party candidate was allowed to defame him in TV ads, exceed the legal limit for campaign spending and tap government funds for the campaign.

And he denounced Fox, Mexico's first freely elected president, as "a traitor to democracy" for campaigning, in violation of the country's norms, on Calderon's behalf.

Lopez Obrador's speech was frequently interrupted by applause and chants of "You are not alone!"

The militancy of the crowd suggested that Lopez Obrador could sustain his movement at least until a ruling by the tribunal.

Last year, facing a legal challenge to keep Lopez Obrador off the presidential ballot, the PRD built a nationwide grass-roots network that mobilized for weeks of protest, culminating in a rally that filled the Zocalo in April 2005. The legal challenge failed, and the network evolved into a campaign organization that now serves as the engine of Lopez Obrador's protest movement.

The leftist leader proposed that his followers gather at 300 district vote-counting offices around the country Wednesday and begin marching to Mexico City. He urged everyone in the Zocalo on Saturday to bring 10 more people with them.

"Do you approve of this proposal?" he asked. The crowd roared in agreement.

Despite the potency of his protest movement, its long-term staying power is uncertain. Nor is it clear whether Lopez Obrador would continue to send his supporters into the streets if he lost his case in the tribunal.

Under questioning by foreign journalists, he said he was confident of prevailing in the tribunal, but declined eight times to say what he would do if he did not. Asked whether the tribunal was a fair and respectable body, he said, "That's what I wish, but it remains to be seen."

As for the risk that his protests will unsettle the country, he said it was the government that created an atmosphere of instability by having supported what he called an unfair election.

"If there is no democracy, there can be no stability," he said.

Political analysts said Lopez Obrador must walk a tightrope as he decides how far to push the protests.

DOJ_NMG_0039287

If they turn violent, he could undermine the legitimacy of his party, which doubled its percentage of the national vote, enlarged its bloc in Congress and kept control of Mexico City. But if he concedes the election without a fight, he will risk losing support within his party. He is 52 and conceivably could run for president again.

"The PRD was born as a protest movement against electoral fraud, and he has to honor its culture of fighting to the end," said Juan E. Pardinas of the Center of Research for Development. "But if it wants to win a bigger share of the vote next time, the party has to move to the center."

Mexican Tells Crowd He'll Seek Recount (AP)

By Mark Stevenson

AP, July 9, 2006

Leftist presidential candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador called on a huge crowd of supporters Saturday to keep peacefully protesting as he goes to court to challenge what he called his fraudulent electoral defeat.

The fiery former Mexico City mayor said he would present fraud allegations to Mexico's electoral court on Sunday and formally request that all 41 million votes be recounted.

The ruling party's Felipe Calderon can't be declared president-elect until the electoral court weighs allegations of fraud or unfair campaign practices. The court has until Sept. 6 to declare a winner.

"We are going to ask that they clean up the elections. We are going to ask that they count all the votes, vote-by-vote, poll-by-poll," Lopez Obrador said, calling on the army to protect the integrity of every ballot box.

Election monitors from the European Union said they found no irregularities in the count. Calderon says the vote was clean and has taken congratulatory phone calls from President Bush and the leaders of Canada, Spain and Colombia, among others, despite Lopez Obrador's plea for foreign governments to hold off on recognizing the result.

Lopez Obrador called for nationwide marches beginning Wednesday and converging on Mexico City for a July 16 rally.

He provoked groans of disappointment when he told the crowd of more than 100,000 packing Mexico City's central plaza not to block highways during the marches.

"This has been and goes on being a peaceful movement," he said. "We are not going to fall for any provocations."

The likelihood of continuing demonstrations suggests how difficult it will be for Calderon to unify Mexicans, many of whom believe the nation has yet to overcome the decades of institutional corruption and fraud that kept its leaders in power.

Lopez Obrador has repeatedly evaded questions about whether he would accept court decisions that go against him.

Lopez Obrador took direct aim at President Vicente Fox, accusing him of conspiring with Mexico's autonomous elections agency, known as IFE, to engineer a Calderon victory.

Election officials say Calderon, of Fox's National Action Party, beat Lopez Obrador by less than 244,000 votes out of 41 million ballots — or a margin of about 0.6 percent.

Lopez Obrador said Fox had betrayed the Mexicans whose outrage over repeated election fraud swept him into power in 2000 after 71 years of single-party rule by the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI.

"He dedicated himself to attacking us and ended up being a complete traitor of democracy," Lopez Obrador said. "And if that weren't enough, the IFE, which should act with impartiality, turned into the pawn of the party of the right."

Evoking a computer crash that flipped Mexico's 1988 elections in the PRI's favor, he claimed the government used a computer program to intentionally skew initial reports of vote counts.

Lopez Obrador has millions of devoted followers who believe only he can help Mexico's poor and downtrodden. Most of his supporters come from Mexico City and poor southern states, while Calderon's strength is in Mexico's industrialized north.

Lopez Obrador claims a manual recount would confirm that hundreds of thousands of votes for him remain uncounted, miscounted or voided. The law allows such a recount only for specific polling places where credible evidence of irregularities exist. The leftist's supporters say that applies to at least 50,000 of the approximately 130,000 polling places.

The crowd in Mexico City's famed Zocalo plaza would accept nothing less than victory.

"We are never going to recognize this man (Calderon)," said Apolinario Fernandez, 37, a teacher from Lopez Obrador's home state of Tabasco in the southeast. "If he wants, let him govern in the north for the rich, but not in the south."

Smaller demonstrations were held Saturday in Tijuana on the U.S. border and San Cristobal de las Casas in the south.

Many traveled all night to arrive at the Zocalo, joining a sea of yellow, the color of Lopez Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party.

"We are ready to do whatever is necessary," said Belisario Cruz, 32, a farmer from Tabasco. "We are tired of the rich having everything and the poor having nothing."

DOJ_NMG_0039288

There were no immediate reports of arrests or violence.

Lopez Obrador must walk a tightrope in coming days. If he appears too radical, he risks hurting his party and its chances in the next presidential elections in 2012. If he appears too moderate, he risks disappointing his core supporters.

Political analyst Oscar Aguilar predicted that he will never concede defeat.

"Once the election results are certified, he will open a permanent campaign of criticizing the government," Aguilar said.

Apparent Loser In Mexican Presidential Election Disputes Results (KRT)

By Kevin G. Hall

Knight Ridder, July 9, 2006

MEXICO CITY - Mexican presidential hopeful Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador made it clear Saturday he won't go down without a fight, calling on a gathered multitude to join him in nationwide protests as he tries to prove to the courts that he was defrauded in last Sunday's election.

Speaking before hundreds of thousands of supporters dressed in the yellow and black of his Party of the Democratic Revolution (PRD), Lopez Obrador told his supporters across the nation to join him in launching a National March for Democracy beginning Wednesday and vowed to prove he was the winner in the photo-finish balloting.

"Cheer up, we are sure that despite all the anti-democratic practices, we won on July 2," he told the throngs gathered in Mexico City's picturesque Zocalo, the ancient city square where the National Cathedral sits atop ruins of the vanquished Aztec empire.

Lopez Obrador's call for the march, which will culminate with another massive "informative rally" in Zocalo on July 16, also guarantees difficult weeks ahead for Mexico. Its stock market bounced around last week and investors are sure to worry as Mexico's young democracy appears headed for its toughest test to date.

Addressing his supporters Saturday night - under a massive red, white and green Mexican flag - Lopez Obrador made it clear he would seek the presidency at nearly any cost because "beyond the technical arguments or legal foundations is democracy and the stability of the country."

Lopez Obrador finished second in July 2 voting, but his conservative rival Felipe Calderon won by about 243,000 votes out of more than 41 million cast, or a scant 0.58 percent margin.

Lopez Obrador overcame attempts last year to impeach him on a technicality when he was mayor of Mexico City, a move that would have prevented his presidential bid. He believes President Vicente Fox and electoral authorities conspired to deny him the presidency.

Speaking earlier Saturday to foreign correspondents, Lopez Obrador announced he'd bring several different allegations of irregularities to the special Federal Electoral Tribunal, known by its Spanish initials TRIFE. Using the word "fraud" for the first time, he alleged he was the victim of a rigged computer count.

Current and former IFE officials deny the computerized vote count is open to manipulation. Foreign and domestic election observers saw no signs of fraud, but Lopez Obrador said he disagreed with them and called the elections "plagued by irregularities."

Tens of thousands of angry and vocal supporters streamed into square throughout the day, some carrying signs that read "This is just beginning" and "Vote by Vote, Booth by Booth," a reference to the candidate's demand for a complete recount of every single vote cast.

As people massed at the historic square late Saturday, Lopez Obrador was interrupted repeatedly by the chants of "Fraud, Fraud, Fraud."

Protestor Alberto Hernandez Culebro, owner of a small business, predicted that if the courts did not overturn the election, his nation could expect future disruptions, including street demonstrations, mass labor strikes and face-to-face confrontations with President Fox and apparent President-elect Calderon - both members of the ruling National Action Party (PAN).

"There must be new elections," he said.

Jose Valtierra Campos, a university professor, joined Lopez Obrador in chiding President Bush for calling Friday to congratulate Calderon on his victory.

"Tell Mr. Bush to keep his hands out of here. We can manage things," he said. "I think Bush doesn't have a reason to intervene in matters that don't involve him!"

Lopez Obrador sees those calls as an affront because Mexico officially does not have a president-elect until the TRIFE validates the election results. It has until Sept. 6 to do so.

Although he didn't provide much detail, Lopez Obrador said party lawyers would begin filing complaints Sunday in five regional electoral courts that belong to the TRIFE. Those regional courts immediately pass challenges to the presidential election up to a supreme electoral tribunal in Mexico City. Lopez Obrador has until Monday to bring all challenges to the TRIFE.

Additionally, Lopez Obrador said he'd pursue a challenge with Mexico's Supreme Tribunal, the highest civil court, alleging that Fox used the lever of government to boost his party's candidate. Mexico's election authorities in May ordered Fox to stop using public appearances to bolster his party's candidate. In 2003, the electoral court voided a state election in Colima on the same charges that Lopez Obrador intends to bring - that presidential support did irreparable harm.

"Without a bit of shame, and without caring for the presidential investiture, (Fox) dedicated himself to attacking us and has ended up being a total traitor to democracy," said Lopez Obrador, in an unusually harsh attack on the president.

On Friday, Calderon held a news conference with foreign correspondents and assumed the air of a president-elect. His camp has started publicly discussing transition issues and cabinet positions. He tried to make it appear as a fait accompli that he's Mexico's next president.

"But that's not how things are, this is just the beginning," vowed Lopez Obrador in his own news conference Saturday.

During the final weeks of the bitter campaign, Lopez Obrador made a concerted effort to look as if he were a center-left candidate that would stick to basic free-market economic policies that Mexico has followed for nearly two decades. He was forced to modify his image, in part, because of attack ads by Calderon that scared middle-class voters. They described Lopez Obrador as a radical who would chase away investment and bring economic ruin.

On Saturday, Lopez Obrador didn't shy from scary rhetoric. He engaged in class warfare, dubbing the apparent winner of the presidential elections as a tool of the rich. He added that, win or lose, his party wouldn't work with Calderon in Congress.

"There is a project that the Right defends that consists of continuing the same economic policies that have impoverished the majority of Mexicans, and that we can not be a part of any coalition while this economic policy doesn't change," he said.

Lopez Obrador added, "At the core, the candidate of the right is a tool of a group that created powerful interests in Mexico, who for some time have converted the government into a committee that's at the service of minority."

Lopez Obrador rejected charges that his protests are destabilizing the country.

"I think the main factor of destabilization, in this case, is the violation of the right people to freely elect their authorities," he said. "If there isn't democracy, there is instability."

Lopez Obrador Vows To Challenge Mexico's Presidential Results (KRT)

By Kevin G. Hall

Knight Ridder, July 9, 2006

MEXICO CITY - In a scene eerily reminiscent of the U.S. elections in 2000, Mexican presidential hopeful Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador said Saturday that he was defrauded by a rigged computer count and vowed a legal challenge before a special electoral court and Mexico's highest civil court.

In a hastily called news conference with foreign correspondents on Saturday morning, six days Mexican's cast their vote, Lopez Obrador, of the left-leaning Party of the Democratic Revolution (PRD) accused the Federal Electoral Institute of conspiring with the government to arrange his narrow defeat by a margin of 0.58 percent.

"They manipulated the electronic computer system," he said. The electoral body, known by its Spanish initials IFE, "introduced a computer model with a determined factor, where they beforehand knew how it would behave the entire day."

Specifically, Lopez Obrador believes the IFE, which has trained electoral authorities around the world and which polls show is held in high regard by Mexicans, conspired to shave points from his count and gave them to his opponent. Elections experts said conservative Felipe Calderon's tight margin of victory was akin to a difference of about two ballots per voting booth.

"This electoral organ folded completely before the government and its (ruling) party," said Lopez Obrador.

Current and former IFE officials deny the computerized vote count is open to manipulation. Foreign and domestic election observers saw no signs of fraud, but Lopez Obrador said he disagreed with them and called the elections "plagued by irregularities."

Lopez Obrador addressed journalists just hours before a massive "informative assembly" he called in Mexico City's picturesque Zocalo, an ancient city square that houses the National Cathedral. It was built by Spanish conquerors atop the ruins of the vanquished Aztec empire.

Tens of thousands of angry and vocal supporters streamed into square throughout the day, some carrying signs that read "This is just beginning" and "Vote by Vote," a reference to the candidates demand for a complete recount of every single vote cast.

DOJ_NMG_0039290

Security was tight and organizers hoped crowds would swell above 200,000 people. Lopez Obrador told reporters he would continue peaceful street demonstrations in response to the faulty vote tally.

As people massed at the historic square late Saturday afternoon, many chanted "No Electoral Fraud."

Alberto Hernandez Culebro, one protestor, predicted that if the courts did not overturn the election, his nation could expect future disruptions, including street demonstrations, mass labor strikes and face-to-face confrontations with President Vicente Fox and president-elect Calderon. "There must be new elections," he said.

Jose Valtierra Campos, a university professor, called the election "a fraud, a theft." He also chided Bush for congratulating Calderon on his victory. "Tell Mr. Bush to keep his hands out of here. We can manage things. I think Bush doesn't have a reason to intervene in matters that don't involve him."

Although he didn't provide much detail, Lopez Obrador said party lawyers would begin filing complaints Sunday in five regional courts that belong to the Federal Electoral Tribunal, known by the Spanish acronym TRIFE. Those regional courts immediately pass challenges to the presidential election up to a supreme electoral tribunal in Mexico City. Lopez Obrador has until Monday to bring all challenges to the TRIFE.

Additionally, Lopez Obrador indicated he'd pursue a challenge with Mexico's Supreme Tribunal, the highest civil court, alleging that President Vicente Fox, who like Calderon belongs to the National Action Party (PAN), used the lever of government to boost his party's candidate. Mexico's election authorities in May ordered Fox to stop using public appearances to bolster his party's candidate, and Lopez Obrador alleges this support did irreparable harm.

The fiery populist bristled Saturday at the fact that President George W. Bush and Spain's Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero called Calderon on Friday to congratulate him for winning Wednesday's official count. Lopez Obrador sees those calls as an affront because Mexico officially does not have a president-elect until the TRIFE validates the election results. It has until Sept. 6 to do so.

On Friday, Calderon held a news conference with foreign correspondents and assumed the air of a president-elect. His camp has started publicly discussing transition issues and cabinet positions. He tried to make it appear as a fait accompli that he's Mexico's next president.

"But that's not how things are, this is just the beginning," vowed Lopez Obrador.

During the final weeks of the bitter campaign, Lopez Obrador made a concerted effort to look as if he were a center-left candidate that would stick to basic free-market economic policies that Mexico has followed for nearly two decades. He was forced to modify his image, in part, because of attack ads by Calderon that scared middle-class voters. They described Lopez Obrador as a radical who would chase away investment and bring economic ruin.

On Saturday, Lopez Obrador didn't shy from scary rhetoric. He engaged in class warfare, dubbing the apparent winner of the presidential elections as a tool of the rich, and said that, win or lose, his party wouldn't work with Calderon in Congress.

"There is a project that the Right defends that consists of continuing the same economic policies that have impoverished the majority of Mexicans, and that we can not be a part of any coalition while this economic policy doesn't change," he said.

Lopez Obrador added, "At the core, the candidate of the right is a tool of a group that created powerful interests in Mexico, who for some time have converted the government into a committee that's at the service of minority."

Declining to say how he'd respond if the courts reject his bids to overturn election results, Lopez Obrador rejected charges that his protests are destabilizing the country.

"I think the main factor of destabilization, in this case, is the violation of the right people to freely elect their authorities," he said. "If there isn't democracy, there is instability."

Mexico Faces Its Own Red-Blue Standoff (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

MEXICO CITY

NO matter who wins the election in Mexico, where the leftist and conservative candidates are locked in a legal battle over the outcome, the voters have pulled the curtain back on a new political landscape for the country. In the end, who won may not be nearly as important as who lost. The candidate of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, which ruled the country with an iron hand for 70 years, did not win a single state. Worse, the P.R.I., as the party is known, lost its hold on Congress, slipping from the largest faction to third largest.

In short, the declining former ruling party finally crashed and burned. And from the wreckage have risen two invigorated, growing — and quite evenly matched — parties, Felipe Calderón's National Action Party, or P.A.N., and Andrés Manuel López Obrador's Party of the Democratic Revolution, the P.R.D.

DOJ_NMG_0039291

"What's happened, I think, is that in fact we have a new panorama," said Daniel Lund, a pollster and political analyst. "Two parties have emerged that are not the dual heirs of the P.R.I."

And they look a lot like the Republicans and Democrats or Britain's Tories and Labor.

The two parties are roughly divided along the left-right lines that appear throughout Latin America today. The right supports free trade and privatization; the left opposes globalization and favors more welfare programs. But they are not so much at odds on the country's broad needs and goals — national pride, a rate of development that matches that of countries like Brazil and Chile, and avenues by which the poor can move upward.

One striking feature is a split along regional lines. Mr. Calderón took most of the northern states, while Mr. López Obrador dominated the central and southern states. So Mexico's new map has its own version of America's red state-blue state phenomenon, and it is so evenly balanced that the presidential race produced a virtual tie.

Last week, when Mr. Calderón was declared the victor by a margin of less than 1 percent of the vote and Mr. López Obrador vowed to fight in the courts for a recount, the stalemate raised the prospect of more polarization — and, perhaps, a bitter stalemate.

The new map depicts an industrialized north, where business ties to the United States have played an enormous role in the rise of the right-leaning, conservative party, and a more agricultural south that is a hotbed of leftist discontent and anti-globalization sentiment. Political scientists say this has a little to do with history and a lot to do with economics.

For starters, the benefits of the 1994 free trade agreement with the United States and Canada have never trickled down to southern states like Chiapas, Oaxaca and Guerrero. While the economy in the north has grown at 4.5 percent a year, the southern states have barely grown 1 percent each year. They remain largely agricultural and poor, with big indigenous populations.

It was in Chiapas in 1994 that the Zapatista rebels, mostly descendants of Mayan Indians, rose up and became heroes for opponents of globalization everywhere.

In the north, meanwhile, border cities have swollen as migrants continue their inexorable march northward, and maquiladoras, the factories that assemble products for American companies, spring up like wildflowers along the Rio Grande and the rest of the border.

Even in agriculture there is a clear difference. The south holds on to the old system of ejidos, or cooperative farms, that was established after the 1910 revolution. Most farmers produce only for their own consumption or a little for the local market.

The north, however, is dominated by large modern farms, much like those in California, producing everything from tomatoes to chiles for export. Many people from the south are moving north to work as pickers, because the pay is better.

The P.A.N. has its roots in the north. Founded in 1926, it served as a haven there for those fed up with the P.R.I. machine, which was little more than a dictatorship in democratic clothing. The P.A.N. won its first governorship in the north, in the late 1980's, and began the long march to power that led to the victory in 2000 by its candidate, Vicente Fox.

Now, that march is being followed by the emergence of a vigorous two-party system. Even if he ultimately loses, Mr. López Obrador has united his party's warring factions and doubled its presence in Congress. "Andrés Manuel is the P.R.D.," said Federico Arreola, a former columnist and newspaper owner who worked on the López Obrador campaign.

The P.R.D.'s ability to dislodge the old rulers of the P.R.I. in the south crystallized only in the late 1990's, when Mr. López Obrador, the national chairman of his party, tapped longstanding anger over the oppressive tactics of the old ruling party. He won a term as mayor of Mexico City in 2000, and last year the party won the governorship of Guerrero.

Now, with the P.R.I. unraveling, its members have been drifting into the other two parties. In the south, they have flocked to Mr. López Obrador, who has promised to renegotiate the North American Free Trade Agreement, subsidize farmers, fix prices for corn and beans, cut prices for energy, spend more on welfare programs, and build refineries, trains and roads to provide jobs.

The biggest question now is whether the two main parties can learn to work together after a divisive election. During Mr. Fox's six-year term, the P.R.I. sabotaged most of his reforms in Congress.

In the new landscape, such tactics from whichever side loses the presidency could paralyze Mexico's development and spur an even greater flood of immigrants to the United States. Multiparty democracy is young here, the idea of bipartisan cooperation has yet to take root, and the prospect that a razor-thin election will yield only partisanship already scares some Mexicans.

"We cannot have another six years of a country in gridlock," said Rossana Fuentes Berain, the editor of the Spanish-language Foreign Affairs.

Hire Lawyers - And Caterers (WP)

By Benjamin L. Ginsberg

DOJ_NMG_0039292

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

I still remember the shock I felt -- that mix of abject fear and utter disbelief -- when I realized we would be in a recount after the 2000 presidential vote. Now, following their own ferociously contested election, our friends in Mexico may be joining us in that memorable (but not necessarily desirable) experience.

So, after living though the 2000 Florida recount as national counsel to the Bush-Cheney campaign, I offer a few tips for Felipe CalderÃ²n, AndrÃ©s Manuel Lopez Obrador and those who will handle the recount for them in the coming days and weeks:

First, get the right people. It makes all the difference. Recruit the smartest, ablest, toughest ones you can find. We immediately started lining up former Supreme Court clerks, red-meat litigators, wily political operatives and top communicators. Be sure they're committed to your candidate -- that commitment makes it possible to manage all that talent.

Second, organize. Former secretary of state James A. Baker III led our recount effort. He brought a career's worth of assets to the endeavor, including vast experience in complex missions. His first charge was the creation of a detailed organizational chart, which paid dividends throughout. The effort had structure and people had defined responsibilities in what was otherwise the most unpredictable, fast-paced and high stakes time of our professional lives.

Next, get a good caterer and some extra phone lines. In other words, pay attention to logistics. You'll have many people to feed (you won't want them taking the time to forage on their own) and many people to keep in touch with minute by minute. Our Florida headquarters received a remarkable number of hang-up calls that swamped the system until we installed new exchanges. One memorable early conference call included so many people around the state that it collapsed after 30 minutes.

Make sure you line up top lawyers, which in a recount are a necessary (and underappreciated) evil. Lawyers don't always win the congeniality prize during campaigns; after all, a big part of the job is saying no. But recounts are -- don't forget -- legal proceedings. Mexico's Federal Electoral Tribunal will have until September to rule. That will require many lawyers. Analyze the various skills your legal team will need under Mexican law and recruit the best for each.

An awful lot will be going on in each counting center, so be sure to develop a strong ground game. Have enough people (with an emphasis on those wily political operatives) to cover everything that happens. Be sure your staff members take detailed notes on each tally sheet, vote packet and ballot they see. That will prove crucial in an eventual court case.

From the start, you'll need communications specialists. It's important that your candidate's victory be legitimized so that he can govern effectively. To achieve that, you need to tell your side of every development every day. Communicators must also manage the deluge of inquiries you'll receive. If the lawyers and the staff in the counting centers have to manage this process, they'll be distracted from their real responsibilities.

Ignore editorials. Sure, if there's one criticizing your opponent, use it for all it's worth. But don't pay attention if they don't like something you're doing. You're doing it for a reason -- stick with that. Also, remember there's so much going on that even the best reporters won't know a third of what is happening on any given day. So trust your people, and pay attention to newspapers and television only for breaking news and for a flavor of what the public is seeing.

The hardest thing to do in a recount -- with all its speed, surprises and changes -- is to keep your effort consistent. Avoid what befell the Gore camp in 2000: First calling for a recount in only their strongest counties, then switching to a "count all the votes" strategy statewide but simultaneously trying to exclude overseas military ballots and 30,000 absentee ballots in two counties. So find a very smart person to focus solely on the big picture, and empower him or her to speak up when the unexpected makes it seem expedient to change everything you've been doing. Your credibility rides on it.

Learn to deal with the wild accusations; it's a presidential recount, after all. Your opponents will issue baseless charges with utter conviction. Remember the butterfly ballot, which can be challenged under Florida law before an election, but not after? Or the charge of voter intimidation, which was loudly publicized although neither Al Gore's state chairman (who was Florida's attorney general) nor Bill Clinton's attorney general (who was from Miami) ever brought any cases? Don't overreact, just debunk the allegations as best you can. Trust me, especially if you win, the bleating will continue long after the country has moved on. Don't worry about it.

Finally, take time to smell the roses or, in Mexico, the dahlias. This is the wildest ride you'll ever be on, but take a moment each day to remember that you're part of history. It may feel like root canal right now, but you'll be eternally thankful you were there. Savor it. And appreciate the people around you. When this is over, you'll have a rare bond that will last forever.

Don't Take The High Road (WP)

By Ronald Klain

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

For the presidential campaign of AndrÃ©s Manuel Lopez Obrador, narrowly declared the loser to Felipe CalderÃ²n in Mexico's much-disputed returns, there is good news and bad news. The good news is that he has avoided the two biggest problems that confronted Al Gore in Recount 2000: being forced to contest the election in a jurisdiction where the governor was his opponent's brother, and being tormented by a chief election official who was a partisan operative with a bizarre Queen Esther complex. The bad news, however, is that, where Gore trailed in the initial tally in Florida by fewer than 2,000 votes, Lopez Obrador is more than 200,000 votes behind. It's only a matter of time before the Mexican equivalent of our pundit class begins its demands for "finality."

For Lopez Obrador, the clock is ticking loudly. If he wants to keep his candidacy alive, he must take decisive -- and quite divisive -- action. He must bring meaningful and documented claims of fraud in the election. He must call his supporters to the streets and question the legitimacy of the vote casting and counting process. He must demand that, notwithstanding Mexican law, every ballot be recounted, by hand, to ensure an accurate tally. Above all, he must reject any suggestion that CalderÃ²n received more votes -- indeed, he must insist that any fair count would show that he is the rightful winner.

This, of course, was not the playbook that Gore followed in 2000. The vice president rejected advice to do these things. Instead of claiming victory, he limited himself to suggesting that the result was in doubt -- and unknown -- until a "full and fair" count could be completed. He urged calm among his supporters and called off street protests by progressive groups and allies. He never, ever questioned the legitimacy of the institutions -- the courts or the canvassers -- responsible for the tallies, and he forbade his lawyers and operatives from doing anything of the sort.

The Gore approach was dignified, responsible, reasonable -- and unsuccessful.

The playbook that Lopez Obrador must follow, if he wants to keep his prospects alive, is the Bush 2000 playbook. Remember the protesters with "Sore Loserman" signs and the crowds near Observatory Circle shouting, "Get out of Cheney's house"? Remember the "Brooks Brothers Riot," bringing an end to the recount in Miami-Dade County? Remember former secretary of state James A. Baker III's condemnation of the Florida courts, and his harsh words for judges who ruled against the Bush campaign? And above all, remember then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush's repeated refusal to accept Gore's offers of reconciliation, and his unflinching (though counter-factual) insistence that the votes had "already been counted and recounted" and that he was the undisputed winner? If Lopez Obrador has a hope at this point, the Bush 2000 strategy is probably his only option.

But Lopez Obrador isn't the only one with a hard choice. CalderÃ²n, too, must decide what his next steps will be. For now, he is resisting demands for a full hand recount of all the votes. In the short run, this may maximize his chance of occupying Los Pinos -- but at what price?

For the past six years, President Bush has suffered bitter domestic opposition (suppressed for a time after 9/11), that is, in no small part, an echo of the doubts about how he came into office: in a process in which his campaign systematically attempted to stop legitimate recounts and in which our nation's highest court ordered local election officials to stop tabulating votes. CalderÃ²n can likewise use his power and influence to stifle recounts -- but he would do better to take a very different stance than Bush did in 2000. He would do better to take the Gore approach, and balance the risk of defeat after a full recount against the added legitimacy of his power if he prevails in such a transparent and fulsome process.

Hence, ironically, even though he is trailing, Lopez Obrador's only hope of victory is a Bush-like, scorched-earth approach; and, though he is leading, CalderÃ²n's best hope for leveraging a narrow margin into governing authority as president would be a Gore-like commitment to a full and fair recount. For CalderÃ²n and Lopez Obrador, the choices -- and consequences -- are firmly in their own hands.

Ex-Mexican Leader Freed From House Arrest (AP)

By Ioan Grillo

AP, July 9, 2006

A federal judge threw out genocide charges on Saturday against former President Luis Echeverria, ruling that a 30-year statute of limitations had run out, his lawyer said.

Echeverria, 84, had been under house arrest for more than a week on charges that he organized a student massacre as interior secretary in 1968. He went on to become president from 1970-1976.

The charges were the first to have been filed against a former Mexican president.

DOJ_NMG_0039294

Prosecutors still can appeal the decision, but Echeverria's lawyer, Juan Velazquez, was confident that the ruling would be upheld.

"The case is not finished but it's dead," he said.

Saturday's decision was the latest blow to prosecutors' attempts to bring Echeverria to justice for alleged crimes committed during Mexico's "dirty war," a violent crack down on leftist dissidents in the 1960s and 1970s.

Ignacio Carrillo, a special prosecutor appointed by President Vicente Fox, also has attempted to bring charges against Echeverria for a 1971 student massacre and for the disappearance of leftist activists during his presidency.

All of the charges have been thrown out or blocked by courts.

A phone call to Carrillo's office on Saturday went unanswered.

The 1968 massacre took place in Mexico City's Tlatelolco Plaza on Oct. 2, just before the capital hosted the Olympics. Officially, 25 people were killed, though human rights activists say as many as 350 may have died.

Special prosecutors say they have reviewed military documents indicating 360 sharpshooters fired from buildings surrounding Tlatelolco Plaza. The attack is considered one of the darkest moments of 71 years of rule by the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI.

After President Vicente Fox ended seven decades of PRI rule with his historic 2000 election victory, he promised to prosecute crimes committed by the old regime.

The order for Echeverria's house arrest came two days before the July 2 presidential election, which Felipe Calderon, the candidate from Fox's conservative National Action Party, appears to have narrowly won.

The Little Tramp's Classic Labor Lesson (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

Venezuela's socialist government is using a 1936 Chaplin film to educate workers about their rights. Employers are not applauding.

LOS TEQUES, Venezuela — In his classic 1936 film, "Modern Times," Charlie Chaplin has to work so fast tightening bolts in a steel factory that he finally goes crazy. In a memorable scene that has become a metaphor for labor exploitation, the Little Tramp is run through the factory's enormous gears.

For President Hugo Chavez's socialist government, the film is more than just entertainment: It's become a teaching tool. Since January, in a bid to expose the evils of "savage capitalism," the Labor Ministry has shown the Chaplin film to thousands of workers in places such as this rundown industrial suburb of Caracas.

When the screenings at factories or meeting halls end, Labor Ministry officials then take their cue, and use Chaplin's plight to spell out worker rights under occupational safety laws passed last year and now being applied. They are part of Chavez's sweeping reform agenda that he calls Socialism for the 21st Century.

Chaplin wanted his Depression-era movie to make a point, that "once inside the factory, workers had no meaningful rights," said Los Angeles-based film historian and Chaplin authority Richard Schickel. "It was very relevant in the moment it was released, a time of social unrest and the emerging U.S. labor movement."

Seventy years later, Chaplin's fable is all too relevant in Venezuela, said several factory workers who saw the film recently.

"The owners still value their machines more than their workers," said Roberto Maldonado, a 29-year-old minimum-wage worker at the Pollo Premium poultry plant, which processes 75,000 chickens a day. "Charlie Chaplin ends up crazy, and I feel that way too sometimes. When I go home, I'm too tired to pay attention to my wife or family."

Freddy Colmenari, a 35-year-old worker at a pasta factory here, said that just as Chaplin's bosses do in the film, his supervisors frequently speed up the assembly line to nerve-racking levels and zealously monitor workers' trips to the bathroom. "There is always pressure and stress," he said.

But the business community here is hardly applauding the film. In a formal complaint to Chavez last month, the four main employer associations in Venezuela said that showing a movie depicting the boss as a "vulgar exploiter of workers" was designed to "generate hate and resentment in the labor sector" and "demonize the employer."

An official at the Venezuelan Confederation of Industries, one of the four signatories, said that the new workplace laws were another example of Chavez punishing private industry, a process the groups say has been unrelenting since a failed 2002 coup led by businessman Pedro Carmona.

While insisting they don't oppose workplace safety improvements, business groups here say that they weren't consulted before the new laws were drafted and that now workers and their delegates have too much power to intervene in factory operations.

Jhonny Picone, a top Labor Ministry official, said employees needed all the power they could get. He noted that Venezuelan workers were more likely to describe their job as "a curse from God than as something positive."

The grim and dehumanizing factory conditions depicted in the Chaplin film are still the "norm," he said — more than 1,500 workers die and thousands are injured annually in industrial accidents.

Largely at Picone's insistence, the film has been shown 1,000 times in 14 states and has been effective in educating workers who usually have no clue about their health and safety rights. Labor Ministry officials say it's because the most recent workplace regulations, passed in 1986, were unobserved, a "dead letter."

Workers are told they have a right to demand safety and hygiene precautions, and, through an employee-elected delegate that represents each factory, even to shut down production if owners don't comply. Egregious and repeated safety violations can result in the government taking over a plant.

"With Charlie Chaplin, it's easier to catch the attention of workers who are often too tired or don't trust the government in the first place," said Picone, a doctor named by Chavez to head a new Labor Ministry agency that he compared to the U.S. Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

The workplace laws are a facet of Chavez's often-mentioned goal of installing a new socialist economic model to replace the globalized free-market version that the president says has failed.

The "popular economy" model includes a return to state-controlled central planning that reminds many of the Soviet era. Bankrolled by the country's oil wealth, Chavez has financed a number of worker-owned cooperatives that run factories and farms that the government has built or taken over.

"It's by no means dominant yet. It's gradually being built up by a process of trial and error," said a Chavez administration official who asked not to be named. "But in the longer term, the popular economy model will be dominant."

But one industrial leader who asked not to be identified said that the business climate was abysmal, and that factory production, industrial jobs and private investment had plummeted since Chavez took power in 1999.

"How much of this policy is revolution and how much is castigation, I don't know," he said.

Critics say Chavez is merely recycling the failed protectionist economic policies that many South American nations tried to impose after World War II to keep out foreign capital and competition. The policies were largely jettisoned in the 1980s as countries began embracing free markets and foreign investment.

Business interests also cite Chavez's decision to pull Venezuela out of the Andean Community as another example of his bias against the private sector. The regional trade group, known as CAN, was too U.S.-dominated, the president said. But one member, Colombia, is Venezuela's second-largest trading partner, and businesspeople here are worried that they will lose tens of millions of dollars in trade as a result.

On Tuesday, Venezuela formally joined the Mercosur trade bloc, whose members include Brazil, Argentina, Paraguay and Uruguay. Chavez told delegates in Caracas, Venezuela's capital, that he made the switch to avoid being "devoured by imperialist strategies, as happened with CAN."

But Venezuelan producers will have a tougher time competing in the Mercosur arena, said Jose Luis Betancourt, president of Fedecamaras, Venezuela's largest business chamber.

He criticized the new workplace measures. "The law will only generate less efficiency, less [industrial] capacity and make the Venezuelan economy more dependent on high oil prices, which won't last all our lives."

Chavez's adversaries in the business sector scoff at the Chaplin film screenings as an example of the president's simplistic, outdated and decidedly business-unfriendly economic policies.

But for poultry plant worker Maldonado, Charlie Chaplin has made a difference at work.

Inspired by the film and the talk from Labor Ministry officials, he demanded gloves and soap from his employer — and got them. But the assembly line still goes too fast, he said.

Metalworker Miguel Moreno also has seen some improvement. "We have more power because we know more," he said. "They've given me earplugs for the noise, at least."

Film historian Schickel said, "Chaplin would just love that his film is still relevant to modern social conditions, that a modern-day leftist politician in Latin America would find this film to be a useful tool."

Keep Pressing On U.N. Reform (2 Letters) (NYT)

To the Editor:

Re "Crisis Postponed at the U.N." (editorial, July 3):

DOJ_NMG_0039296

The European Union concurs with your view on the importance and necessity of United Nations reform.

The share of the member states of the European Union in the United Nations budget is 37 percent and more than 40 percent of the financing of United Nations peacekeeping.

The European Union is the single largest contributor to the United Nations budget. We attach great importance to reforms that would bring about efficiencies under budget and management rules.

For the European Union, management reform is also central. We have welcomed the proposals put forward by Secretary General Kofi Annan. We are disappointed that more far-reaching results have not yet been achieved.

The lifting of the spending cap was important because it is in our shared interest that the United Nations continue its crucial mission to deliver services around the world.

All the member states must now redouble their efforts to reach concrete results soon. Reform is a continuing process, and a lot remains to be done.

To the Editor:

Your editorial unfairly tends to stereotype developing countries as blockers of United Nations reform.

Pakistan has played a useful and constructive role. For a vast majority of the United Nations membership, progress on development resolution and implementation of agreed development commitments is a matter of the highest priority.

As co-head of the mandate review process, Pakistan, along with Canada, has made a significant contribution toward advancing the process despite major disagreements among the membership.

On management reforms, Pakistan and other members of Group of 77 recognize the need for managerial discretion for the secretary general. But we believe that delegation of authority must be accompanied by robust accountability mechanisms.

Pakistan supports an efficient, accountable and effective United Nations Secretariat and is committed to carrying out all reform decisions adopted by the World Summit last September.

A Double Act Takes Center Stage In Poland (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

Despite Earlier Promise to Voters, Twin Brother of President Is Named Prime Minister

BERLIN, July 8 -- Ever since their party scored big in Poland's elections last fall, the Kaczynski brothers -- identical twin movie stars with equally big political ambitions -- were widely assumed to be running the country in tandem behind the scenes. Now, it's official.

On Saturday, Poland's governing Law and Justice Party voted to name its party leader, Jaroslaw Kaczynski, the country's new prime minister. With his brother, Lech, already holding the Polish presidency, there is no longer any doubt that the 57-year-old, chubby-faced twins are in charge of the eastern European country.

"There is a certain risk for the president and prime minister to be brothers," Jaroslaw Kaczynski said at a news conference in Warsaw after he accepted his party's nomination for the top job in Parliament. "But for various reasons, we came to the conclusion that, at this time, putting forward a different candidate -- of which we have many good ones -- would be a worse way out than recommending me."

Jaroslaw Kaczynski replaces Kazimierz Marcinkiewicz, who unexpectedly announced his resignation on Friday. Marcinkiewicz said he was giving up the prime minister's post so he could run for mayor of Warsaw in November. He insisted that the Kaczynskis, who had put him in the job last year, did not maneuver him out the door.

Many Poles were skeptical of the official explanation, given the fact that Marcinkiewicz had among the highest approval ratings of any politician in Poland. The Kaczynskis' political enemies, of whom there are many, warned that the brothers wouldn't be satisfied until they were able to vanquish all their rivals.

"Poles are right to fear the concentration of power in the four hands of two brothers," said Donald Tusk, leader of the opposition Civic Platform party and the loser to Lech Kaczynski in last October's presidential race.

The Kaczynskis have been famous in Poland since the 1962, when as child actors they starred in a hit movie, "Those Two Who Would Steal the Moon." As adults, they resisted communist rule and joined the leadership of the Solidarity trade union movement.

Even today, they are difficult to tell apart. Lech is distinguished by two extra moles on his face; Jaroslaw is known as the unmarried brother who lives with their mother.

They entered democratic politics after the fall of the Iron Curtain but enjoyed limited success, gaining reputations as uncompromising scrappers on the fringe of national politics. In 1993, based on a reader survey, a Polish publication declared Jaroslaw Kaczynski the country's "biggest political loony." The runner-up in the rankings? His twin.

Their fortunes changed last September when voters tossed out a government dominated by former communists and gave a plurality in parliamentary elections to Law and Justice, which vowed to stamp out corruption.

As party leader, Jaroslaw Kaczynski had dibs on the prime ministership. But he promised voters he would not take the job if his brother won the upcoming presidential race, saying he realized Poles would be uncomfortable at the prospect of being ruled by twins whom they could barely tell apart.

The pledge, however, sounded as if it was made grudgingly. "My brother said that if I win, he won't serve as prime minister," Lech Kaczynski said with a grin in an interview with The Washington Post last September. "I think that would be a limitation of our civil rights."

Lech Kaczynski won the presidency a month later after a hard-fought contest. Afterward, the brothers made good on their promise at first by naming Marcinkiewicz as prime minister. But they did little to dispel the perception that they were controlling the government behind the scenes, speaking by phone several times a day and rarely making decisions without consulting each other.

Since then, they've displayed an eagerness for bare-knuckled politics, taking a hard line against former communists, gays, Russia, Germany and the European Union. They also kept the government in turmoil by waiting months to form a ruling coalition in Parliament.

On Saturday, Jaroslaw Kaczynski tried to reassure voters that the official change at the top would not lead to more political instability.

"In a formal sense, we will have a new government," he said. "I repeat formal sense, because in a practical way, this is going to be a continuation government."

Power Twins Poised To Take Over In Poland (AFP)

AFP, July 9, 2006

Poland prepared for a unique political double act as Jaroslaw Kaczynski, the head of the ruling conservatives and identical twin of the president, stood poised to take over as prime minister.

The conservative Law and Justice (PiS) party voted in the afternoon to accept the resignation of Prime Minister Kazimierz Marcinkiewicz and proposed he be replaced with party chief Kaczynski -- the man who named him as premier just nine months ago.

If Jaroslaw Kaczynski, 57, is approved by parliament as prime minister, he will be breaking a vow he made during his twin brother Lech Kaczynski's successful presidential election campaign last year.

"I announced before the elections that I would by no means be prime minister if my brother, Lech, was elected president," Jaroslaw Kaczynski told AFP in October, a week after his brother scored a surprise win in the presidential race.

Jaroslaw said then that neither the Polish people nor Poland's international partners would tolerate a fraternal double act in the two key posts of Polish politics.

But on Saturday Jaroslaw Kaczynski boldly announced a U-turn, telling a press conference: "We are taking a risk in having a president and a prime minister who are brothers.

"However, we have come to the conclusion that putting forward another candidate (for prime minister) at this time would be a worse solution than putting me forward."

Donald Tusk, head of the business-friendly Civic Platform (PO), the main opposition party, claimed Jaroslaw Kaczynski lacked experience in economics and that Poland's image abroad would suffer under the power-hoarding twins.

"Poles are afraid of power concentrated in the four hands of the two brothers. This is power being concentrated by one family, with an intensity unknown in the civilized world," Tusk told reporters.

Pressed by the media to explain Friday's bombshell announcement of a change in prime minister, Jaroslaw Kaczynski gave just one explanation: Marcinkiewicz quit so he could turn his attention to contesting November 12 elections for Warsaw mayor.

"The victory of our candidate will allow the reform processes we have started in the country to be carried out at local level," said Kaczynski, whose party topped the poll in legislative elections last year.

Kaczynski said that he was planning to nominate a new finance minister, who would continue public finance reform and maintain the budget deficit at 30 billion zlotys (7.5 billion euros, 9.5 billion dollars.)

The current finance minister, Pawel Wojciechowski, was officially named only two weeks ago. Kaczynski said at the time he had not been consulted over Marcinkiewicz's choice of Wojciechowski.

Analysts have warned of economic turbulence in Poland following the departure of Marcinkiewicz, seen as the last economic liberal in a populist government.

Jacek Wisniewski of Raiffeisen Bank predicted that the national currency, the zloty, and bonds would fall when markets reopen on Monday.

Meanwhile Marcinkiewicz, 46, said he would formally hand in his resignation to the president on Monday. He rejected media suggestions of a rift between him and Jaroslaw Kaczynski.

"Politics is a team game about team work for the good of the country," he insisted.

But analysts were unconvinced. Political scientist Kazimierz Kik said Marcinkiewicz's departure was forced by Jaroslaw Kaczynski, annoyed by the increasingly independent and high-profile stance the premier was taking.

"Marcinkiewicz was openly abused and replaced like an old, worn-out glove when Jaroslaw Kaczynski decided he didn't want anyone rising above him any more," Kik was quoted by PAP news agency as saying.

Analyst Stanislaw Mocek said that Marcinkiewicz probably began moving toward the exit in May, when PiS formed a coalition with the far-right League of Polish Families (LPR) and the populist Samoobrona parties.

"Marcinkiewicz felt the government was not his own any more," Mocek said.

Polish Leader's Twin Tapped To Become PM (AP)

By Vanessa Gera

AP, July 9, 2006

The United States has its political power families — the Kennedys, the Clintons, the Bushes. But nothing quite like what is developing in Poland, which faced the almost certain prospect Saturday of having identical twins as prime minister and president.

President Lech Kaczynski was preparing to swear in his twin, Jaroslaw, as the head of a new Cabinet after Prime Minister Kazimierz Marcinkiewicz submitted his resignation.

Though both men have the same round faces and short, stout builds, many Poles have learned to distinguish them, thanks to the fact that Lech has two moles on his face, and wears a wedding ring. Jaroslaw is unmarried, and has no moles.

The 57-year-old twins — who happen to be Geminis — first won fame as child actors in the 1962 hit film "The Two Who Stole The Moon." Though their show-business careers stopped there, they became politically active when they joined the anti-communist opposition in the 1970s. They later served as advisers to the Solidarity movement in the 1980s.

After the fall of communism, they served briefly as advisers to Solidarity leader Lech Walesa during his 1990-95 presidency, but later fell out with him.

Jaroslaw Kaczynski has used his role as chairman of the ruling Law and Justice party to guide the government from the sidelines since his social conservatives won elections last fall. The popular Marcinkiewicz has represented the government abroad.

The two apparently fell out over Marcinkiewicz's choice of a new finance minister. On Saturday, party officials accepted Marcinkiewicz's resignation and said they had chosen Jaroslaw Kaczynski to replace him. The nominee said at a news conference that he accepted.

The prospect of having portly, gray-haired identical twins in the two top posts has loomed as a possibility since Lech Kaczynski embarked on his presidential campaign last year.

But Jaroslaw Kaczynski had pledged to refrain from becoming prime minister, saying he wanted to spare the country the confusion of identical leaders.

As quirky as the situation might seem to outsiders, the strangeness of two identical men dominating the political scene has worn off to some extent for Poles, in part because the two have been a public presence for nearly half a century.

Jacek Kucharczyk, an analyst with the Institute of Public Affairs think tank, says that, even if their looks might confuse foreign dignitaries, the issue no longer looms as a domestic predicament.

"It was a kind of aesthetic problem during the elections, and some people thought it was strange looking," Kucharczyk said. "But the main problem is their track record in politics."

Poland has been beset by political instability and bickering since Law and Justice formed a government in October. Attempts to form a coalition with a pro-business party collapsed in the fall. After months of serving as a weak, minority administration, Law and Justice stabilized its government by forming a coalition with two smaller parties in May.

The deal sparked controversy because of the two small groups' reputations.

The farm-based Self-Defense is led by Andrzej Lepper, a rowdy former leader of occasionally violent anti-European Union street protests in the 1990s.

The League of Polish Families has sparked protests because of its close links with a far-right radical youth movement, All-Polish Youth, that has attacked gay rights parades and whose members have made Nazi gestures.

Marcinkiewicz still has to submit his resignation to the president for the change to become official, but it was expected to be a formality that the outgoing premier said he would happen Monday.

Oil's Promise Still A Dream (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

A pipeline has given Chad hundreds of millions of dollars to fight poverty but critics say corruption and waste have kept the money from those most in need.

Outside the gleaming white fences of a multibillion-dollar American petroleum complex here, a slum dreams of becoming a boom town.

Thousands of people have flocked to this village in southern Chad over the years, hoping their country's newfound oil wealth would translate into jobs and prosperity. But most remain unemployed, living in huts on garbage-strewn, dirt streets with neither electricity nor running water.

Relations between the village and an ExxonMobil Corp.-led consortium across the street are so strained that oil workers are now banned by their employer from patronizing local bars and other shops in the village. When fire raced through the slum in March, oil company fire trucks watched from the other side of the fence, witnesses said.

"They said our children would get jobs," said Benoit Djimrane Njarounda, who moved to the area more than a decade ago and now serves as the village's chief. "There were so many promises. What happened?"

Three years after this poor, landlocked Central African country joined the league of oil-producing nations, there are growing — and familiar — complaints that petroleum money is not getting to those most in need. For most of this year, Chad's oil wealth has been frozen in London bank accounts after a dispute with the World Bank.

As he led an ox across a plot of dirt to plant millet for his family, Joseph Bailessem, 27, lamented that he lacked the skills and education needed for a job at the plant. Worse yet, he said, his children, who were helping him till the soil, are missing out on their education because promised classrooms have yet to open.

"Where is the oil money going?" he asked. "White people are the only ones benefiting."

Just a few years ago, Chad was held up as an international model for how a developing nation could avoid the curse of oil and ensure that money did not disappear into bureaucrats' bank accounts, as seen in Nigeria, Sudan and Gabon.

Thanks to decades of internal strife and its reputation as one of the world's most corrupt countries, this former French colony was unable to attract investment partners to develop its oil fields until the World Bank agreed in 2000 to back a $4-billion deal to build a pipeline from Chad to the Atlantic coastline of neighboring Cameroon.

In return for its participation, the World Bank secured strict conditions on how the Chad government's share of the profit could be spent. Some 10% would be set aside in a "future generations" fund; 72% was earmarked to fight poverty by spending on health, education and roads; 13.5% would go to government coffers and the remaining 4.5% to local communities affected by the development.

By the end of 2005, the government of Chad had received about $420 million, nearly doubling its annual income.

But tracking where the money went is not so simple. A major chunk, more than $74 million in 2005, was allocated for new roads, according to Chad's independent oil oversight committee.

Oil funds helped lay one new toll road to the south and are being used for a 400-mile highway to the east. Still, paved roads remain a rarity in Chad — three times the size of California — even in the capital of N'Djamena.

Aside from the new roads, government officials are hard-pressed to describe large-scale benefits of the oil funds. They talk about smaller projects: a new school fence and some renovated classrooms in the capital, HIV testing clinics, a water tower in the southern city of Doba.

DOJ_NMG_0039300

Much of the work remains unfinished. Government leaders have urged patience.

"People are complaining because the programs haven't reached them yet, but they will," said Njarindo Milongar, a member of parliament who also chairs the committee that controls money earmarked for communities affected by oil development.

Critics, however, say much of the money is being squandered. Mekombe Therese, vice president of the independent oversight committee charged with monitoring the use of oil proceeds, said her group's analysis of spending in 2004 and 2005 found that 40% to 45% of oil money fell victim to waste, corruption, nepotism, shoddy work or delinquent contractors.

For example, a venture involving the brother of Chadian President Idriss Deby received one of the biggest road construction contracts; committee examiners found a $1-million university grant was being held in the rector's personal bank account; a year after spending $800,000 for three new schools, none had been completed despite a six-month deadline. And new desks provided by another contractor are already falling apart, Therese said.

"The government needs to take action against those who have not fulfilled their obligations, but they are not doing enough," Therese said.

Instead, Deby launched a campaign against the World Bank to seize control over more of Chad's oil royalties. Late last year, Chad's parliament unilaterally scrapped the 10% "future generations" fund, doubled the government's take of profit to 30% and expanded the definition of "poverty reducing" sectors to include such things as the military, energy development and legal reform.

Deby supporters said the revisions reflected Chad's dire needs and worsening finances. They pointed to the Darfur crisis in neighboring Sudan to the east, which has sent more than 200,000 refugees across the border into Chad.

Much of the criticism was aimed at the future generations fund.

"If the current generation is dying of hunger and disease, there won't be a future generation," said Milongar, the parliament member. "We need the money now."

The revisions were widely viewed as a survival strategy by Deby, whose 16-year regime is facing growing public frustration. Unpaid government employees have gone on strike. Soldiers began receiving their salaries only late last year, when rebellions broke out in the eastern part of the country. One coup attempt in April made its way to the distant capital in southwestern Chad.

"He needs the money to buy more guns," said a diplomat in N'Djamena whose government would not authorize him to speak publicly.

Chad's oil riches represent both opportunity and peril for Deby, experts say. If Deby survives another year in office, he'll control assets worth billions of dollars. On the other hand, oil money has made the once-obscure African nation a much more attractive target, to both rebels and other countries.

Chadian officials accuse Sudan and China of backing its rebels. The U.S., which gets about 18% of its imported oil from Africa, also is taking a more active interest.

"The oil war in Chad is beginning," said Chadian economist Ali A. Haggar, a former advisor to Deby.

The World Bank has responded by suspending activities in Chad, effectively freezing the bank accounts holding the nation's oil funds. As a result, none of the estimated $270 million in 2006 royalties has been released.

At one point, Deby angrily threatened to shut down the oil fields if the funds weren't released. Under a truce, the World Bank is preparing to disburse some money as long as Chad pledges to abide by some of the original conditions. Negotiations over a long-term settlement continue.

Officials in Chad blame the World Bank for halting their poverty projects. "We have so much work to do in Chad and our investments have been blocked by the World Bank," said Mahamat Ali Hassan, minister of economy, planning and cooperation. "I'm really confused."

World Bank officials said they were left with little choice after the government altered the terms of the original agreement.

"It was a decision taken very reluctantly, yet one which we believed was necessary in order to protect the original goals of the project, namely to ensure that the money went to poverty-reducing public spending," Ali Khadr, the director of the World Bank's Chad operation, wrote in an e-mail to The Times.

In some ways, rising oil prices have weakened the World Bank's hand in negotiations.

The oil consortium, including ExxonMobil, Chevron and Petronas of Malaysia, originally predicted that profit would not flow until 2008, based on projected oil prices of $15 a barrel for crude. With prices above $70 a barrel, the consortium began reporting a profit this year.

By taxing the consortium's earnings, the government now stands to receive a windfall next year that officials in Chad say could total $1 billion, far exceeding the royalties they've been receiving.

So far there are no laws or World Bank provisions that restrict the use of such tax revenue, though World Bank officials hope to include that money in the new agreement.

DOJ_NMG_0039301

Executives at ExxonMobil and its Esso Exploration & Production Chad Inc. subsidiary declined to comment.

A recent quarterly report by the consortium expressed hope that the government and the World Bank would resolve the dispute.

On its website, ExxonMobil cites its contributions to assisting Chadians, saying it has spent nearly $610 million on goods and services from local suppliers, $8.75 million on community projects such as schools and wells, and more than $9 million in compensation to individuals and landowners affected by its operations. The consortium says 83% of its 7,300 workers are Chadian.

But few of those jobs have gone to the hopeful men and women living outside the gates of the oil facility. A few years ago, they dubbed their slum "Satan" for its bars and brothels. Later, they dropped the first letter and changed the name to Atan, which sounds like the French word for "wait," to reflect their growing impatience.

The only success story in Atan was the Phoenix bar, which once attracted scores of Americans and other foreigners each weekend with its lure of beer, music and women. Some oil workers even installed a generator to keep the drinks cold. But in December, the Phoenix was deemed off limits to oil company employees, according to bar owner Miskine Mougaye. His profit immediately evaporated.

On a recent Saturday afternoon, the place was nearly deserted except for a table of drunken young women, loudly lamenting the lack of men available for sex or to buy them beer.

"It's not the same since the Americans left," Mougaye said. "When they left, they took the generator with them."

In War-Torn Congo, Going Wireless To Reach Home (WP)

For Poor, Cellphones Bridge Digital Divide

KINSHASA, Congo -- Until not long ago, if Zadhe Iyombe wanted to talk to his mother, he had to make the eight-day boat trip up the Congo River to the jungle town where he was raised. In a country with almost no roads, mail or telephone system and a grisly guerrilla war raging, making that exhausting and dangerous trip was about the only way he could find out if his 59-year-old mother was still alive.

Then he got a cellphone.

Now he talks to his mother every day. And once a week, with a simple new feature in African cellphones, he uses a text message to transfer five minutes of airtime to her phone to make sure she can always call him.

"Now I know immediately how she is doing," said Iyombe, who lives here in the capital, 400 miles southwest of his mother's home. "These phones make everything easier. It has totally changed life in Congo."

As surely as the light bulb and the automobile before them, the cellphone and text messaging are radically changing the way people live in the developing world. In widespread use for about five years in much of Africa, technology long taken for granted by the world's rich has made life easier, safer and more prosperous for the world's poor.

For the first time, millions of Africans are able to communicate easily with people who are beyond shouting distance. Farmers and fishermen, for example, use text messaging to check market prices, eliminating middlemen and increasing profits -- and preventing long trips to the market on days it is canceled.

In cities, cellphones are becoming a basic tool of electronic commerce, allowing consumers to transfer money to merchants with a few presses on the keypad.

Restaurant owners now can advertise by sending bulk texts to their customers, promising something delicious for lunch. People call a doctor, mechanic or police officer instead of walking miles to find one. News of births, deaths and illnesses instantly reaches the farthest corners of the jungle, where mothers like Iyombe's struggle with the concept of their children's voices emerging from a little plastic box with buttons.

"Before, if you had a sick baby in the middle of the night, he could easily die," Iyombe said, holding the Nokia phone that has raised his ambitions and expectations of life. "Now you can call somebody to help."

Worldwide, there are more than 2.4 billion cellphone users, with more than 1,000 new customers added every minute, according to industry analysts. About 59 percent of users are in developing countries, making cellphones the first telecommunications technology in history to have more users there than in the developed world.

Cellphone usage in Africa is growing faster than in any other region and jumped from 63 million users two years ago to about 152 million today, according to David Pringle, a spokesman for the GSM Association, a trade group that represents cellular companies whose customers account for 80 percent of the global total.

Few places are seeing faster growth than Congo, which has 3.2 million cellphone customers and just 20,000 conventional land lines. At least 8,000 new cellphone customers sign up each day here; the number of users has increased more than tenfold in the past five years.

When one of Congo's first cellphone networks opened in 1999, it had capacity for 4,000 customers, but 30,000 people lined up outside the office demanding a phone, said Gilbert Nkuli, of Vodacom Congo, the largest of the five cellphone companies competing in the country's booming market.

Africa has attracted multimillion-dollar investments from many of the world's major cellphone companies, including Finland-based Nokia and U.K.-based Vodafone. Vodacom Congo is co-owned by Vodafone and a South Africa-based company, while Celtel, the second-largest provider in Congo, is owned by a Netherlands-based company that has operations in 14 African countries.

The two operators have built about 700 cellphone towers across Congo. Vodacom's Nkuli estimated that 70 percent of the country's 60 million people now live in areas with cellphone coverage.

"People would rather be without a shirt and trousers," Nkuli said, "and they'd rather go for days without food, instead of not having a phone."Dealing in Minutes

Down a rutted dirt road on the tattered outskirts of Kinshasa, Iyombe, 36, sat in the tiny two-room house he shares with his wife. He had been hoping for a career as an electrician, but when he finished his training in 2001, he couldn't find a job. The Congolese economy had been run into the ground by three decades of corrupt dictatorial rule by Mobuto Sese Seko. Then, after Mobutu was overthrown in 1997, the country dissolved into a war that has left 4 million people dead.

Amid all the despair, Iyombe spotted something new and promising: people carrying cellphones. The more he looked, the more he saw his future in the little gadgets. So he saved and borrowed, spending $500 for his first phone (the average price has since come down to about $40), and started charging people to make calls.

Now he's at the heart of Kinshasa's new airtime economy, in which minutes on a cellphone are a commodity that can be used, bartered or sold for cash.

In Kinshasa's noisy street markets, thousands of people sit at little wooden benches with signs that say appel , French for "call." They keep one or two -- sometimes four -- cellphones in their laps. They buy airtime in bulk from phone companies, then charge customers a small premium to make calls.

Amid the exhaust-choked chaos, airtime dealers sit patiently under colorful umbrellas or in wobbly plastic chairs offering exactly the same service as perhaps 30 or 40 other dealers working the same corner. They're all busy all the time.

At his little stand, which was the first one in his neighborhood, Iyombe said, he sells hundreds of calls a week and makes a profit of about $20 -- a fantastic weekly wage in a country where most people live on $1 a day. Iyombe supports his wife and pays rent for an aunt and school fees for two nephews. "I love my work," he said, wearing the bright red T-shirt of Celtel.

A large part of Iyombe's business is transferring airtime for his customers. They give him cash, and he transfers the minutes from his phone to wherever the customer wants them sent -- a friend, a relative or a business partner, often in some distant corner of this country the size of Western Europe.

The transfer takes only a few seconds: Iyombe needs only to enter the amount of airtime and the phone number of the person receiving it. Cellphone companies have added that function to phones in the past year.

Iyombe said many of his customers transfer airtime so that family members in the countryside can resell it. Customers in Kinshasa send airtime to a brother or parent in a distant village, who then sets up under a shady tree and acts as a human phone booth. They sell calls on their phone and earn enough cash to feed their families. In many Congolese villages, cellphone ownership marks the divide between haves and have-nots.

Iyombe said text messaging has been slowed by widespread illiteracy but has started taking off in recent months as people learn key words to text, such as "Call me." He said it is becoming more popular largely because a text message costs five cents, compared with 26 cents for a one-minute voice call. When his mother wants to talk to him, he said, she sends a text telling him to call.

"It was a little difficult getting her to use texts, but now she's very good at it," he said, smiling at the thought.

The demand for cellphone calls has sprouted several offshoot industries. For a fee, people type text messages for the illiterate. In places where there is little or no electricity -- which means most of Congo -- entrepreneurs set up small diesel-powered generators and connect plug boards with 30 sockets. People plug in their phones to charge for a couple of hours for about 30 cents.

Iyombe keeps his own small generator to make sure he's never without battery power.

"Without these cellphones, we wouldn't be able to move forward," he said.Mobile Accounts

DOJ_NMG_0039303

Iyombe spoke while sitting in the larger room of his house, which is just big enough for a bed -- and a television he bought in a cellphone transaction.

Last year he walked into an electronics shop in the city center and picked out the 20-inch TV. To pay, he punched a few buttons on his cellphone and transferred a down payment of $150 into the shop's bank account. The shopkeeper received a text message confirmation that the money had been transferred successfully, and Iyombe walked out with his new TV. Iyombe settled his bill with three more $50 payments via his cellphone.

"I went in empty-handed, but I could still buy something because I had my phone," he said.

Conveniences such as laptops, Internet access, ATMs and credit cards are rare or nonexistent in Congo, so entrepreneurs are devising ways to use cellphones to serve the same functions.

Iyombe is one of about 25,000 Congolese subscribers to Celpay, a company that offers Internet banking through cellphones. Celpay customers make cash deposits into their Celpay accounts and can access their accounts, transfer money or pay bills with their phones.

Dozens of businesses, including gas stations and grocery stores, now allow customers to pay for goods through Celpay. The company that distributes Coca-Cola and Heineken beer also uses the system to collect payment, which means drivers no longer have to carry a safe full of cash on their trucks and constantly worry about bandits.

When Iyombe wants to make a deposit to his account, he can go to one of more than 100 "cash points" set up across the country. Most are small booths with a person sitting inside with a cellphone and a cash box, known here as "human teller machines." Iyombe gives cash to the clerk, who sends a text message to Celpay noting the deposit. Iyombe then receives a text message confirmation that the money has been credited to his account.

Lazarus Muchenje, chief executive of Celpay, said his company is trying to capitalize on the Congolese embrace of cellphone technology: "We are using the credibility of the cellphone network." Celpay is owned by FirstRand Banking Group, a major South African financial institution.

At a busy gas station in Kinshasa, manager Tharcisse Tshimanga said he gets six or eight customers a day paying with their phones.

"People trust this," he said. "It's made everything easier."Tool of Corruption, Peace

Cellphones have also created a new kind of corruption in a country rife with it: People here tell of government officials demanding bribes in the form of airtime transferred to their cellphones. Local officials said they believe armed rebel groups use cellphones and texts to coordinate their operations in the country's eastern provinces, where they fight regularly with 17,000 U.N. peacekeepers, the largest U.N. force in the world.

But the technology is also being used to create peace, as with a program to disarm more than 150,000 men and women who fought in Congo's gruesome war.

One recent morning in downtown Kinshasa, Fiston Disundi walked up to a little white Celpay cash point booth and handed over his government ID.

The woman in the booth entered his ID number into her cellphone and sent a text message to Celpay's computer database. Ten seconds later the response came back. Disundi, 27, was a former soldier who had turned in his AK-47 rifle in January. That meant he was entitled to a monthly $25 cash payment, which she promptly handed over to him.

The World Bank, Britain, France and other big donors have put up $200 million for the year-old program, designed to turn Congo's warriors into wage earners. So far more than 75,000 people have handed over their guns in exchange for job training and a cash incentive: an initial $110 payment, followed by monthly $25 payments for a year.

Initially, clerks using thick account books with handwritten entries were having trouble making the thousands of payments efficiently. So, in February the program contracted with Celpay to modernize the process.

Disundi said when he received his first two $25 payments, he waited nearly six hours in long lines while clerks dug through record books to find his details. But when he went to the Celpay booth recently, the transaction took less than a minute. The system also confirmed that Disundi was where he was supposed to be: Ex-combatants must agree to stay in their home regions rather than gathering with others in hotspots.

Sitting in the shade in the intense morning heat, Disundi, a thin man with a scruffy beard, said he'd been carrying a gun since 1997, when his parents were killed by a mortar shell that fell on their house. "I saw so many terrible things," he said. "I felt nothing anymore. I was just waiting to die."

He said he's relieved not to be carrying a weapon. He wants to become a mechanic so he can support his two children.

"I don't want them to go through what I've been through," he said.

He has no job and almost no money. But he has a cellphone, which rang over and over as he talked.

After TV Debates, Pakistan May Ease Laws On Rape Reporting (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, July 8 — The young audience fell into confused silence and then buzzed with whispers after Mir Ibrahim Rahman announced that there was no difference between an apple and an orange.

Mr. Rahman, 28, chief executive of the immensely popular Geo TV network, was speaking last Sunday at a youth conference in Rawalpindi, the garrison city adjacent to the capital, Islamabad. His absurd statement, he immediately made clear, was meant to illustrate the failings of a set of Islamic decrees known collectively as the Hudood Ordinance.

The laws, introduced in 1979 and criticized internationally since, include a clause stating that to prove rape, a woman must have at least four male witnesses. If the woman fails to provide proof, she herself faces the charge of adultery.

"The Hudood Ordinance makes no distinction between rape and adultery," Mr. Rahman explained to his audience. "It is just like saying there is no difference between an apple and an orange."

That flaw, critics say, has put many women behind bars. Of about 6,000 women in Pakistani custody awaiting trial as of March, 4,621 were being held on Hudood violations, according to the Human Rights Commission of Pakistan, an independent group. Some 1,300 women awaiting trial were ordered released on Friday, after President Pervez Musharraf allowed bail in nonviolent offenses.

Pakistani society has remained bitterly divided over the laws. Orthodox clergymen have often portrayed the laws as divine ("hudood" refers to punishments in the Koran for adultery and fornication, as well as for consuming alcohol, making false accusations and stealing). Rights advocates have demanded absolute repeal since 1980's. They maintain that the Hudood Ordinance not only negates the rights of women but is also a misinterpretation of Islam.

Now, there are signs that the laws may be, at the least, softened. And Mr. Rahman — who has pressed for public debate over them in television shows, advertising campaigns and personal appearances at seminars, like the one last Sunday — may be a major reason.

Most prominently, Geo put together and broadcast four groundbreaking episodes of a program called "Zara Socieye" ("Just Think") in June, on which 27 top religious scholars debated various clauses of the Hudood Ordinance and agreed on a series of amendments.

Mr. Rahman, the son and grandson of Pakistani media magnates, studied in the United States and worked at Goldman Sachs in New York. He returned to Pakistan four years ago to lead Geo, one of more than a dozen private television channels that were founded after President Musharraf liberalized media laws.

"On the flight back, I wrote a letter to myself, explaining why I am going back," Mr. Rahman recalled. "I poured all of my idealism in that letter." One of the goals he wrote down, he said, was raising public awareness of the Hudood laws.

Last week, President Musharraf asked the Council of Islamic Ideology, which advises the legislature on whether a certain law is repugnant to Islam or not, to draft an amendment to the Hudood Ordinance.

The Law Ministry is also proposing changes.

"Now, there is a lot of consensus," Wasi Zafar, Pakistan's law minister, said Wednesday in an interview. "Many religious scholars have admitted that certain laws are required to be amended." But he maintained that misuse of the laws is the problem, rather than their intrinsic flaws. "Major defect is the misuse of the law," Mr. Zafar said while acknowledging that legal experts have called it "bad legislation."

Mr. Zafar said his ministry would complete a draft of amendments this month and the government would present it in the next session of the Parliament, which is expected to be held this month as well. A simple majority is needed to change the law.

Shahid Shamsi, a spokesman for Jamaat-e-Islami, the country's largest Islamic party, said his party was not averse to changing the Hudood Ordinance but did not support repealing it.

At the same time, some critics of the law say that only repeal will satisfy them.

"No amendment to the law will be able to make these 'black laws' acceptable to civil society," read a statement released this week by Pakistan's leading nongovernmental and rights organizations.

Nasreen Azhar of Action Aid, one of the signers of the statement, said in an interview: "It is beyond amendment. We all have seen the negative effects it has had on women."

'150 Dead' In Russian Jet Crash (CNN)

CNN, July 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0039305

MOSCOW, Russia (CNN) -- An Airbus A-310 passenger jet with 200 people on board left the runway early Sunday while landing at Irkutsk Airport in eastern Siberia, crashed into a concrete barrier and burst into flames, killing 150 people, according to the Russian news agency Interfax.

The front of the plane was crushed, and more than 40 people were hospitalized with burns, the agency said, quoting emergency officials.

The jet, flying from Moscow, hit a building before catching fire, and the blaze was under control, the agency said.

Emergency crews were attempting to retrieve bodies and rescue anyone left on board.

Scores Feared Dead In Siberia Runway Crash (AP)

By Henry Meyer

AP, July 9, 2006

An airplane carrying about 200 people crashed Sunday in the Siberian city of Irkutsk and most on board were feared dead, officials said.

The regional prosecutor's office said a preliminary count showed that more than 150 people died, the Interfax news agency reported.

The plane was carrying 192 passengers, Emergency Situations Ministry spokeswoman Irina Andrianova said.

Andrianova said 43 people had been hospitalized and another 10 managed to escape.

The Interfax report said that the dead were believed to include the eight crew members.

The Airbus A-310 operated by Sibir, Russia's second-largest airline, crashed on landing, went off the runway and burst into flames, Andrianova said.

"The aircraft veered off the runway on landing. It was traveling at a terrific speed," Andrianova said.

The plane hit a concrete barrier, collapsing the front section of the aircraft, she said. It then burst into flames.

The aircraft was on a flight from Moscow to Irkutsk, near Lake Baikal.

It took five emergency services more than two hours to extinguish the flames, Andrianova said.

Former Soviet airlines had a grisly record of crashes in the 1990s, following the whittling of much of Soviet monopoly carrier Aeroflot into hundreds of regional airlines plagued by scant money, aging equipment and cavalier disregard for safety.

In recent years, crashes from equipment failure or pilot error have declined sharply.

Sibir came under new ownership amid a 1998 financial crisis and installed a dynamic young team to reinvent what remained of Aeroflot's Siberian wing with the help of Western consultants.

Those plans were dealt a blow when a Sibir Tu-154 was one of two planes lost in near-simultaneous crashes blamed on terrorist bombs in 2004.

Three years earlier, another Sibir plane was shot down by a stray Ukrainian missile fired during military exercises. All 78 people on board died.

Woman Dies On Boat Carrying Cubans To U.S. (AP)

By Kelli Kennedy

AP, July 9, 2006

A boat overloaded with Cubans being smuggled into the U.S. tried to ram a Coast Guard vessel in rough seas early Saturday, and a woman aboard the boat died, authorities said.

The 36-foot, go-fast boat ignored orders to stop when the Coast Guard tried to intercept it 4 miles south of Boca Chica around 6:30 a.m., said Petty Officer James Judge, a spokesman for the Coast Guard.

Coast Guard crew then fired two shots into the vessel's engine to disable it, he said.

"The boat was bouncing around like crazy. It was very rough, choppy waters," Judge said. "They repeatedly attempted to ram the vessel more than five times, but they never made contact."

The boat carried 31 Cubans and three people authorities said were smugglers.

The woman who died suffered a head injury and severe bruising to her face, and an autopsy was scheduled Sunday.

Judge said three men on the boat were treated for minor injuries. Authorities said none of the injuries was caused by the Coast Guard gunfire. A pregnant woman also was hospitalized, but her condition was not immediately known.

The remaining migrants were still aboard the Coast Guard cutter and will be processed as usual, he said. Under the "wet foot/dry foot" policy, most Cubans who reach U.S. soil are allowed to remain, while those intercepted at sea are generally sent home.

DOJ_NMG_0039306

It was not immediately known where in Cuba the migrants began their journey. Go-fast boats from Cuba can typically reach South Florida in a couple hours, Judge said.

"The boat was severely overloaded," he said. "All those add up for dangerous possibilities."

Authorities detained three people as suspected smugglers, though criminal charges were not immediately filed.

"Smugglers often treat migrants as if they were human cargo, with blatant disregard for individual life and safety. This must stop," U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta said in a statement. "The United States Attorney's Office is determined to use all prosecutorial tools at our disposal to investigate and prosecute these smuggling incidents."

A spokesman for the Cuban American National Foundation said the shots fired by the Coast Guard were "of grave concern."

"The people who are culpable are those who engage in the smuggling of humans," said Alfredo Mesa, the group's executive director. "At the same time, we call upon the U.S. Coast Guard to remember that these are human beings fleeing tyranny."

Ramos-Horta Is Appointed New Premier Of East Timor (NYT)

By Jane Perlez

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

DENPASAR, Indonesia, July 8 — In a move designed to bring stability to East Timor after months of unrest, the Nobel peace laureate José Ramos-Horta was named prime minister on Saturday.

President Xanana Gusmão selected Mr. Ramos-Horta to lead a new government after Mari Alkatiri was forced to resign as prime minister two weeks ago amid allegations that he had helped to organize and arm a civilian militia.

Mr. Gusmão, speaking in the capital, Dili, on Saturday evening, said he hoped Mr. Ramos-Horta, a close friend of his who enjoys popular support at home and is respected abroad, would "bring about the process of healing."

The selection was praised by the Australian government, which sent more than 1,000 soldiers to East Timor in late May to lead an international peacekeeping force in putting down an insurrection among members of the army and the police.

"We welcome the fact that the political leaders of East Timor are starting to sort their problems out," the Australian foreign minister, Alexander Downer, said Saturday.

In Dili, residents said they were relieved. "I guarantee Horta is the best we have," said Oldegar Massinga, who works for a United Nations agency, in a telephone interview. "Now he has to send the refugees back home and put a police post in every place in Dili."

The immediate challenge for Mr. Ramos-Horta, who was foreign minister in the previous government, will be to convince the more than 100,000 people who fled Dili and outlying areas during violence last month to return home. The refugees are living in makeshift camps but have said they were reluctant to leave the camps, watched over by the Australians and other members of the 2,700-troop peacekeeping force, while armed groups still roam the capital.

The violence in the capital, Dili, spun out of control in May after 600 soldiers were dismissed from East Timor's army of 1,400. Battles between members of the army and the police spread into general gang warfare and looting, bringing the government to a standstill.

It was the first major breakdown of law and order since East Timor, with a population of less than a million, declared independence in 2002 after three years of rule by the United Nations, and three decades of occupation by neighboring Indonesia.

The recent violence came after the United Nations and the World Bank had praised East Timor as a model example of a new nation. Several billion dollars in international aid was spent to help East Timor build its own army, police force and judicial system, and on the United Nations peacekeeping force that came to East Timor after a vote in favor of independence in 1999.

Mr. Ramos-Horta, 56, shared the Nobel Peace Prize in 1996 with the Roman Catholic bishop of Dili, Carlos Ximenes Belos. They were cited for their courage in resisting and campaigning against occupation by Indonesia, which invaded the former Portuguese colony in 1975.

While the bishop stayed in East Timor, Mr. Ramos-Horta traveled the world after the invasion, trying to raise awareness about the plight of his people. A recent United Nations-backed commission estimated that more than 100,000 people were killed in East Timor by the Indonesian military.

Two weeks ago, a special envoy of the United Nations, Ian Martin, arrived in East Timor with a team of experts to assess what kind of new aid the United Nations might provide. Mr. Martin has said that a United Nations police force would likely be dispatched, and that a peacekeeping force was a possibility.

DOJ_NMG_0039307

In the past two weeks, Mr. Ramos-Horta has been critical of Mr. Alkatiri, the ousted prime minister, saying that he was almost certainly involved in arming a civilian militia. He also criticized the former prime minister's failure to organize public-works programs for the large numbers of unemployed young men in East Timor.

While East Timor has one of the world's lowest per capita incomes, it possesses large oil deposits and has recently accrued more than $600 million in oil revenue that remains virtually untouched. Mr. Ramos-Horta said in a recent interview that it was imperative for a new government to provide employment programs.

East Timor Gets New Leadership (LAT)

By Richard C. Paddock

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

JAKARTA, Indonesia — Jose Ramos-Horta, who received the Nobel Peace Prize a decade ago for his efforts to win East Timor's independence, was named prime minister of the tiny nation Saturday as it tried to overcome months of violence and internal strife.

Ramos-Horta replaces Mari Bin Amude Alkatiri, who stepped down June 26 as prime minister after months of violence that claimed at least 30 lives and prompted 150,000 people — 15% of the population — to flee their homes and take refuge in makeshift camps.

Alkatiri had been accused of encouraging factional fighting between residents from the eastern and western parts of the country in an attempt to hold on to power. East Timorese authorities are investigating whether he authorized the arming of civilian hit squads to silence his political opponents.

The appointment of Ramos-Horta, 56, was announced by President Jose Alexandre Gusmao, who is immensely popular as the former leader of the guerrilla resistance against Indonesian rule but who has limited power under the constitution.

Gusmao said he hoped the appointment of Ramos-Horta would help "bring about the process of healing and bring peace and stability to the people of East Timor."

East Timor, the world's newest nation, won independence from Indonesia in 1999 but only after pro-Indonesian militia groups killed more than 1,000 people and destroyed 70% of the country's buildings.

The United Nations helped rebuild East Timor, which officially became a nation in 2002, but the world body withdrew its peacekeepers last year in a move that U.N. officials now recognize was premature.

Violence erupted in April after Alkatiri fired 600 soldiers, or nearly half the army, for protesting that they faced discrimination because they came from the western part of the country. Alkatiri called in loyal troops to quell the protests and they opened fire on civilians, killing at least six people.

The country destabilized further when the police and army began fighting each other, then fled the capital, Dili, leaving the city in the hands of arsonists and gangs armed with machetes.

A 2,700-member international peacekeeping force led by Australia arrived May 25 and has succeeded in restoring order, although arsonists continue to set fire to homes and businesses belonging to their rivals. A house in Dili was set ablaze hours after Ramos-Horta's appointment was announced, the Associated Press reported.

Ramos-Horta, whose name has been floated as a possible successor to U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, held the posts of foreign minister and defense minister until he quit last month in protest over Alkatiri's refusal to step down. Alkatiri's resignation came the next day.

Gusmao and Ramos-Horta are said to be close allies in a government that is dominated by the Fretilin party, which led the independence movement in East Timor and now controls 55 of parliament's 88 seats. Gusmao and Ramos-Horta once were members of Fretilin, which Ramos-Horta helped found.

Elections are scheduled for next year, and Fretilin's popularity has suffered under Alkatiri. In meetings with Gusmao, Fretilin leaders agreed to nominate Ramos-Horta as one of four possible candidates for prime minister even though he was no longer with the party.

Ramos-Horta fled East Timor, a former Portuguese colony, just before it was invaded in 1975 by Indonesian troops. For more than two decades, he traveled around the world campaigning for East Timor's independence. He and Bishop Carlos Ximenes Belo, who stayed behind in East Timor, were jointly awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1996.

In an interview with The Times last month, Ramos-Horta said the impoverished country had not managed its resources well, noting that $600 million in oil revenue was waiting to be allocated.

He said he would favor using some of that money to provide food, healthcare and education for the poorest residents. He also said he would like to rebuild the nation by offering tax-free status for up to 10 years for foreign businesses willing to invest there.

When Genocide Worsens (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof column

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

A genocide by its nature would seem to be the rock bottom of human behavior. But in Darfur, we see a genocide that is growing worse.

The Darfur Peace Agreement, signed on May 5, signaled a ray of hope in a desperate land. But on the ground, its deadlines are not being met, security is deteriorating, and the violence is rippling from Sudan ever wider into both Chad and the Central African Republic.

One measure of how awful the situation has become in eastern Chad is that at least 15,000 villagers have fled ... into Darfur!

In one broad swath of the Chad border region, the only Westerners brave enough (and crazy enough) to stay are French doctors with Doctors Without Borders. Hats off to them.

In just the last six months, aid groups in eastern Chad have lost 26 vehicles to armed hijackers. A Spanish woman working for Unicef was shot and nearly killed in May when her vehicle was stolen — and the car was later spotted in Sudan, sailing through government checkpoints. This insecurity puts relief agencies in a terrible situation, for they don't want to risk having their aid workers murdered or raped, and yet if they pull out many thousands of Darfuris will die.

"We cannot play with the lives of our own staff beyond a certain limit," frets Jan Egeland, an under secretary general of the United Nations, adding, "Our people in the field are increasingly desperate."

"I think we're headed toward total chaos," he said. "Will we have collapse in nine days, nine weeks, nine months? I don't know. But the situation is unsustainable."

One problem is that provisions of the Darfur Peace Agreement aren't actually being carried out so far — and in the meantime it has inflamed tensions among the African tribes that have been victimized by the genocide. The Fur tribe, one of the biggest in Darfur ("Darfur" means "Homeland of the Fur"), has mostly opposed the deal, and so there has been fighting between Fur and men of the Zaghawa tribe, whose top commander signed the agreement.

"There is a significant risk that the Darfur Peace Agreement will collapse," the U.N. special envoy for Sudan, Jan Pronk, wrote in his blog. "The agreement does not resonate with the people of Darfur. ... It is not yet dead, but severely paralyzed."

Meanwhile, Sudan is as adamant as ever that it will never accept United Nations peacekeepers, and the international community isn't prepared to push back hard.

The two most important Bush administration officials on Darfur, Robert Zoellick and Michael Gerson (who has been the conscience of the White House), have both announced their resignations, so there is a vacuum in Washington as well. President Bush should address this vacuum by appointing a top-level envoy for the crisis. Mr. President, how about calling in James Baker, or else Colin Powell?

In talking to experts about Darfur over the last three years, I usually have encountered both optimists and pessimists. These days, I just can't find an optimist. The range of opinion is between those who think the crisis will deteriorate slowly and those who think the situation will disintegrate so precipitously that soon 100,000 people will be dying each month, unless the peace agreement can somehow be revived.

There are specific measures I can suggest. We need to amplify (though not reopen) the peace agreement to bring the Fur in, and we need to ensure that its deadlines are met. We need a U.N.-led or French-led protection force in eastern Chad. We need to bolster the African Union force in Darfur immediately and push harder for Sudan to admit U.N. peacekeepers. We need a no-fly zone. We need to press Europeans to become more involved and to remind Arabs that the slaughter of several hundred thousand Muslims in Darfur is every bit as worthy of protest as cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad.

But most of all, we must put genocide squarely on the international agenda. One lesson of history is that world leaders always prefer to ignore a genocide, but when forced to face the horrors — as in Bosnia or Kosovo — they figure out ways of responding. The most acute need is not for policies but for political will.

So here's a suggestion: Let's charter a few cargo planes to carry the corpses of hundreds of new victims from Darfur and Chad to the U.N. The butchered victims of Darfur could lie in state as a memorial to global indifference — and as a spur to become serious about the first genocide of the 21st century.

Bush's Unintended Internationalism (WP)

By Jim Hoagland column

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0039309

In spite of itself, the Bush administration is reshaping and revitalizing international law as a governing concept and a force in world politics. This White House gives new meaning to the notion of unintended and devoutly unwanted consequences.

Its highhanded policies in the war on global terrorist networks and the occupation of Iraq have provoked sharp reaction at home and abroad. Over time, this reaction has turned into a search by others for legal and political frameworks to contain President Bush's campaign to concentrate national security power in his hands and shield it from even cursory scrutiny and consultation.

This is the unwritten subtext of the Supreme Court's recent rebuke to the administration for mishandling the prosecution of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a Guantanamo Bay detainee who was once Osama bin Laden's chauffeur.

The majority's legal reasoning in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld was mundane and mechanical, which was all that was needed to demolish the administration's shoddy case. But the majority's political argument was extraordinary and explosive for its heavy reliance on "customary international law" and "the law of war" to prescribe Hamdan's treatment in the American criminal justice system.

This appeal to international standards was a stretch for the court. But it is justified as a wake-up call to the administration on an obvious point: What is reasonable -- legally speaking -- in emergency conditions is not necessarily reasonable on an enduring or permanent basis.

The White House has had sufficient time to work with Congress on long-term national security legislation covering detainees, the court pointedly noted. The same reasoning applies to telecommunications surveillance and other aspects of the administration's self-described "long war" on terrorism.

But Bush has resolutely refused to do this until now. The irreducible working principle of this White House has been that only the president can be relied on to resist the pressures and temptations that will cause Congress to leak, vacillate or turn tail on even the gravest national security problems. The same misperception has also applied in large part to allies abroad.

The Bush White House is still determined to entrench its secretive and autocratic methods, run through intelligence agencies, as the way future administrations must operate in an era of new, unpredictable dangers. Bush and Vice President Cheney put a positive spin on Napoleon's dictum that nothing endures as long as the temporary.

The fact is that most in Congress -- and for that matter the Supreme Court's majority in Hamdan and most of America's global allies -- agree with Bush that new methods for fighting a significant danger are needed. They just don't agree that Bush and a few trusted aides should determine those methods alone and in secret.

Bush and Cheney are no doubt sincere in their misplaced concerns, which just happen to reinforce Karl Rove's political strategy of running against Congress, the media, pusillanimous foreigners and other reputed national security weaklings. But Bush and Cheney underestimate the costs of their policies and the countervailing forces they inevitably trigger.

European governments and civil liberties groups are pressing for new laws to prevent CIA secret renditions of terrorism suspects from or through European territory. They may also seek to limit other cooperation of their own secret services with Washington, especially after the arrest last week of two Italian secret service officials for allegedly helping the CIA abduct a terrorism suspect in Milan and fly him to Egypt.

Even in Iraq, the administration is creating a strong local and international backlash by refusing resolutely to discuss with Iraqi politicians a status-of-forces agreement, or SOFA, which would provide a vital new measure of Iraqi sovereignty and stability by putting foreign troops under nominal Iraqi control. The lack of a SOFA and of accountability to Iraqi authorities is rapidly becoming a major irritant in U.S.-Iraqi relations.

Before the invasion of Iraq, Bush made a strong case that international law had failed to deal with Saddam Hussein's murderous regime. Three years later he has not produced a workable alternative that commands general consent or respect. His secretive methods -- rather than the dangers that still threaten -- have too often become the center of attention.

The contrast with the majority's reasoning in Hamdan is illuminating. The decision is everything al-Qaeda hates and wages war upon: an exaltation of the individual and of individual rights protected by transparent secular institutions.

A new framework for international law is being developed in reaction to Bush's global policies -- without other significant American input. That is the message from America's allies, from Congress and now from the Supreme Court that the president should finally heed.

Voices Of Iranian Reform, Silenced (WP)

By Fotini Christia

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

TEHRAN -- Today marks the seventh anniversary of the student protests that took post-revolutionary Iran by storm. On July 9, 1999, after the forcible closure of several liberal media outlets and a coordinated attack on a dormitory at the University of

DOJ_NMG_0039310

Tehran, Iranian students poured into the streets by the thousands, calling for political reform. Just as at Tiananmen Square a decade before, the Iranian students gave the world a glimpse of what might be -- only to be quickly silenced by Ayatollah Ali Khamenei's Revolutionary Guard.

Naturally, Iran's regime will not celebrate today's anniversary, but neither will Iran's opposition. The Iranian student movement is a shambles -- divided, confused and lacking any cause for celebration. In extensive conversations with students and student veterans of the 1999 protests, who asked to remain anonymous because of fears about their safety, I found that one message emerged loud and clear: Iran does not need another revolution, but it is in desperate need of reform.

The atmosphere at the University of Tehran is eerily quiet these days. Nothing remains from the 1999 protests, which were in fact the most notable outbreak of unrest since the Islamic Revolution 20 years earlier.

The protests were directed at the rule of the ayatollahs, and they revealed the pronounced internal divisions between the reformist president, Mohammed Khatami -- then in the middle of his first term -- and Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Khamenei. Khatami, who was trying to loosen Khamenei's tight control of the judiciary, security services and media, was facing strong resistance from the clerics when the students came to his aid. But unlike the Islamic Revolution, in which the legitimacy of the country's whole system was called into question, the 1999 protests sought reform within the existing regime, and for an Islamic democracy, that would be in accordance with Iran's constitution.

That reform didn't happen, and now, under President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's leadership, the process has been completely sidelined. The Iranian political scene is dominated by the nuclear issue. Confrontation with the West has made the public more tolerant of authoritarian methods, damaging reformers and making concern for individual rights and civil liberties seem utterly irrelevant. The student movement very much wants a reemergence of the reform process, but it has no good ideas on how to make it happen.

Indeed, the student movement has found no place in Iran's new political reality, and its stance has moved from the politics of realistic change to the politics of survival through inaction. The old guard -- the 1999 student leaders -- is either in jail or abroad, and those of its members still in Iran desperately want out. Their successors -- the new leaders of the liberal student union Daftare Tahkim Vahdat -- have no organized structure and are weak and fragmented. Their manifestos espouse a Marxist ideal -- the orthodox left as they call it -- and surreal plans for communist change. These are mostly poor students from Iran's provinces who find themselves repelled by the big city's bourgeois way of life. They see the move to the left as an outlet for change, but they have no real ideological base or sense of direction. "The government could crush them any day, but they don't because it is convenient to have some sort of weak opposition," said a student participant in the 1999 protests and a former member of the group. "It makes the regime look more democratic."

Said another disillusioned veteran of the 1999 student uprising: "Everyone talks about radical change, but nobody wants to do anything about it, and they don't want it to come from America. . . . We need to bring together the student movement, the women's movement, the workers' movement and the ethnic minority movements and create a united front to face the regime's radical ideas."

When I asked this person about his contribution to the student movement, he told me he is working on a book. "I am using the U.S. student protests from the late 1960s to show the students that revolution and radicalism is a bust," he said, adding that "lessons may come from America after all, but they will be for reform, not revolution."

The writer is a fellow at the Weatherhead Center for International Affairs at Harvard. She is currently at the International Center for Persian Studies, University of Tehran.

This Just In: [censored] (LAT)

By Editorial

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

Beijing's move to limit breaking news reports sparks one of the biggest free-speech debates to hit China.

THE MEDIA AND THE GOVERNMENT might occasionally bump heads in the United States over issues like newspaper reports on secret anti-terrorism programs, but it could be a lot worse. In China, the National People's Congress is on the verge of approving a law that would forbid the media from reporting on breaking news without permission from government officials.

The draft law plumbs new depths of censorship even in China, already among the most regressive countries when it comes to press freedoms. It would impose fines of up to $12,500 on media operations that publish reports on "sudden incidents" without authorization — terminology so vague it could apply to just about any news event. The law targets stories that are false or "damaging to the social order," empowering local government apparatchiks to suppress pretty much anything they find embarrassing.

The draft law is particularly unusual in that, apparently, it would target foreign as well as domestic media. Though reporters for papers such as The Times are closely monitored, the government seldom tries to censor stories meant for outside consumption. Yet an official involved in preparing the legislation recently said he thought it should apply to all news organizations operating in China.

Beijing is trying to keep a tight rein on a fast-changing society. The country's rapid development is aided by new technologies, wider access to information and higher education standards, all of which its communist leadership promotes and fears simultaneously. Hence the occasional impulse for such clumsy clampdowns. The good news is that Internet access is so widespread as to make censorship difficult.

The "sudden incidents" Beijing is most worried about are outbreaks of civil unrest in the countryside. Then there are all sorts of events that could undermine the people's faith in their government's competence. China's suppression of news on the outbreak of SARS in 2003 contributed to the spread of the disease, attracted international condemnation and triggered pledges of greater openness. More recently, Beijing's attempt to cover up news of an industrial accident that spilled toxins into the Songhua River prompted a confrontation with Russia and led to a public outcry against government censorship.

If there's a silver lining to this naked attempt at repression, it's that China's media and public are strongly resisting it. Newspaper editors in the south have been surprisingly outspoken in their opposition, something that only a few years ago would have been unthinkable. Sooner or later, China's leaders will learn that now that the genie of free speech and thought has been let out of the bottle, there's no putting it back in.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Ally Warned Bush On Keeping Spying From Congress (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau And Scott Shane

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 8 — In a sharply worded letter to President Bush in May, an important Congressional ally charged that the administration might have violated the law by failing to inform Congress of some secret intelligence programs and risked losing Republican support on national security matters.

The letter from Representative Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, the Republican chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, did not specify the intelligence activities that he believed had been hidden from Congress.

But Mr. Hoekstra, who was briefed on and supported the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program and the Treasury Department's tracking of international banking transactions, clearly was referring to programs that have not been publicly revealed.

Recently, after the harsh criticism from Mr. Hoekstra, intelligence officials have appeared at two closed committee briefings to answer questions from the chairman and other members. The briefings appear to have eased but not erased the concerns of Mr. Hoekstra and other lawmakers about whether the administration is sharing information on all of its intelligence operations.

A copy of the four-page letter dated May 18, which has not been previously disclosed, was obtained by The New York Times.

"I have learned of some alleged intelligence community activities about which our committee has not been briefed," Mr. Hoesktra wrote. "If these allegations are true, they may represent a breach of responsibility by the administration, a violation of the law, and, just as importantly, a direct affront to me and the members of this committee who have so ardently supported efforts to collect information on our enemies."

He added: "The U.S. Congress simply should not have to play Twenty Questions to get the information that it deserves under our Constitution."

Frederick Jones, a White House spokesman, declined to comment on the concerns raised by Mr. Hoekstra but said that "we will continue to work closely with the chairman and other Congressional leaders on important national security issues."

A spokesman for Mr. Hoekstra, Jamal D. Ware, said he could not discuss the activities allegedly withheld from Congress. But he said that Mr. Hoekstra remained adamant that no intelligence programs could be hidden from oversight committees.

"Chairman Hoekstra has raised these issues with the administration to ensure that the Intelligence Committee is able to conduct its job of oversight," Mr. Ware said. "Intelligence officials have committed to being forthcoming with Congress, and Chairman Hoekstra is going to hold them to their word."

Mr. Hoekstra's blunt letter is evidence of a rift between the White House and House Republican leaders over the administration's perceived indifference to Congressional oversight and input on intelligence matters. Mr. Hoekstra wrote that he had shared his complaints with House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois, and that the speaker "concurs with my concerns."

A spokesman for Mr. Hastert declined to comment.

The letter appears to have resulted at least in part from the White House's decision, made early in May, to name Gen. Michael V. Hayden to lead the Central Intelligence Agency, with Stephen R. Kappes as his deputy. The letter was sent the day of General Hayden's confirmation hearing before the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Mr. Hoekstra (pronounced HOOK-stra) complained publicly about the choices when they were announced, but his private letter to Mr. Bush was much harsher. He warned that the choice of Mr. Kappes, who he said was part of a group at the C.I.A. that "intentionally undermined the administration," sends "a clear signal that the days of collaborative reform between the White House and this committee may be over."

Mr. Hoekstra also expressed concern about the intelligence reorganization under John D. Negroponte, the first director of national intelligence, who he said was creating "a large, bureaucratic and hierarchical structure that will be less flexible and agile than our adversaries."

Mr. Hoekstra's views on oversight appear to be shared by some other Intelligence Committee members.

DOJ_NMG_0039315

"I think the executive branch has been insufficiently forthcoming on a number of important programs," Representative Heather A. Wilson, Republican of New Mexico, said in an interview. She would not discuss any programs on which the committee had not been briefed, but she said that in the Bush administration, "there's a presumption that if they don't tell anybody, a problem may get better or it will solve itself."

Ms. Wilson said she shared "deep concerns" about the pace and direction of intelligence reforms overseen by Mr. Negroponte's office. "We have some troubled programs," she said.

American intelligence agencies routinely conduct many secret programs, but under the National Security Act, the agencies are required to keep the Congressional intelligence committees "fully and currently informed of all intelligence activities." Even in the case of especially sensitive covert actions, the law requires briefings for at least the leaders from both parties of the committees and the House and Senate.

As the administration has asserted broad presidential authority to fight terrorism, concerns about Congressional oversight and checks and balances between the branches of government have become increasingly heated. Democrats complained that the administration's failure to brief the full Intelligence Committees on the N.S.A. warrantless eavesdropping, which focuses on the international communications of Americans and others inside the United States, was a violation of the National Security law. Some members of Congress said they had been briefed on the Treasury Department's bank monitoring program, which examines international money transfers through a Brussels-based consortium, only after The New York Times began making inquiries in recent months.

But the assertion that other intelligence activities had been hidden from Congress is particularly surprising coming from Mr. Hoekstra, who defended the administration's limited briefings on the N.S.A. program against Democratic criticism.

An official familiar with recent exchanges between the intelligence agencies and the House committee said Friday that General Hayden had twice briefed the full committee and had addressed Mr. Hoekstra's questions about the intelligence activities referred to in the letter. The C.I.A. director promised "a free flow of information," and Mr. Hoekstra, who initially objected to placing a military officer in charge of the C.I.A., said he would work closely with the agency's new leadership.

The official, who spoke of the briefings only when granted anonymity because they were classified, declined to say anything about what the activities were or which agencies they involved.

Officials with both Mr. Negroponte's office and the C.I.A. declined to comment specifically on Mr. Hoekstra's letter. But Carl Kropf, a spokesman for Mr. Negroponte, said that over the past year his office had "engaged in hundreds of briefings, meetings and discussions with Congressional committees."

He added, "We value this dialogue with Congress, and we will continue to provide the committee with the information they need to fulfill their responsibilities."

Jennifer Millerwise Dyck, a spokeswoman for General Hayden, said that "the director believes in the important oversight role Congress plays, and he will continue regular and transparent interactions with members."

Since his appointment as committee chairman in August 2004, Mr. Hoekstra has been a critical ally of the White House on intelligence matters. He has supported the administration's most controversial policies, including its treatment of terrorist suspects, and he has balked at Democratic demands for an investigation of pre-war intelligence on Iraq. He has defended the legality and necessity of the N.S.A. program and the bank monitoring.

Mr. Hoekstra has been one of the strongest advocates in Congress for a crackdown on leaks of classified information to the media, a cause championed by both Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney.

But in recent months, Mr. Hoekstra has begun to express some disaffection. In March, he joined the top Democrat on the Intelligence Committee, Representative Jane Harman of California, in a public critique of Mr. Negroponte's performance. He criticized intelligence officials for initially resisting his demand that thousands of captured Iraqi documents be posted on the Web. Like other House Republicans, he bristled when Porter J. Goss, a former House colleague, was forced out as C.I.A. director in early May.

Most recently, Mr. Hoekstra strongly criticized a news briefing arranged by Mr. Negroponte's office on an Army report that 500 pre-Gulf War chemical shells had been found scattered around Iraq. On June 29, Mr. Hoekstra, who had said the finding established that there were weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, made public an angry letter to Mr. Negroponte calling the briefing "inaccurate, incomplete and occasionally misleading" and asserting that "attempts were made to downplay the significance of relevant facts."

A spokesman for Mr. Negroponte's office said he had not yet replied to the complaint.

Bush Is Pressed On Reporting Domestic Surveillance (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0039316

In a sharply worded letter, the Republican chairman of the House intelligence committee has told President Bush that the administration is angering lawmakers, and possibly violating the law, by giving Congress too little information about domestic surveillance programs.

Rep. Peter Hoekstra (Mich.) has been a staunch defender of the administration's anti-terrorism tactics. But seven weeks ago, he wrote to Bush to report that he had heard of "alleged Intelligence Community activities" not outlined to committee members in classified briefings.

"If these allegations are true," he wrote, "they may represent a breach of responsibility by the Administration, a violation of law and . . . a direct affront to me and the Members of this committee."

Hoekstra's four-page letter of May 18 was posted yesterday on the New York Times' Web site. His staff confirmed the letter's authenticity but said it was meant to remain private. Spokesman Jamal D. Ware said Hoekstra "has raised these concerns, and they are being addressed. He will continue to push for full disclosure so the committee can conduct vigorous oversight."

The letter is significant because few congressional Republicans have complained publicly about Bush's surveillance programs, which include warrantless wiretaps of some Americans' international phone calls and e-mails as well as the massive collection of telephone records involving U.S. homes and businesses.

Heretofore, the sharpest GOP concerns have been raised by Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (Pa.). On May 26, Specter voted against Michael V. Hayden's confirmation as CIA director to protest what he called "the administration's policy of not informing the Congress . . . in a way which enables the Congress and the Judiciary Committee to do our constitutional job on oversight."

In his letter, Hoekstra complained of unspecified alleged surveillance operations that had not become public at the time and that, perhaps, remain undisclosed. It was written five weeks before newspapers divulged that the administration has been secretly tapping into a vast global database of confidential financial transactions for nearly five years. It was unclear yesterday whether Hoekstra and other top-ranking lawmakers had been briefed on that program by the date of the letter.

Hoekstra has differed with the White House in recent weeks over the significance of 500 chemical munitions shells uncovered in Iraq near the Iranian border in 2004. The shells were buried by Iraqi troops, and then apparently forgotten, during Iraq's eight-year war with Iran, which ended in 1988.

Last month, Hoekstra highlighted the findings in a Capitol Hill news conference. But administration officials played them down, saying the old shells did not point to a bid by Saddam Hussein to develop weapons of mass destruction.
